Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Nebraska would not object, I will ask for some time for myself and I will yield the time to him, so he will have sufficient time.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would remind the Members of this body that there are a variety of legitimate ways that a Member whose interests are being tramped upon can cause great trouble in this body on this legislation. And I am not about to place in jeopardy my time here for a token 2 or 3 minutes of time to speak on a matter that is of crucial importance to my district and State.

Therefore, I object.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. MARRIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MARRIOTT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we are getting away from the purpose of this amendment.

I would like to get back to the Vento amendment and just simply say after having spent 6 years looking at various water laws and State laws pertaining to water that all of us know in this body whether we want to admit it or not that this Vento amendment is a wart on national water law and State water rights and I believe everybody in this body knows it.

We will always be disputing who owns water, how much they own. And that is an issue for the Supreme Court. That is not an issue for us to take up at this point.

Now, I want to make the statement that if the downstream States were really concerned about their water, they would change the language in the Vento amendment. This amendment reads:

> No state shall sell or otherwise transfer or permit the sale or transfer of water for coal pipelines.

Then it is silent—unless we have an interstate compact. Why does it not then include for coal slurry pipelines, for agricultural purposes, for cooling powerplants, et cetera, et cetera.

The point has already been made today by Mr. CHENEY that it takes five times more water to cool a powerplant than it does to slurry coal down a pipeline. Now, it seems to me we are trying to convince this body that somehow this bill is hurting downstream States. I make the point if you really want to be consistent, you ought to make your amendment fair and you ought not to be singling out only coal slurry pipelines. Because what that smells of is simply this: This bill that Mr. UDALL is putting forth is an antidiscrimination bill. It treats coal slurry pipelines just the same way as we treat everybody else.

And to be against the bill, to me, simply says that you are trying to discriminate in favor of your own special interests.

Mr. VENTO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARRIOTT. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. VENTO. I appreciate the gentleman's concern that we ought to take the same considerations in all other uses of water. Of course, the problem is this bill extends these special benefits in the State water law, the extension of the commerce clause, only to coal slurry and that is what this bill deals with. That is the germaneness issue I guess you are arguing and obviously we are trying to work within the narrow scope of what this bill is doing with regard to State water rights.

We are not trying to go outside of it with regard to the comprehensive issue.

Mr. MARRIOTT. If I can get back my time, you are limiting the rights of the State to deal with their own water and you are only limiting that to the extent it applies to coal slurry pipelines.

I think it is unfair. I think it is discriminatory, and I think we ought to get back down to the bottom line. Do you want coal slurry pipelines to compete or do you not? That is the issue.

You want eminent domain for railroads, for barges, for everything else, for power lines, but not coal slurry pipelines.

That argument does not pass the smell test.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARRIOTT. I yield to my friend from Wyoming.

Mr. CHENEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I would like, if I might take advantage of this opportunity, to remind my colleagues of something the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. MOODY), said earlier, which is when in doubt read the act.

It was suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the purpose of this bill is to grant eminent domain to coal pipelines. That is true. But he will also find on page 4 that it states, after having made that clear:

> Except that Congress declares that the development of coal pipelines may occur only if now or hereafter permitted by State water law and interstate allocations, and hereby delegates to and ratifies the exercise of such authority by the States as further set forth herein.

It has been said here today by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SHUSTER), and others that the bill does not grant sufficient authority to the States to safeguard their water rights. That is not accurate, based on the best testimony we have been able to obtain.

I hope to have the opportunity later on this afternoon during the course of the debate to clarify one more time, because it apparently needs clarification for many of my colleagues, that the bill does in fact do exactly that.

I yield back to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. MARRIOTT. I just want to simply say I have in Utah a humble piece of land. Going across my land is a railroad line: very ugly. Up above the railroad is an electrical power system: very ugly.

Now, you tell me what a 6-foot underground pipeline is going to cause as a problem and what danger it will be.

I think we are putting up smoke screens.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Utah (Mr. MARRIOTT) has expired.

(On request of Mr. BEREUTER and by unanimous consent Mr. MARRIOTT was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BEREUTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARRIOTT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. As I understand his comment, and perhaps I misheard, is the gentleman suggesting the amendment met the test of germaneness? Would it be your view that if the gentleman from Minnesota's amendment was constructed in the fashion you are suggesting that it would be germane, because I have doubts about the germaneness of an amendment constructed in that fashion.

Mr. MARRIOTT. No. I am simply saying that it is inconsistent. Because of its inconsistency it brings to the foreground its real intent.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARRIOTT. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. BEDELL. I would just like to point out the gentleman said that all of the Members of the Congress agree with him as to his, if I understand it, interpretation of this amendment. I want the gentleman to understand quite clearly that this gentleman does not agree with his interpretation and I assume there are quite a number of others that do not agree.

Mr. MARRIOTT. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

The ancient debating theorum that passion and reason are inversely proportionate is holding true here this afternoon. To understand that comment better, you should know that the State of Nebraska, in relatively recent years, passed a law that prohibited flatly the exportation of any water from that State, without the borders of that State for any reason whatsoever.

That statute was taken to the U.S. Supreme Court which held in these words: "It was an impermissible burden on interstate commerce."

That decision of the U.S. Supreme Court was correct in every respect. And it is ironic here today that having brought about a piece of legislation which seeks to deal with the problems inherent in that decision that the wrath of people, particularly I might say from Nebraska, is directed against the provision which goes precisely to the issue of correcting Nebraska's capriciousness in passing that statute in the first place.

Mr. BEREUTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McNULTY. With pleasure.

Mr. BEREUTER. I would ask the gentleman if he has read the Supreme Court case, the Sporhase case?

Mr. McNULTY. I have indeed.

Mr. BEREUTER. Would the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McNULTY. I would be happy to.

Mr. BEREUTER. I would like to say to the gentleman that I have read it as well. I happen to know the Sporhase family and their effort to move water across Dundy County line to their own property in Colorado.

The Supreme Court says rather directly to Nebraska:

> Here are the legislative remedies available to you. Here are all the type of statutory changes that may meet the test for you to forbid exportation of your water. But your state legislative body has not yet provided those provisions.

Mr. McNULTY. Right.

Mr. BEREUTER. But it does not suggest, I hope the gentleman would agree, that that is an insoluble situation. It does not suggest, as earlier suggested by a Member of this body, that in Sporhase what the Supreme Court has said is the last word on a State's ability to control the exportation of its water resources. In fact, it gives very specific directions to the State legislative body.

I would ask the gentleman if he would agree with that interpretation.

Mr. McNULTY. No, I do not agree with that interpretation. In fact, what the Supreme Court did say was that in the absence of some delegation of power or authority to do that, and absent some valid reason to do it rather than a capricious total restraint against the exportation of water, the Nebraska statute was invalid and rightly so.

Now, having been given by the language of the Supreme Court language that tells us or tells you, perhaps, in Nebraska how you may more accurately deal with that situation, and now having before you a bill which incorporates the suggestion gratuitously made by the Supreme Court, it does not make sense to me that Nebraska is arguing against having put in place precisely the authority it should have had in the first place before it adopted that statute.

Mr. BEREUTER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McNULTY. I do.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. The Supreme Court of the United States did not suggest anything having to do with the commerce clause because that is, of course, outside the capacity of the unicameral legislature of the State of Nebraska to address. That is a decision that can only be made here.

Mr. McNULTY. Is it not true the Supreme Court said it was "an impermissible burden on interstate commerce," almost in those words? Does that not tell you something?

Mr. BEREUTER. That is not the full extent, if the gentleman would yield, of what it says. In fact, it said you have not prescribed in statutory language the sufficient language to indicate why water should not be exported, so go back and do it.

Mr. McNULTY. Right.

Mr. BEREUTER. But that really has nothing to do with the situation here today with respect to the commerce clause. It is not relevant to whether or not the Congress is going to delegate responsibilities to the States in order to protect the water for States of origin.

Mr. McNULTY. But reclaiming my time, this bill makes it clear that a State may make the decision, has the power under interstate commerce authority to allow water under some circumstances to leave the State, and in presenting a valid reason, therefore, while it does that, it simultaneously gives every State from which this water might be exported the authority to refuse to export so much as a gallon of it.

So this amendment is, and has rightly been described as a killer amendment in the spirit of those who want to stop the world and get off. And we ought not to yield to these Luddite sympathies. You remember the folks 170 years ago who on seeing a new weaving machine come into being which would allow people to weave better cloth, and faster, decided the reaction to that should be to destroy the machine. And it is in that spirit that unintentionally perhaps most of these amendments have been offered.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment has to be viewed as the 100 some amendments that Congress is going to look at with regard to this, and that is the question of whether or not we are going to put into place the technology that can deliver energy at a very efficient cost to the American people.

The cost of energy has absolutely devastated the American public. In my own State of Florida we have to bring the coal a long way down the peninsula, particularly when you get into south Florida.

Electric costs are extremely high. This is really a consumer bill. I think the question is whether or not we are going to allow the technology to advance to the degree that it can.

If we are serious about it, and I think the gentleman from Utah properly pointed it out, if we are serious about protecting the rights of the consumer, and this is a railroad versus consumer bill, there is no question about it, we are going to vote down this amendment and we are going to vote down further amendments because the question is simply this: Are we going to put in place this type of technology for the American consumer?

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise reluctantly because I think the intent of this amendment is a good one. I do not think there is any question that there has to be some kind of understanding of how we are going to resolve this issue each and every time that the utilization of water within any State is debated.

There are going to be more debates in the future just as there have been in the past. I think each and every time one of these issues arises we are going to have to rely upon the States to work them out.

The problem I have with the amendment is that it goes to the very heart of how we are going to resolve the issues. The Vento amendment would put a State like South Dakota at the mercy of any State at any time before making a determination on how to use its water.

On page 5 of the bill I think there is a very important feature without which I would have to vote against the entire bill. It says:

> Nothing in this Act or any amendment made by this Act shall alter the rights of any State to its apportioned share of the waters of any body of surface or ground water.

This amendment deletes the impact of that provision. I do not think there is any question but that we jeopardize the apportioned share of each State, were it not for this particular provision in the bill. To delete it, as the Vento amendment would do, would detrimentally affect not only South Dakota, but every State with immense interest in its water allocation.

It is also too narrowly defined. There ought to be a broader scope if we are going to take into account all of the matters confronting the States in the way we contend with water. That scope cannot be limited to pipelines alone in seeking a broad consensus among States affected.

If it is veto powers, we support, then we are 30 years too late. South Dakota would have loved veto power when the whole issue of flood control was taken into account back then.

As a matter of fact, as a result of those flood control provisions of the Pick-Sloan plan South Dakota has had to accept six main stem dams. And that, according to the Corps of Engineers, has resulted in a $1.65 billion savings in avoided flood damage for all of the downstream States since the dams were built.

We also should have had veto when this country developed hydroelectric power. Hydroelectric power generated from these dams just in this fiscal year 1980 provided Nebraska with 23.5 percent of all of its power, Minnesota with 29.4 percent of its power, Montana and North Dakota with 15.3 percent of its power.

The point here is that in each and every one of these cases there has been a regional interest. South Dakota should have attempted to veto the favorable impact that each and every one of these benefits have had. But we did not. We could not. And all of our neighbors has benefited as a result.

Now, that South Dakota is to be compensated, a veto ought not be given any State in the allocation of our water.

We have to consult, we have to negotiate. There is little that we gain through interstate contamination.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DASCHLE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's concerns and I sincerely understand what he is saying.

Of course, his State has a unique problem insofar as the administration in that State which has sought the right to sell vast quantities of water in a commitment for that purpose. And it really I think has brought on a great deal of concern that all of us have.

I point out to the gentleman in terms of the apportioned share issue, there is not a judicial determination of that. In many cases we know that some of the informal agreements such as the Colorado River has appropriated over 100 percent of the water.

In those cases you are going to run into conflict.

I would just tell the gentleman to look also not at page 5 but clause 3 and 4 of that same section and finally look at the top of page 6 stating that this overrides any and all other concerns.

I think the gentleman will find that the substance of this is to provide the State of origin with a very unique right for coal slurry only.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman give me one example of a situation in any selected body whereby we require unanimity before a decision can be made?

I do not care whether it is the city council, a county commission, or the U.S. Congress, there is no body where we require unanimity.

Yet that is really the thrust of this amendment. It requires unanimity before any State can allocate any of its water, as we appropriated under the apportioned share provision of page 5 of the bill.

Mr. VENTO. If the gentleman will yield further, I would anticipate in many cases there may be compacts that could agree, that the amendment would in fact not require a reinvention of the wheel in this particular instance.

That is an amendment that we placed in the bill.

In addition to that, I do not know of any other commodity that has the importance or uniqueness in terms of water.

Mr. DASCHLE. If I may reclaim my time, that really does not answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman (Mr. DASCHLE) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DASCHLE was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. DASCHLE. The fact of the matter is, as I said at the beginning, as well intentioned as this amendment is it goes beyond what we expect of any other governing body in that it requires unanimity, unanimous consent on the part of all States affected before any State can use its apportioned share. That may not be the intent of this amendment, but that is what it does. I think it is a poorly constructed amendment and goes way beyond the thrust of what we ought to be doing in this bill.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BEREUTER. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that following the 5 minutes already allocated to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER), all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close at 3:40 p.m.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

Hearing none, all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto will end at 3:40 p.m.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I could not get to the microphone.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Was the gentleman on his feet at the time?

Mr. BEDELL. Yes, I was, Mr. Chairman. I was trying to get to the microphone.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman reserves the right to object?

Mr. BEDELL. Yes, I do.

Mr. Chairman, I have been standing here ever since this debate began, just as the gentleman from Nebraska has. There has only been one speaker who is not a member of either one of the two committees. I would appreciate it if we can be given some assurance of a time that we would be permitted to have. This was originally my bill, which I introduced, and I would have great difficulty if they are going to shut it off so that we do not have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. UDALL. I recognize the dilemma the gentleman has, Mr. Chairman. I want to have a fair debate. But the House rules are conducted with precedents so that we can work these things out.

The gentleman sees the number of Members standing. It is quite likely the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL) will have in a very short time 3, 4, or 5 minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. Continuing with my reservation, Mr. Chairman I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, by way of a parliamentary inquiry, would it be possible for the gentleman from Arizona to amend that request to include 5 minutes for the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL) who is raising the issue?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. It would be in order for the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) to do so if he wishes.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BEDELL. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. UDALL. Will the gentleman restate his inquiry?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I would request that the gentleman from Arizona amend his request so as to reserve 5 minutes of the additional time for Mr. BEDELL.

Mr. UDALL. The gentleman from Minnesota or the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL).

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I make that request.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona? Hearing none, all debate on this bill will be ended and all amendments thereto will be over at 3:40 with the understanding that the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL) will have 5 minutes of that time.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. EDGAR. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, would the Chairman clarify what he means? Does he mean the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The amendment.

Mr. EDGAR. Not the whole bill?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. All time will expire at 3:40 on this amendment and all amendments thereto.

Mr. UDALL. The pending amendment and all amendments thereto.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, could we make it 3:45?

We have spent 5 minutes debating the unanimous consent request.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBERSTAR. I yield to the committee chairman.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise the request to make it 3:45.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL)? The request is that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto end at 3:45 with the understanding that the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL) has 5 minutes of that time.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER) has 5 minutes, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman.

□ 1520

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I would first like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT). And I would say that I have no apology to the body, but I would hope they would understand that on an issue as important as this, the most important issue to my constituents in the 5 years that I have served here, certainly caused some irritation to occur in this Member's voice a few minutes ago when it appeared I might be denied adequate time by the imposition of a time limit on debate for the Vento amendment.

It is not always illuminating to hear the debate in this body, but it is interesting and it is imaginative to hear it.

One of the most imaginative arguments that I have heard occurred a few minutes ago, is that we ought not have the Federal Government tell us what to do with water. We ought to keep the Federal Government out of these State water matters.

And, of course, it is more likely that this Federal legislation will cause States, for their individual advantages, to sell interstate water for use outside the State, even outside an interstate river basin.

So I say let the States decide on how to use shared water through compacts, if such shared water is to be used outside these States. And therefore to make such a decision without dominance by the Federal Government.

Now the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SHUSTER), whose excellent arguments were then further refined further by the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. CRAIG), made some interesting points. This Vento amendment is a valid attempt to solve a problem and, I conclude that this bill is better with the Vento amendment than without.

But, indeed, I think it is impossible as the gentleman from Pennsylvania counsels, to "turn off that spigot" once it is turned on. I am undergoing a conversion here on the floor because that is the argument that I maintained the first 4 years when I was a member of the Interior Committee and later abandoned.

I know that we have an imaginative effort by the Wyoming delegation in both bodies and by others to find a way to protect the rights of States of origin. But, in fact, I would remind the gentleman representing the Mountain States and the Northern Great Plains that by apportionment of this House there is only one Member from South Dakota, one Member from North Dakota, one Member from Wyoming, and two from Montana, the likely sources of water for coal slurry pipelines in the immediate future. And while you may well have protected States of origin, not protecting those who are not States of origin, it is a simple matter, I am afraid, for the protections under the delegation of the Commerce clause authority given these States of origin to be denied in the future protections. This Vento amendment and others proposed by this Member are not killer amendments because the bill itself is fatally flawed.

Mention has already been made about the Sporhaus case from my home State.

And I would like to read from a July 27, 1982, CRS memo, entitled "Sporhaus v. Nebraska," as follows:

> However, the court found that the reciprocity provision operates as an explicit barrier to interstate commerce and that the States, therefore, bear the initial burden of demonstrating a close fit between the reciprocity requirement and the asserted local purpose.

This, the court held, Nebraska has failed to do in this instance. However, the court also indicated that "Reciprocity provisions, depending on their wording and the justifications offered in their defense, might survive constitutional scrutiny."

The gentleman from Arizona a few minutes ago tried to suggest that the Sporhaus case is really crucial and that there is some failure in Nebraska's Legislature to solve the problem and it, therefore, is ironic that this Member would be up speaking against this coal slurry pipeline legislation.

But in this general look at the Sporhaus case, you really have to recognize, in all fairness, I think, that this case is not relevant to protecting the interstate water resources of States that are not States of origin.

Now, much has been made of subsection 3 and subsection 4 under section 3 of this legislation. And the argument has been advanced that the States whose water might be affected by the sale of interstate water, be it surface or ground waters, have their recourse in the courts.

Now, I would ask, first of all, is it reasonable in every instance of a proposed interstate sale to make the affected States pursue their interests in the courts?

And second, what would the courts say if in fact they squarely addressed the issue? They would say in all probability, "Your interstate water resources either are or are not being damaged by this proposed interstate sale."

But I think it is unreasonable to expect that the courts would ever go so far as to actually apportion such interstate waters.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER) has expired.

The Chair would like to advise the Members of the allocation of the balance of the time.

The gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL) will be recognized for 5 minutes. The gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) will be recognized for 1 minute as will the following Members: Messrs. SHUSTER, HOWARD, OBERSTAR, VENTO, LUJAN, CHENEY, CLINGER, SNYDER, and Mrs. VUCANOVICH.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SHUSTER yielded his time to Mr. BEREUTER.)

Mr. BEREUTER. I am grateful to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SHUSTER) for yielding his time.

Mr. Chairman, the courts are unlikely to make that apportionment but tell the States to address that apportionment question by interstate compact. But that means that States that are willing to sell what is arguably interstate water have an incentive not to enter into an interstate compact. They will block such an effort. So there is not workable recourse for affected States in the courts.

And so we have a catch-22 situation. There really is no recourse to the States under the judicial system.

Finally, I would make this point. I know that some of my colleagues will ask why the major proponents of this bill, be as they are in some parts from the arid States of the West, would support this bill unless all the water issues were resolved. I just point out that many of these States have coal as well as water and that a great deal more revenue can be generated from the sale of coal in the short term than in any use of water into question.

I urge my colleagues to consider the impact of this use of water upon those States which are downstream of the mountain or Upper Great Plains States, upon those States which have no coal and which depend upon adequate flows from rivers which originate in those other States.

I would like to take this opportunity to review this serious issue for my colleagues.

As we began debate 2 weeks ago, the proponents of the bill spoke at great length of the protection which has been provided for the individual States. There may yet be some confusion as to the effects which passage of this measure would have upon those States downstream of the State which chooses to sell the large amounts of water which these coal slurry pipeline systems will require. Proponents will say that the water provisions in the bill do not in any way affect the existing water rights of the States relative to one another. They say that these are hold harmless provisions, that States are in the exact same position relative to one another as they were without the bill. Only in the strictest and most limited sense is that true. What the proponents of the bill do not say, however, is that passage of this bill will result in encouraging States to sell water which they share with other States for use in coal slurry pipelines, without consulting those other States which may be adversely affected. Passage of this bill will, in effect, place a Federal imprimatur upon interstate and interbasin transfers for coal slurry pipeline purposes, regardless of the effect which that usage will have upon other States which share that water source.

It is essential to point out that this bill, supposedly in an effort to protect the water rights of the States, delegates back to the State of origin the Commerce clause powers to govern the export of water. The practical effect of this action, however, will be to give a State which wishes to sell, for use outside that State, water which it shares with other States, the awesome advantage of Commerce clause power over other States which may be adversely affected. Does this Congress really want to bestow upon any one State such an unfair advantage over others with which it shares these resources? That is unfair and bad public policy.

The amendment offered will require the existence of a compact among affected States before interstate water can be transferred outside any State for use in these pipelines. Proponents of the coal slurry pipeline say that this approach does violence to the traditional water laws of this country, that the requirement for agreement among States which share scarce water resources is an unprecedented Federal action and without justification. Do they seriously believe that these issues are best resolved in suits among the States in Federal court, rather than by requiring agreement among the affected States? An impartial observer would surely say that this bill, as it stands, does a great deal more damage, in the long run, to the water rights of the individual States, and to interstate relations in general, than any amendment addressing the shared water question.

Proponents of the bill will also argue that adoption of a shared water amendment will give any State which shares that resource an absolute veto power over another State's decision to transfer water for that purpose. I would state clearly that it is not the intention of this Member, nor the gentleman from Minnesota, to subject each sale to the approval of the other compact States. Rather, it is intended that the compact process would make allocations of interstate water to each State, and that each State would then be entitled to dispose of all or part of that allocation in any manner which it desired, in accordance with the laws of that State and the wishes of its citizens. I repeat, each and every transaction would not be subjected to the approval of the compact States. Transfers would be made from each individual State's allocation, freely arrived at by agreement among the States which share that resource.

Proponents of the bill will talk in terms of a State's right to dispose of the water which it controls. That statement does not answer the question of the rights of other States to that water. A more basic question must be addressed. Should we give each State an unqualified right to dispose of unlimited quantities of water to which it has access, regardless of the legitimate rights and needs of other States with which it shares that resource? It seems clear to me that sound public policy would require an agreement among all those States.

Finally, proponents of this legislation would have Members believe that adoption of a shared water amendment would give other States a veto power over intrastate water uses for whatever purpose. A recently circulated Dear Colleague questions whether you would help to establish a major precedent which will in time allow States which neighbor your State * * * to exercise a veto over your State's use of water for industrial, municipal, agricultural, or recreational purposes? That is clearly not the issue embodied in the present debate. I would stress that the amendment which is now offered only governs interstate tranfers, for coal pipeline purposes. The decisions of individual States as to the best use of water, for whatever purpose, within that State, will remain unfettered.

Let us preserve the water rights of the States, as they stand, but let us not give any one State the right to exercise the awesome Commerce clause power delegated to it by the Congress in this bill, to the serious long-term disadvantage of other States with which it shares water. Make no mistake about it, that will be the effect of this bill, unless we adopt an amendment like the one offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO).

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL).

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, this amendment originated as a bill which I introduced some long time ago because of concern I had over the sale of water by South Dakota to an ETSI pipeline.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to give credit to the gentleman. Certainly his help and support and his initial sponsorship, as well as the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER), have been immensely helpful in terms of dealing with this. I think they deserve a great deal of credit for any success it has had.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, let me say that I think this amendment is significantly better than the bill that I introduced thanks to the gentleman from South Dakota (Mr. DASCHLE). He brought up an objection over the fact that the original bill had a clause that said each State must individually agree to each sale of water. This amendment has been changed. This amendment simply requires that there be a compact among the affected States which would authorize such sales of water.

The big difficulty we have is deciding who owns the water. And apparently the argument here would be by some Members that as the water flows through their State it belongs to that State as it flows through the State. At least in this gentleman's opinion that is not the situation.

In this gentleman's opinion, water that starts upstream, flows down through several States, is not the property of a State as calling it its water as it comes through those States. This amendment simply says that that water that flows through those States, there shall be a compact which agrees as to how that water is to be sold if it is sold outside that State for a coal slurry pipeline.

We should make something clear. Somebody mentioned irrigation. This has nothing to do with irrigation. First of all, it has been complained that it did not have to do with irrigation. And, second, I would hope we would understand that this leaves the complete freedom of a State to use that water in that State, within its State, according to its wishes, and it does not adversely affect that in any way.

You see, the problem we get into, if we are not going to do anything as a Congress here to try to bring some regulation and some sense as to how we use the water, is that Montana has already said, "Look, if South Dakota is going to sell the water out of the river to get revenues from South Dakota, then we better sell it first, and we better do the selling," and it will constantly move in that direction.

If we are going to avoid those types of difficulties, I submit that we need a compact between the affected States, and I submit that that can be accomplished.

People have said, "If you turn on the spigot, you cannot turn it off." That is all the more point as to why we at this time should recognize the problem and why we should legislate that Congress says that indeed we should approach this in a sensible, sensible manner.

It seems to me that all the more the fact that it is difficult to do says, "Let us get at it now, let us get at it now and try to legislate something that will say that we are going to treat this water as a shared resource of interstate commerce, as indeed it is, so that indeed there will be a compact that will determine how that should be shared."

It seems to me that it is only proper that the States that share and use that water should make that decision, and I certainly urge support for the amendment.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. LUJAN and Mrs. VUCANOVICH yield their time to Mr. CHENEY.)

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. CHENEY).

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CLINGER yielded the balance of his time to Mr. CHENEY.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. CHENEY) for 4 minutes.

Mr. CHENEY. I thank my colleagues for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, let me try to conclude this debate with a few minutes of comments on the water law.

A number of charges and comments have been made. I know my colleagues are all deeply concerned about the issue on both sides of the issue, whether for or against coal slurry.

Let me simply restate again the desire of those of us who crafted the language that is in the bill as it relates to water.

I personally am not here today to advocate coal slurry lines or to oppose coal slurry lines for Wyoming. I am here today to advocate the rights of the State of Wyoming, specifically the Governor and the legislature, to make that decision. They may choose to grant, as they have in the past, to export permits for a coal slurry line, they may choose to impose conditions on that, they may choose to prohibit the export of water for a coal slurry pipeline. Under existing law, before this bill is passed, as a result of the Supreme Court decision in Sporhause, they cannot do that. Wyoming today no longer has the right to prohibit or limit or condition the export of water for coal slurry unless we pass this bill and the language that is in it.

Specifically, the bill does grant under the commerce clause of the Constitution the right to States to regulate water in coal slurry pipelines as an item of interstate commerce. And I would quote from the decision of the Supreme Court in Southern Pacific against Arizona, 1948:

> Congress has undoubted power to redefine the distribution of power over interstate commerce. It may either permit the States to regulate the commerce in a manner which would otherwise not be permissible . . .

This is precisely what we are doing here today. I think it is extremely important for my collegues to understand that if you believe in the States right to decide whether or not there ought to be a slurry line, whether or not to impose conditions on the export of water, conditions under which slurry lines are to operate, then you ought to support the water language in the bill as drafted. If you support States rights, then you should oppose the Vento amendment, the amendment pending before the House, because it does in fact mandate for the first time ever participation in interstate compacts for particular water use.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENEY. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAUX. I will ask the gentleman, is there anything in the bill that would restrict or limit or prevent any State from forming an interstate compact in order to regulate how water is handled that passes through their particular State?

Mr. CHENEY. There is absolutely nothing in the bill that would impose such a restriction. The bill grants the right to States significant authority over water that is theirs, in effect, under appropriation. It does not grant authority over water to any State that they do not currently have in terms of the quantity of water that is available to them, in terms of allocation.

When in doubt, read the bill. The bill is very precise. It is very clear. It does support the basic fundamental principle that I think most of us believe in that the States ought to have the right to decide how their water is used, and it is consistent with existing practices in terms of allocating share of a body of water.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) for 2 minutes.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the pending water rights amendment, not to make the coal slurry pipeline bill any more platable, because it does not, but because it is marginally better than the language in section 3(1) of the pending bill. But mostly because I think we ought to debate and establish the principle that States rights in water ought to be protected by the Congress of any legislation that is so broadbased and so far reaching as the pending coal slurry pipeline bill.

This pending amendment is marginally preferable to the language in the bill, but it still leaves some very grave questions unanswered.

The Great Lakes Commission, in a letter of September 12, wrote to me:

> Provisions of the coal slurry pipeline bill are inadequate to protect Great Lakes States riparian rights to Great Lakes water.

The group of States that has the most at stake, where one-fifth of the world's fresh water is located, still are uneasy, not only are they uneasy, but they are opposed to the bill in its present form because of the threat that it presents to the water in that greatest body of fresh water in the entire world.

The question that we all have to ask ourselves is: Do we want to take the risk of proceeding with legislation that may be unconstitutional, that experts in testimony before the House Public Works Committee hearings on this legislation said was unconstitutional, and who have stated that Congress cannot through legislation alter the constitutional principle of equal footing of the States?

Now, that is a very serious matter. We cannot ignore the dictates of the Constitution in legislation and say, "Well, we will leave it up to the Supreme Court to rule on it later on." We have that responsibility, too, and the pending legislation does not meet that constitutional test nor the test of protecting water rights, and ought to be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO).

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I want to rise and summarize. I think what we are faced with here today, of course, is a difficult problem in which this legislation attempts to enshrine on a pedestal the use of water for coal slurry lines and enshrines States rights to say yes or to say no with respect to that.

But what we do not have is the necessary cooperation or even the realization or understanding that the use of surface water or the water from an aquifer very well overlaps and affects all States. I know that water rights is a very sensitive issue because primarily they have dealt with life and death issues, not necessarily on the industrial basis such as a coal slurry line, but with respect to the fact that there is a problem with the Constitution. This bill is creating a further problem in terms of the use for coal slurry purposes. And then, of course, it says that then we suggest that we have to solve it. Well, it creates the problem, and there is one way to eliminate the total problem if that is it. This amendment is a modest attempt to provide for shared use of water by the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, just two or three points. This is a bad amendment, it is a killer amendment. The opponents for the last 5 years have tried to beat the bill. If they cannot beat the bill, they try to make it unworkable. The precise wording of this amendment before us says that any State in the river basin or drainage basin can turn and say to sister States, "We veto." Unless they will voluntarily go in and enter into an interstate compact and all of them sign, there is no water for a coal slurry.

On this bill mention was made that we got beat in 1978. Since 1978 a lot of people have seen the light, including the Redi Kilowatt, the whole electric generating industry, American Public Power, the Consumer Federation, the Coal Association, the Reagan administration came around this year and suports it, and I cannot find any editorial, including the Wall Street Journal or the Journal of Commerce and the others, who think that defeating this bill would be a good idea.

This simply makes coal slurry pipelines available as one new kind of technology that we can use if it competes in the marketplace. That is all that this bill started out to do. It is all the bill does. This amendment will defeat that very purpose.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment. Mr. VENTO has offered an amendment which I feel is essential to protect the water resources that underpin the economy of our region.

The water issue is not one that should be confined to those of us who represent the region. The columnist, George Will, said recently that the politician of tomorrow had better learn to pronounce Ogallala Aquifer and Oahe Reservoir because those names are going to figure prominently in the political dialog in years to come.

For States like Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, and Missouri the issue is not confined to the agreements contained in this legislation. We are dependent upon water supplies that cross State lines. Just as we would be forced to stop one State that threatened to pollute the water supply that makes much of our State arable we are equally threatened by those States who would seek to sell the water from a common supply.

For those of you from oil producing States I submit this is the equivalent of one State digging a well so deep that the oil that would be diverted from its normal production source in another State. In Nebraska we are at the mercy of interstate water supplies and the amendment offered by Mr. BEREUTER seeks only to require that before States convert to their exclusive use resources obtained from an interstate source they obtain the written agreement of the affected States.

As one who recognizes the opportunity for our Nation to export coal and who appreciates the great economic benefit that this would mean for all I would remind this body that we would threaten this Nation's most important and vital exporting sector—agriculture.

Mr. VENTO's amendment is not designed to devastate the coal slurry industry it is intended only to protect a shared resource vital not only to our region but all those consumers who are dependent upon the Nation's agricultural community.

Certainly the coal slurry industry is not so important that we should place above it the prospect of ruining hundreds of thousands of acres of farmland. Just what would we do with the dollars earned from the incremental addition to exports that coal slurry might provide—buy food from other countries to replace our lost crops?

Mr. Chairman I have set through the meetings in both the Surface Transportation Subcommittee and the full Public Works Committee on this matter. And while I was originally inclined to oppose coal slurry because I believed it would be detrimental to the future supply of water for agricultural uses I learned a great deal more.

For instance, we are talking about moving from one part of the country to another not just millions of tons of coal but millions of gallons of water. And not fresh drinking water but water intermixed with coal and thousands of other substances to be deposited in an yet unknown and untested process. The potential for environmental harm is incalculable. As a Member who has witnessed many debates on this floor where Members from both sides of the aisle eagerly sought to demonstrate their fealty to the environmental movement regardless of the extent or possibility of harm and in face of obvious and known economic dislocation I am frankly astounded that today many of those same Members are willing to stand and vote for an untested, unneeded, and unstable mechanism whose potential for environmental havoc is vast.

Much has been said about the railroad industry in this debate. The simple fact is that just recently this House voted to rescue the Railroad Retirement Fund at a very large cost to the taxpayers. Now we are on the verge of turning around and delivering a sharp body blow not only to the retirement system but to the ability of that industry to haul agricultural products at a cost that will keep those goods affordable to the domestic consumer or the foreign buyer.

I do not come from a coal-producing State. As far as I know the nearest coal mine is somewhere in southern Iowa but I have been impressed with the arguments of those who do represent coal producers. This bill is not intended to assist the entire domestic coal industry but a small portion of it and at a very dear cost. As in many industries the fact that transportation is widely available makes many marginal producers profitable. If this legislation is enacted and coal production is suddenly diverted to those regions where slurry transport is available a great many producers will be shut out because the railroads will have lost the opportunity to spread their cost over a very large market of producers.

Finally, I return again to the matter that interests me most. Water. When I mentioned Mr. Will's comments I was not attempting to intimidate any of my colleagues into opposing this legislation for fear that their vote would come back to haunt them politically.

But I do believe that what this body does today may come back to haunt each one of us personally. In the coming years we are going to have to make some very stark choices in the allocation of life-giving resources and water is No. 1 on this list. Immediately behind that precious resource is food. It is bad enough that we continue to ignore the future in this area but to act as we intend to today and provide for the wholesale abuse of that resource is a mistake that I sincerely believe will later be acknowledged as a grave mistake.

For that reason I urge the body to accept Mr. VENTO's amendment and failing that to oppose this measure.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 3857, the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983. After hearing hours of debate on the competing merits of either supporting or opposing this overall legislative proposal, the State water rights language contained in this bill coupled with the intent behind the language as developed in the accompanying Public Works Committee Report has led me to the conclusion that this bill could not be in the overall best interests of my district in west Texas.

Mr. Chairman, water is a scarce natural resource in the area that I represent. The largest community, in terms of population in my district is the city of El Paso, which is currently the fourth largest city in the State of Texas. Population and industrial growth in this locale is expected to continue into the 1990's at the present rapid rate. To provide adequate water supplies for this expected growth, the city of El Paso has begun to look for possible sources of future supplies of water to meet expected demands.

One such source is an aquifer just over the State boundary separating Texas and New Mexico. The problem that El Paso faced was a State embargo against all out-of-State transfers of water that New Mexico intended to rigidly enforce.

It was in this context that the United States Supreme Court rendered, in July 1982, the Sporhase against Nebraska decision which drastically affected the rights of States in allocating their water supplies. Basically, the Court ruled that water was an article of interstate commerce, making it subject to Federal and not State regulation. The court ruled further that Congress had not delegated this power away to the States by virtue of allowing the formation of interstate compacts regulating the transfer of interstate groundwater.

In January of this year, the city of El Paso and the State of New Mexico completed the first round of litigation over the right of access on the part of El Paso to water found in a New Mexico aquifer. In finding for the city of El Paso, a Federal District Court ruled that only the most compelling conservation rationale, such as the need to protect human health and safety, could ever justify a State statutory ban on water exports.

There is no mystery as to what this particular bill would do to the two Federal court rulings on State water rights. It is the blatant intent of coal slurry proponents to carve out an exception to the doctrine formulated in Sporhase and further articulated in The city of El Paso against Reynolds. In this attempt to restore to the States that certain power denied them by the above decisions, the rights of the city of El Paso could very easily be cast into doubt as this decision is appealed by the State of New Mexico.

Under this bill, should the State of New Mexico ever become the point of origin for a coal slurry pipeline, New Mexico would be empowered to divert water—possibly water that could go to the people of El Paso—and there would be nothing to prevent that diversion. The very constitutional doctrine that now guarantees water for El Paso, the interstate commerce clause, would become a defense to the diversion of that water on the part of the State of origin. This bill would imbue the State of origin with all of the power of the interstate commerce clause, leaving El Paso and the State of Texas without a compelling interest to overcome the decision of a State like New Mexico, should it be the point of origin for a slurry pipeline, to divert water for slurry usage.

This predicament would be forced by all downstream States who find their sources of water being diverted for coal pipeline purposes. The proponents of coal slurry pipelines recognize this problem but only suggest, via language contained in the accompanying committee reports, that this problem be addressed by Congress at some later point in time.

Mr. Chairman, even assuming for argument's sake all of the reasons that have been advanced in support of this bill, the people of El Paso and west Texas did not send me to Congress to create the potential for additional water-related problems at some point in El Paso's future.

I am told that the chances of New Mexico ever becoming the State of origin for a coal slurry pipeline are slim. I have also been told that there are coal reserves adjacent to the Santa Fe area of that State which very well could be subject to eventual extraction. I am advised that the amount of water used by a coal slurry pipeline is miniscule and that El Paso's future needs should not be affected. I am not, however, guaranteed that no matter what the State of New Mexico does, my district's water needs will be assured. In fact, I am supposed to hope for the best and vote to strip away whatever constitutional protection is now afforded El Paso via current Federal case law.

Mr. Chairman, I refuse to gamble with the future water supplies of El Paso and the rest of west Texas simply to aid one industry in its competition with another—water is just too valuable a resource and my district's access to it must be zealously defended. For this reason, I am opposing this particular measure.

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a lot of evidence on both sides today for and against H.R. 1010, the coal slurry pipeline bill. We have been given a lot of facts, and glossy diagrams, and we have been told by both sides that our vote against their position would mean the downfall of our country. I do not believe that a vote either way would be the downhall of our great Nation, but what strikes me as most interesting and important in both my study of this issue, and the debate here today, is what is not being said.

I am referring to two of the issues that have received quite a lot of attention today, and they are the issue of water, and the issue of consumer benefits. In my attempts to thoroughly understand the Interior Committee's recommendations on water rights, I was told that if any water rights problems arose, the injured party, or parties, could just go to court. Now, Mr. Chairman, it strikes me as strange that since we can all predict of the problems that will arise over water rights, and indeed have already arisen, that we are not at least trying to address these problems. Why send everyone to court? Are not our courts overloaded enough already?

With regard to consumer benefits, I have been told that when the first pipeline goes on line in 1990, the average consumer will save less than 50 cents a month on their utility bill. That is $6 a year, and while I do not want to downgrade the importance of any savings, however small, $6 a year hardly seems worth the risk the consumer is taking. What if there are cost overruns? There goes the consumers $6, and a whole lot more.

I intend to vote against H.R. 1010, and I hope that in the future such a vote will be recognized as a proconsumer, proenvironment, and proenergy vote, and one that takes into account our real needs and the realities of our energy situation.●

● Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 1010, the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983.

As others in this debate have pointed out, this is an issue that is vital to our national security, our energy self-sufficiency and the health of the economy. I would like to touch briefly on what I believe is key to the coal slurry debate—how coal slurry will benefit the consumer.

Energy consumers in my district have reaped the benefits of the only operating coal slurry pipeline—the Black Mesa Line—for the past 13 years. Black Mesa provides low cost, readily accessible coal to the Mojave Electric Generating Station at an average cost of $4 per ton. Comparable railroad delivery of the same coal would cost anywhere from $10 to $12 per ton. Needless to say, these savings are passed directly on to southern California Edison's 1.5 million consumers who depend on power supplied by the Mojave Station.

An even better example of the impact of coal slurry on transportation costs is the case of Arkansas Power & Lights' proposal to build a coal slurry line from Wyoming to Arkansas. It set off an intense fight between the railroads and pipeline backers that eventually drove coal transportation costs well below current market rates. So low, in fact, that consumers will save as much as $16.5 billion over the life of the contract. In the end, the railroad won out, and a coal slurry line will not be built. The winner, however, was clearly the consumer.

As a Representative from southern California, where water is notoriously scarce, I would like to add that I am more than satisfied with the water language of the bill. I am also satisfied that construction of coal slurry pipelines will not, in any way, ruin the railroads or cost railroad employees their jobs. If anything, coal slurry will increase production of coal and the demand for coal transportation. Jobs will be created—not lost—both through the construction of pipelines and through the anticipated increase in rail traffic.

In short, Mr. Chairman, coal slurry pipelines will benefit the consumer. For the millions of individuals who are already hard pressed by increases in gas an oil prices, the last thing we should do is defeat this bill and remove any hope of promoting fair maret competition to keep electric utility costs in line.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting H.R. 1010.●

● Mr. BOUCHER. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in opposition to H.R. 1010, the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983, and I urge my colleagues to oppose this measure which if enacted will jeopardize the marketing opportunities of Virginia's coal producers.

As the representative of Virginia's coal-producing region, I am vitally interested in measures which will increase coal production and aid in reemploying our thousands of idle coal miners. Proponents of H.R. 1010 argue that this measure will meet those objectives on a national basis; however, the measure would substantially hinder the achievement of those goals in the State of Virginia.

In fact, H.R. 1010 will disrupt traditional coal markets by benefiting a few select producers at the expense of many others. Of particular concern to this Member is the fact that only 10 percent of the finite volume of pipelines constructed pursuant to the Federal eminent domain authority will be reserved for small producers. The principal argument in support of Federal pipeline legislation is that competition in coal transportation will result in a lowering of transportation costs. While that result may be achieved for large producers who have the financial strength to make long-term contract commitments, it is clear that passage of the legislation will result in increased rail transportation rates for producers not served by the pipeline. It is all too apparent that railroads will seek to recoup the revenues they lose on routes also served by a pipeline by increasing their charges to producers who do not enjoy the benefits of the pipeline. In the final analysis, passage of the legislation will clearly result in higher charges for the thousands of small producers who will not have pipeline access.

The Federal condemnation authority granted in H.R. 1010 could be used solely for the construction of interstate pipelines, and any pipeline constructed under the act which crosses my State of Virginia would necessarily originate outside of its borders. Moreover, Virginia's coal producers would be denied access to the pipeline as it crosses from some other State into Virginia. The market presently enjoyed by Virginia producers would be usurped, in part, by producers, in other States as coal from Kentucky, West Virginia, or even from Western States is transported by the pipeline to Virginia's industries, utilities, and ports. Our coal-producing counties which are presently experiencing their deepest recession in more than 30 years would be dealt another devastating round of economic disruptions.

The Virginia General Assembly is presently considering State legislation to authorize the exercise of the eminent domain authority for the construction of purely intrastate coal slurry pipelines. In my view, the Virginia General Assembly is particularly well situated to evaluate the right of access problems I have previously mentioned and to assure that small producers are treated equitably in any legislation which may be forthcoming in the State of Virginia. State legislation in Virginia can far better serve the needs of Virginia's coal producers than can H.R. 1010, and I hope it will be the pleasure of this Chamber to defeat H.R. 1010.

My concerns with H.R. 1010 are well stated in the attached editorial by a leading newspaper of southwest Virginia, the Coalfield Progress. I would like to share this editoral, which reflects the position of many Virginia coal producers with my colleagues:

[From the Coalfield Progress, Sept. 20, 1983]

PIPELINE LEGISLATION NOT IN BEST INTEREST OF STATE

When Rep. Rick Boucher decided to fight the proposed federal coal slurry pipeline legislation, he proved his commitment to the people of Southwest Virginia.

Put aside, for the moment, the state-side debates that have come and gone and that will arise again when the Virginia General Assembly convenes. Forget the arguments among the railroads, the labor unions, the utility and the pipeline interests over such delicate issues as the pipeline's status as common carrier, its impact on employment, rail rates and water supply.

While those questions and others need close attention on both state and federal levels, the urgent issue in Virginia is unfolding right now in the halls of Congress. The issue is heading for a vote.

Slurry advocates and those sitting on the fence on the issues should—for the time being at any rate—focus on the federal legislation. As it is now written, it is apparent that the proposal is not in the overall of best interest of Virginia.

The measure grants federal powers of eminent domain to companies interested in building a coal slurry pipeline across state borders. It opens the way for a pipeline to originate in West Virginia or Kentucky, to take rights-of-way from Virginia property owners along the trail to the port of Hampton Roads and to transport nothing but coal from those states.

There is no provision that would guarantee Virginia coal operators the right of access to the pipeline. While large corporations with mineral holdings in other states seem insensitive to this concern, those without the luxury of mineral rights in bordering states have reason to fear the worst. They could face even higher rail rates if the railways needed to up costs to make up for revenue lost to the interstate pipeline.

The federal legislation obviously has serious economic implications for Virginia coal operators, their employees and the coalfields as a whole.

Virginia's representatives in Congress should join Boucher in his battle against the federal legislation.

Sen. John Warner has made his position clear in the past by voting against the measure. He should not steer from that course.

That leaves Sen. Paul Trible. At this point, Trible is noncommital. He needs to make up his mind and decide in favor of the people of the Virginia coalfields.●

● Mrs. HALL of Indiana, Mr. Chairman, the issue of coal slurry pipelines is of great importance to American consumers. I rise today to express my concern about the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983 (H.R. 3857) which, if enacted, would jeopardize over 40,000 jobs in the railroad industry and railroad suppliers nationwide. This includes the loss of over 1,500 jobs of people living and working in the First District of Indiana alone, and as its representative, I urge you to oppose enactment of this legislation.

It is important to note that those who mine coal, the United Coal Workers, and those who move coal are united in opposition to this legislation. They are joined by all the Nation's leading farm organizations, railway labor, environmentalists, water user organizations, and numerous other local and national groups. Even the coal industry itself is far from united on this issue.

H.R. 3857 is a complex measure with far-reaching implications for transportation, water resources, energy, environment, jobs, agriculture, consumer protection, regulation, competition, and relations among the States and between States and the Federal Government. But I believe the primary reasons H.R. 3857 should be defeated are its adverse impact on employment and water resources.

This legislation will result in a net loss of permanent jobs at the expense of creating short-term temporary construction jobs. There has been a 25-percent decrease in railroad employment over the past 2 years, and the Office of Technology Assessment has estimated that five pipelines would cost 16,000 jobs. Applying these figures to the present proposed construction of 13 coal slurry pipelines means an additional 39,000 permanent rail jobs will be lost.

Along with the loss of railroad jobs, the railroad retirement system now supporting thousands of rail retirees will be placed in jeopardy. This legislation will most assuredly counteract the additional revenue and benefit savings created by the measure Congress recently passed to save the railroad retirement system. I am deeply concerned that the rail worker and retiree will be the chief victims of this jobs destruction measure.

No aspect of the coal slurry debate has absorbed more time or evoked stronger emotion that the water question. Ground water supplies underlying the majority of the West and Midwestern States are depleting and competition for available surface flows is proportionately increasing. At a time when quantity and quality of supplies are at stake, I believe the poorest use of water is as a medium to transport coal in a one-directional system.

These are not the only problems regarding passage of this legislation. There has been a lack of information with regard to matters as potential ownership, control, and contracting relationships between utilities, pipelines, and producers of coal. Additionally, there has been a lack of proof that this technology will result in lowering transportation costs. In fact, the consumer appears to be vulnerable to all the market hazards associated with construction cost overruns and take-or-pay contracts.

This is the fifth consecutive Congress to consider legislation granting coal slurry pipeline companies Federal eminent domain powers. There has been a long debate on this issue, and the facts and arguments against coal slurry legislation are as valid today as they were in the previous sessions. After careful review and analysis, I cannot support this proposal and I urge my colleagues to defeat H.R. 3857.●

● Mr. OLIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the coal slurry bill. I do so because of really three reasons, and all of these relate to the fact that in my judgment really there is not overriding benefit to the Nation in granting eminent domain for this purpose.

We have heard a lot of the reasons. The first one, of course, related to the scarcity of water and the control of water, and I will not get into that.

The second relates to the question of the validity of the cost estimates that are really at the heart of the matter. I am not going to get into that in detail except to say this: I am an engineer, and I spent 35 years of my life in major project work of an electromechanical nature. I know that this is going to be an experiment, if it ever goes through, of a higher order of magnitude than presently experienced. It is going to involve the shipping of billions of tons of water to places that do not have it. It is going to involve unknown risks that normally engineers underestimate by factors of between 2 and 5.

I would like to mention the question of the hazards of the remaining waste. I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues a report by the Los Alamos National Laboratory a year ago dealing with the question of the toxicity of the waste.

Over a year ago, a panel of scientists there analyzed the residual chemical content of coal slurry effluents. Their examination covered surface water, ground waters, and effluents from a large number of disposal sites from coal preparation and cleaning plants. Their studies revealed that draining from coal slurry ponds associated with plants processing high-sulfur coal may pose a significant environmental problem because of the high acidity and concentrations of iron, manganese, nickel, and aluminum; that harmful and toxic elements remain in the water after the coal particles are removed. I will say this simply in layman's terms.

This means that coal slurry water can be distilled, filtered, the coal removed, all visible matter removed, and it looks like a glass of drinking water, but still this does not remove elements that are invisible and are still dissolved in the water. These constitute an unacceptable danger of toxicity.

The Los Alamos report makes it abundantly clear that this effluent must not be permitted to be mixed with the drinking water supplies either above ground or below ground that supply humans and animals; that coal slurry water has elements of slow poison in it.

It is very clear that postprocessing plants of some nature are going to be required, particularly at the termini involved with exports, where there is no other way to use up the water. We are going to have this water which cannot be disposed of in clear ponds. It is very clear that the question of toxic water in postslurry waste is real, it cannot be ignored, and until a satisfactory solution is found, the answer to the coal slurry legislation, in my view, is a solid "no."

Mr. Chairman, the results of this study also point out serious problems with the slurry waste solids generated in the attempts to treat the water. As I have mentioned, the tests found high levels of trace metals in the wastes which result in high levels of acidity in those wastes. Let me cite from the study:

The slurry effluent from the plant is very acidic, having a pH of 2.55. Before being discharged into the slurry pond, this waste is customarily neutralized. Accordingly, the pH of the slurry pond influent is neutral (7.1). However, the material taken from within the pond (three feet deep) near the inlet is again acidic (pH=3.33). Material taken from the surface at the other end of the same pond is also acidic (pH=4.37). Similar trends can be seen in the other slurry pond. Samples taken from the surface away from the inlet are acidic, and those taken from some depth within the slurry pond are even more so. The specific conductance of all these samples is high, reflecting the high dissolved salt contents of the samples.

Mr. Chairman, these results point to the potential for serious problems of leaching from these ponds to ground water supplies which may be the source of drinking water for nearby communities. This problem has not been solved and speaks strongly against the legislation.

Let me continue with the Los Alamos study:

The behavior of iron in the slurry waste filtrates is particularly interesting. Consider Plants 1 and 3. In the plant effluents, which are not neutralized, the iron concentrations are very high—364 ppm for Plant 1 and 1810 ppm for Plant 3. However, at the inlets to the slurry ponds the iron concentrations are low. This is because the slurry wastes are neutralized before being discharged. . . . As one moves the sampling point away from the inlet to the slurry pond, either in terms of distance, depth, or time, the iron concentration increases. In the case of Plant 1 the iron levels increase from 7.4 ppm at the pond inlet, to 180 ppm at the lower end of the active pond, to 811 ppm at the middle of an old slurry pond.

The report goes on to state, analogous behaviors were observed for manganese, cobalt, and nickel. The concentrations of these elements tend to follow those of iron and to correlate with the pH of the solution.

Mr. Chairman, we are all familiar with the environmental problems caused by acid runoff from coal waste piles. The Los Alamos study found that these environmental hazards are comparable in the slurry ponds:

The chemistry of the leachates from the slurry wastes is indistinguishable from that which we have observed in the past with coarse coal waste leachates. Potential environment problems associated with these wastes are caused by the high acidities of the waste effluents and high concentrations of iron, manganese, nickel and aluminum in the leachates.

It is incredible to me that we are actually considering dumping massive quantities of the wastes and their attendant environmental hazards on communities at the end points of these pipelines. Our understanding of the makeup of these wastes is only now beginning to be understood—and what we know about them points to major problems.

Since this problem has not been adequately addressed, I must also assume that the various cost estimates that we have seen for these pipelines are seriously understated. Handling these wastes is going to be expensive, especially given the very large quantities of the wastes that these communities are going to have to deal with.

Mr. Chairman, we have already heard so many good reasons for us to oppose this legislation. How many more do we need? Large numbers of jobs will be needlessly lost in the railroad industry; scarce water will be taken from our dry Western States; railroads use less energy in transporting coal than do coal slurry pipelines; and, the Arkansas Power & Light example shows us that delivered coal is cheaper using rail transportation than it is using a coal slurry pipeline.

Now Los Alamos is giving us a preview of the serious environmental damage we are likely to do if we permit these pipelines to go forward. Everything points to an obvious answer—we should defeat this foolish and detrimental legislation.●

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Chairman, I find all this concern about railroad rates rather confusing.

It is a fact that railroads now set prices for their services with substantially less regulatory interference than was the case in the recent past.

It is a fact that recent actions by the Interstate Commerce Commission would permit—remember that word "permit" it is important—would permit rather large increases in railroad coal rates.

It is also a fact that since the Staggers Act was signed railroads could have raised their coal rates very substantially.

Did they?

No they did not.

In the 30 months following enactment of Staggers, railroad coal rates rose about half as much as in the 30 months preceding enactment. They have not approached the kind of increases that would have been permitted under the ICC's implementation of the act.

Why not?

No one ever accused a railroad of harboring eleemosynary impulses. If they possess all the monopoly power that has been ascribed to them today—why have they not raised their rates right to the limit of the law?

They have not because they could not. They have been constrained by competition—competition from other railroads serving other mines—from other modes of transportation—from other forms of energy generation.

I am a subscriber to the old saw that if something looks like a duck, walks like a duck and quacks like a duck—it is a duck. But if it does not look like a duck or walk like one, or quack like one—it is not a duck.

Given the evidence to date, railroads do not look, move or sound like monopolies.

I do not think they have monopoly power.

I do not think we need to foster the development of water-guzzling, anticompetitive single-commodity coal slurry pipelines because some people claim to be afraid that railroads will—in some frightening future—do things that they have not done yet—things there is no reason to believe they will do.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to H.R. 3857 because I believe it represents a highly risky solution to a problem that does not now—and probably never will—exist.

To me it seems more reasonable to answer high rail rates with additional control over rail rates rather than spending $31 billion of consumers' money to support unwise take-or-pay contracts.●

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Chairman, "God did not make black rocks to go through pipelines. God made black rocks for men to lift and load."

As a strong advocate of increased coal use, I am pleased to hear of my colleagues concerns over the need to maintain the economics of this energy source. Unfortunately, the comments come within the context of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983.

Gentlemen, I welcome your concerns but you have chosen the wrong bill to make such a commendable stand. The majority of the Members from coal States do not support this bill. Rather, we ask that you come help us in our battle against discriminatory acid rain control legislation. Come help us with coal-port development. Come help us with coal conversions. And if you are really concerned over high railroad coal rates, come help us reform the Interstate Commerce Commisison's decision in its coal rate guidelines nationwide.

But do not seize upon the false promise of slurry pipelines to make your stand for economical coal use. Coal producers and users need relief today, not decades from now if coal pipelines are actually going to be build and if they represent lower transportation costs.

As one with an intense interest in coal production and use, I must oppose this legislation. I firmly believe it will create more ills than good from the standpoint of providing economical coal transportation and alleviating unemployment in the coalfields of this Nation.

The Congressional Budget Office, a trusted institution, has stated that "railroads may respond to the loss of coal transportation revenue by raising rates for coal and other commodities." CBO further noted that energy prices would increase for those utilities that continue to receive coal by rail.

Obviously, slurry pipelines would never serve the entire coal industry. As such, many coal producers would not have access to the pipelines and would still have to depend on rail transportation. Yet, there would be fewer producers sharing the cost of the railroads. These producers would find themselves shouldering the burden of others using the pipelines as the railroads increased rates to make up for traffic and revenue lost to the pipelines. This would result in higher electricity bills for customers of those coal-fired utilities not served by pipeline.

Those who produce this Nation's coal, the Mineworkers Union, do not support coal slurry pipeline legislation. This is a union with a 32 percent unemployment level. There is indeed misery in the hills and hollows of the Appalachian coalfields. I submit, however, that coal slurry pipelines would do nothing to alleviate this situation. They would hurt, rather than help, the majority of the coal industry.

What really concerns me from a policy standpoint is the propriety of taking an action which would create widespread unemployment among existing carriers. There are already 100,000 railroad workers on the unemployment rolls; 40,000 of this number have already exhausted their unemployment benefits.

Do not let anyone fool you. This is the biggest job elimination bill to ever hit the floor of this body. Coal production is not expected to increase dramatically for a number of years. Slurry pipelines would cut into existing railroad traffic. And if this occurs, the railroads would have to cut into their existing work force. All made possible by the bill being considered today.

If this legislation makes any promise, it is the promise of increased unemployment. If this legislation has a cost, it is the cost of gainful employment.

Mr. Chairman, the bottom line for me is that coal slurry pipelines will hurt, not help, the people I represent in the Appalachian coalfields. It is with those coal miners, those transportation workers and those consumers of coal-fired electricity that I will cast my vote against this bill.●

● Mr. EVANS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add my voice to those concerned over the legislation being considered today, H.R. 1010, the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983.

Unemployment and high utility rates are two problems which are of great concern to my constituents. While proponents of the coal slurry pipeline claim it will help solve these problems, I do not believe that this legislation will achieve this goal.

The 17th District of Illinois contains small coal miners, farmers, and railroad employees—three groups which will all be hurt if the coal slurry pipelines are constructed. More coal will be produced if the pipelines are built, but it will be the western miners, not the miners of Illinois or West Virginia, who will be the big winners if this bill is passed.

Illinois farmers, already hurt by the effects of this summer's drought, will also be hurt if these pipelines are built. The water issues surrounding the construction of the pipelines are not of great concern to the farmers of the Midwest. But midwestern farmers are concerned that the pipelines may cut across thousands of acres of prime farmland. They are also concerned that they will be forced to pay higher transportation costs from the revenues lost by the railroad due to pipeline competition.

I am also deeply concerned over the impact this bill will have on railroad employment. During our consideration of the railroad retirement bill, we became aware of the tremendous number of railroad workers who are currently unemployed and the continuing decline of employment opportunities in the railroad industry.

The coal slurry pipeline is being hailed as a jobs bill, and it is expected to create thousands of jobs, primarily in the building and construction industries. But is also estimated to cost 40,000, or even more, jobs in the railroad industry.

We certainly will not solve our Nation's unemployment problem by hiring one group of people while shoving an equal number out on the street.

Coal slurry pipeline supporters claim it is a consumer bill. Electric rates will fall, they say, when railroads are forced to compete with pipelines for coal transport business. But no one is providing any guarantees that pipelines will be able to transport coal at a lower cost than railroads, and consumers may well see their electric bills rise if the utilities are permitted to pass-through pipeline construction costs to consumers and pipelines are locked into expensive take-or-pay contracts.

Finally, this legislation does not adequately answer certain environmental questions concerning the handling of water contaminated by the pipelines. No one knows what unforeseen adverse effects these pipelines will have on our farmland, rivers, forests, and wildlife.

Too many unanswered questions regarding the pipelines still remain. We should not give our blessing to any bill, no matter how well intentioned, which carries such a high price tag for many industries, consumers, and our environment. I therefore urge my colleagues to give very careful considertion to this bill and join me in voting against it.●

● Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 1010, the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983. My objections to the bill are not based on opposition to coal slurry pipelines, but rather to Federal involvement in coal slurry pipelines.

Past experience with the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline should have taught us something. Members of Congress were told when the Alaska natural gas pipeline was first conceived that it would be built by the private sector with funds provided by the pipeline developers and that the Federal Government would not have to be involved and that no cost would be borne by the consumers. But in 1981, backers of that pipeline came back to Congress, hat in hand, to ask permission to prebill consumers for the construction of the Alaska natural gas pipeline. Some calculated that billions could be pulled from consumers and transferred to the developers even though the line might never be finished.

That type of "corporate welfare" is exactly what we need to avoid. The soothing assurances that I have received about how that would never happen with the coal slurry pipelines remind me of the assurances Congress received about the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline. The record of that sordid transition was developed capably by the media when they found that Republican lobbyists were heavily involved and that considerable sums were paid to Democratic Party organizations just before the vote.

Another of my main concerns about H.R. 1010 is the granting of Federal eminent domain to private corporations that will not serve as common carriers. The power of Federal eminent domain is not to be taken lightly. It is true that those powers have been granted in the past to railroads, natural gas pipelines, and briefly to oil pipelines.

But, I do not believe the need has been shown for the granting of Federal eminent domain for coal slurry pipelines.

I have been encouraged by the progress made by the ETSI pipeline, which has now obtained nearly all of the rights-of-way needed without any Federal eminent domain authority. It has been a long and expensive process, and the railroads cannot be proud of their obstructionist tactics. But ETSI has worked with private landowners and individual States in securing their rights-of-way, and I believe that is the proper procedure for the coal slurry pipelines.

Another concern I have about H.R. 1010 involves State water laws. H.R. 1010 sets a precedent about the rights of individual States over the use of water that flows through their States, and I do not believe the precedent is a good one.

For that reason, I strongly support the amendment that will be offered by Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT to prohibit the interstate transportation of water unless there is a water compact between the States involved in the water transfer, and the States involved in the compact agree with such a transfer.

Again, I am not opposed to the private construction of coal slurry pipelines. But I do not believe the Federal Government should be involved in this process. For that reason, I urge the defeat of H.R. 1010.●

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO).

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BERMAN and Mr. DIXON changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

Messrs. GLICKMAN, TRAXLER, and WHITTAKER changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE CHAIRMAN PRO TEMPORE

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair would announce that there are 91 amendments pending to this bill, and the sooner the House is in order, the sooner we can get on with the amendments.

□ 1600

Are there further amendments to the bill? If not, the question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY) having assumed the chair, Mr. BARNARD, Chairman pro tempore of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 1010) to amend the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920 with respect to the movement of coal, including the movement of coal over public lands, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 309, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. SNYDER

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SNYDER moves to recommit the bill, H.R. 1010, to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 182, nays 235, not voting 16, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Vandergriff for, with Mr. Harrison against.

Mr. Hopkins for, with Mr. Hartnett against.

Mr. Brooks for, with Mr. Corcoran against.

Mrs. COLLINS and Mr. SAVAGE changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. McKERNAN changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the bill was not passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I could not hear. Was the motion to reconsider laid on the table?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I inadvertently was off the floor when the vote on the final passage of H.R. 1010, the coal slurry legislation, was taken. Had I been present, I would have voted in opposition to the final passage of that legislation.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material based on the debate which was just concluded on H.R. 1010.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON RULES TO FILE CERTAIN PRIVILEGED REPORTS

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight, September 27, to file certain privileged reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

□ 1620

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would just inquire of the gentleman: Has this been cleared with the minority?

Mr. MOAKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENNY SMITH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, this request has been discussed with the House leadership on both sides of the aisle and with representatives of the minority from our committee. I am advised that there is no objection.

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT, ENERGY, AND NATURAL RESOURCES OF COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS TO SIT TOMORROW, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1983, DURING 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Environment, Energy, and Natural Resources of the Committee on Government Operations be permitted to sit while the House is reading for amendment under the 5-minute rule on Wednesday, September 28, 1983.

The minority has been advised of the request and it is my understanding that they have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS TO FILE REPORT ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 364

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs may have until midnight tonight, September 27, 1983, to file a report on House Joint Resolution 364.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 3263, MILITARY CONSTRUCTION APPROPRIATIONS, 1984

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 3263) making appropriations for military construction for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the conference report is considered as having been read.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of September 22, 1983.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HEFNER) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. REGULA) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HEFNER).

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank the subcommittee for being a very bipartisan committee which worked very hard on this particular bill. I would like to thank the staff and the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. REGULA), and the conferees who worked very hard to bring to this body a conference report which we think is worthy of the support of this body.

Mr. Speaker, we are presenting today the conference report on H.R. 3263, providing for military construction for the fiscal year 1984. The conference agreement recommends $7.1 billion, which is approximately $1.5 billion below the President's request. The recommended program is $136 million below the Senate recommendation and $142 million above the amount recommended by the House. We are, in fact, almost exactly between the House and Senate reported amounts.

The conference agreement is also $400 million below the reported 302 budget allocations.

I wish to point out that, even with the various reductions agreed to by the conferees, the proposed military construction bill will be the largest ever sent to the President. It provides a wide range of improvements, both to the readiness of our Armed Forces and to the quality of living and working conditions for the men and women in the military.

The House and the Senate have carefully reviewed and made reductions to the proposed military construction program. Because of this, I believe we have brought forward a bill that can generate the grass roots support that is needed to bolster our defense posture. Large defense expenditures can be supported if Members of Congress and their electorate feel that we can justify every expenditure, no matter how small.

The conference agreement will provide a military construction and family housing program that has more than 1,500 construction projects in the United States and around the world. The U.S. construction business will benefit through the creation of more than 200,000 direct and indirect industry jobs. In all, more than $4 billion will be spent at hundreds of U.S. bases in virtually every State.

I would like to briefly highlight the major agreements reached by the conferees:

MX MISSILE SYSTEM

The conferees agreed to only fund proposed MX-related construction projects that are at a high state of design. These construction funds are not to be obligated until Congress has voted the procurement funds for the missile.

The MX construction recommended by the conferees is essentially for maintenance, training, and testing facilities not located at the deployment site.

AIR BASE UPGRADE IN TURKEY

The conference agreement provides funds for the upgrade and construction of two air bases in eastern Turkey. These facilities will greatly improve defense capabilities in the southern flank of NATO.

AIR BASE UPGRADE IN HONDURAS

Last year Congress authorized the upgrade of two airfields in Honduras but appropriations for only one facility were approved. The conferees have agreed to provide the $8 million needed to improve the other facility located at La Ceiba, Honduras.

RAS BANAS, EGYPT

The conferees agreed to rescind $91 million appropriated last year for an Army/Air Force facility upgrade at Ras Banas, Egypt. However, report language states that once the Defense Department puts together a clear definition of the recently revised program at Ras Banas, the plan will be considered again during a future supplemental request from the President.

UNBUDGETED ITEMS

The conference agreement recommends that several unbudgeted projects be approved through the use of appropriations rather than through savings as proposed by the Senate. The conferees deleted both House and Senate projects that were not at a sufficient level of design. Projects that have been deferred should be requested in either supplemental or fiscal year 1985 requests once design has proceeded to the 35 percent level.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion we are proud to send this bill to the President prior to the start of the fiscal year. The appropriations before us recommend a balanced program that takes into account our defense priorities and the resources available to meet these needs. I recommend, therefore, approval of the conference report.

At this time I yield to the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. REGULA), who has worked very diligently and whose expertise has been invaluable to us in putting together not only this bill but this conference report.

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume and thank the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HEFNER).

I would add that I, too, rise in strong support of the conference report.

I think it was interesting to note that the Members of the House from both sides of the aisle were all in attendance at the conference. We worked very closely together under the leadership of the gentleman from North Carolina in diligently protecting the House position.

I think that can be recognized by the fact that the total amount of money provided in this conference report is less than in the bill in the other body.

I would say in the case of both Houses that hard work went into the original bills as well as the conference report.

Today it is easy for people to say that military spending is out of hand, that there is no concern for the dollars that are put into our military activities. I would point out that as a result of the committee action in the House and the other body and in the conference, this bill is $1.6 billion, or about 18 percent less than was requested by the President.

I think that clearly says that in each instance we took each project to insure that it was a cost-effective expenditure of public funds.

I would also point out that while it is a temptation to pork barrel bills of this type involving construction, in fact, no project was put into this bill unless the design work was at least 30-percent completed.

This was an effort to make sure that any projects that would be funded would have adequate design and would obviously be very necessary for our Military Establishment by virtue of having been up to 30 percent in design.

It is not a very glamorous responsibility to deal with military construction but I would point out a couple of things.

No. 1, construction is on the cutting edge of weapons systems. You cannot beddown B-1's, you cannot beddown weapons systems unless you first put construction in place.

Therefore, while it is not glamorous, it is absolutely vital to a cost-effective military program and it has to have a lead time in terms of construction of 2 to 3 years.

So we are out front as far as dealing with new weapons systems.

Second, construction has a profound impact on the morale of our service people.

We deal with the nuts and bolts, the workplace, the quality of life in terms of the situation in which we call upon our servicemen and women to work and in which they live.

As we in these United States support and wish to maintain a volunteer force in our military services, it becomes absolutely essential that in order to retain qualified people and attract new individuals to enlist in the services we do have to have good programs in terms of housing, in terms of working and living conditions.

Military construction, again, is a vital aspect of that activity. I might point out that in funding the various things such as GLCM bases in Europe, COBS in Turkey and other places that we went to a barebones concept. We tried to avoid the frills. We tried to put the money where it would be effective in producing results.

I would emphasize something that I know is of concern to our Members and to the people of this Nation and that is that we need greater contributions from our allies.

In conference report we set forth the requirements that our allies take a greater share of responsibility for funding bases in Europe and for funding bases in Japan.

For example, we provide initial funding for a new contingent of F-16's at Misawa. It becomes more important in light of the events surrounding KAL flight 007. It is in the north end of that island. It is important.

We also provide that the Japanese Government has to participate in a meaningful way in this construction if it is to go forward.

I mention these items because I want to assure those of you who are voting on these programs that we are putting pressure on NATO and on the country of Japan to take a larger share of the responsibility for free world security.

I certainly would recommend to all of you support for this bill. It passed the House on a voice vote. I think that reflected an understanding on the part of our colleagues that we did work hard to get this under budget and to make sure that every item in here was a cost-effective use of our available defense dollars.

Again I compliment the chairman for his leadership in achieving these results. I think it does the job and I think it does it in a very effective way in providing facilities needed for the future, recognizing that we have to build good morale among our service people and it is our way of appreciating what they do to make this Nation secure.

I urge the Members of this body to give this conference report their strong support.

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HUTTO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for doing a very fine job on the military construction appropriations conference report.

I want to ask a question of the chairman. I think I understood the gentleman correctly but I am not quite sure.

I know that in the authorization conference report there are a number of projects authorized contingent upon savings.

As I understand it, the gentleman's subcommittee, and I can understand why, took some of these and appropriated for them but then others they left off. As I understand it it was because they were at less than 35 percent design. Is that correct?

Mr. HEFNER. We had an agreement on the subcommittee that any project that was not at least at the 35-percent design level we would not fund.

Now once these projects become 35-percent design—they then can be funded in either the 1985 budget request or they can be included in a 1984 supplemental. If it is deemed to be absolutely necessary, and construction funding can be obligated in fiscal year 1984 they could be included in a reprograming request.

Mr. HUTTO. If I may ask the chairman, is it his opinion that if some of these projects become 35 percent of design stage, that they then could be funded from the savings or would the services have to come back to the subcommittee or to the Congress on this issue?

Mr. HEFNER. If the gentleman will yield further, they would have to come back to the committee for approval.

Mr. HUTTO. But could they do that?

Mr. HEFNER. If they are able to be started in fiscal year 1984, the Department could request supplemental or reprograming approval.

Mr. HUTTO. For reprograming by the gentleman's subcommittee?

Mr. HEFNER. Yes.

Mr. HUTTO. Or by the full Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. HEFNER. By the subcommittee.

Mr. HUTTO. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. EDWARDS).

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Let me say I have never in the years I have been in the House worked on any subcommittee which did a better job on and analyzing every request for spending that came before it and insisting upon full justification for that spending.

From a defense standpoint, those of us who are concerned about a strong defense and the morale of the people in the service, this is the largest military construction appropriation with which we have dealt.

But from a fiscal standpoint, I think here we can particularly compliment the committee, from a fiscal standpoint we are bringing to you a bill that is not only $1.6 billion under the President's request but it is $118 million under the 1983 totals in spending.

I would personally compliment both the chairman, Mr. HEFNER, and the ranking member, Mr. REGULA, and the professional staff, Terry Peel and Mark Murray, for the work they did on this bill. I believe the Members of this House can easily justify and support not only the money that we spend in this bill, every dime on every project, but as well can justify the things that were cut out of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to thank the chairman because in the conference with the Senate, the House Members, under the chairman's leadership, stood absolutely firm for some of the hard line decisions we made.

I think as a result of that we have a conference report that we can bring here that every Member of the House can vote for and be proud of.

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California (Mr. FAZIO).

Mr. FAZIO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to echo the remarks of the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. EDWARDS). The chairman, Mr. HEFNER, and the ranking minority member, Mr. REGULA, deserve the thanks of the entire membership for the responsible and prudent way in which they managed this legislation and brought it to the floor. They have fulfilled their responsibilities that this body has to our men and women in the military and have done it under budget. Also, I note that the bill will be sent to the President prior to the start of the fiscal year.

I would particularly like to congratulate the chairman on the emphasis he placed, along with Mr. REGULA, on the quality of life issues for the people who serve both in this country and overseas.

There are over 32,000 new barracks available for our men and women in uniform in this bill. We provided for the health care facilities and other kinds of recreational aspects of military life which have too often been overlooked.

One other thing that I know will be very important to many Members is that the committee has taken action to insure that the work we do in NATO, within the NATO infrastructure, is done in a manner in which the European nations are expected to share a larger share of the defense burden.

We are not doing things in this bill which can be done more appropriately by the host nations. We are doing essential things that we know need to be done for the benefit of our men and women and for the security of Europe.

But the chairman (Mr. HEFNER) is keeping a tight leash on our allies in regard to the sometimes overly generous funding that we have provided them and allowed them to have perhaps more latitude in their own budgets than we would think appropriate.

The fact that we brought that to an end in this bill I think is something most Members on this floor can take some pride in.

I would like to thank the chairman for the leadership he has provided in bringing the conference report to the floor today.

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFNER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCURDY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to again compliment the chairman of the subcommittee for the superb job that he has done. He has taken the time to inspect many of the military facilities in this country and it is a very time-consuming effort and one that takes a tremendous amount of energy and diligence. I appreciate the hard work that the chairman has done.

Again, I encourage him to continue the efforts throughout the continental United States and throughout the world. Certainly I think the people who are very much concerned about our national security owe a debt of gratitude to the chairman.

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to sponsor the pending resolution which would authorize the President of the United States to proclaim the week beginning May 13, 1984, as "Municipal Clerk's Week." The purpose of this resolution is to recognize and honor on a nationwide basis those who bear the title of municipal clerk. The International Institute of Municipal Clerks, representing thousands of our Nation's most established professional public servants, has endorsed such recognition and has set aside this special week in honor of this group.

As a matter of historical perspective, the municipal clerk goes back to pre-Biblical times. The ancient cities of Greece had their own city secretary whose primary duty was to read aloud official documents. The office of clerk can be traced back to the Middle Ages where, initially, a clerk was any member of a religious order. This was derived from the word "cleric" or "clergyman." Our early American colonists established the office of clerk and it quickly became a way of life.

Mr. Speaker, since the earliest days, municipal clerks have been at the heart of virtually all the official acts of local government, representing the tie between government and citizen, the result of which has been the orderly maintenance of public records without which local government could not exist.

While Municipal Clerk's Week has been recognized annually by many State and local governments, it has not been recognized on a national level. I feel it is time that we make this observance to call attention to the historical relationship of this position to our democratic form of government; its importance in the operation of government affairs; and the numerous services through which we benefit that are provided by this office.

At this time, I urge adoption of the resolution.●

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from North Carolina and the members of the conference committee, who have done an excellent job of balancing the constraints of a recovering economy on the one hand with the continuing threats to world peace on the other. We often fail to appreciate how important a role our Armed Forces and weapons systems play in keeping the peace, but I think it is evident that judicious outlays today can avoid the far more costly alternative of a war tomorrow.

This bill and report represent the minimum needed to maintain our readiness and provide the incentive to our allies to share their part of the burden. Equally important, it provides the President with the minimum needed to negotiate effectively with the Soviets on arms control, as his remarks to the U.N. General Assembly yesterday demonstrated.

We often overlook the positive effect of military expenditures on the economy. The dollars appropriated in this bill will mean many thousands of new jobs for American workers. I am particularly grateful to the committee for including needed funds for the space shuttle and MX testing programs at Vandenberg, and for needed facilities at other bases in Ventura County, including the new Naval Regional Medical Center at Port Hueneme.

I urge all Members to support the conference report.●

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY). Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the conference report.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENTS IN DISAGREEMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will designate the first amendment in disagreement.

The amendment reads as follows:

Senate amendment No. 7: Page 3, line 10, strike out "$1,374,751,000" and insert "$1,502,491,000".

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. HEFNER

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEFNER moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7 and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment, insert the following: "Provided, That none of the funds made available for airfield improvements in Honduras may be obligated until the Committees on Appropriations have been notified as to the complete U.S. construction plan for the region, $1,501,993,000".

Mr. HEFNER (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will designate the next amendment in disagreement.

The amendment reads as follows:

Senate amendment No. 15: Page 4, line 24, strike out "$65,127,000" and insert "$59,300,000".

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. HEFNER

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEFNER moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15 and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$67,620,000".

Mr. HEFNER (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEFNER moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21 and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$30,605,000".

Mr. HEFNER (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will designate the next amendment in disagreement.

The amendment reads as follows:

Senate amendment No. 53: Page 12, strike out lines 10 to 17, inclusive.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. HEFNER

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEFNER moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53 and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: Restores the matter striken by said amendment, amended to read as follows:

SEC. 120. None of the funds appropriated in this Act for F-16 beddown projects at Misawa, Japan, may be obligated or expended unless there has been notification to the Committees on Appropriations that the approved Government of Japan budget for fiscal year 1984 includes projects associated with the F-16 beddown as an additive over the level of funding provided in Japanese fiscal year 1983 for the facilities improvement program.

Mr. HEFNER (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will designate the next amendment in disagreement.

The amendment reads as follows:

Senate amendment No. 55: Page 12, after line 17, insert:

SEC. 118. It is the sense of the Congress that the Administration should call on the pertinent member nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and on Japan to meet or exceed their pledges for at least a 3 per centum real increase in defense spending and furtherance of increase unity, equitable sharing of our common defense burden, and international stability.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. HEFNER

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEFNER moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55 and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment, insert the following:

SEC. 121. It is the sense of the Congress that the Administration should call on the pertinent member nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and on Japan to meet or exceed their pledges for at least a 3 per centum real increase in defense spending and furtherance of increased unity, equitable sharing of our common defense burden, and international stability.

Mr. HEFNER (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will designate the next amendment in disagreement.

Senate amendment No. 56: Page 12, after line 17, insert:

SEC. 119. None of the funds appropriated by this Act may be available for any country when the President determines that the government of such country has failed to take adequate measures to prevent narcotic drugs or other controlled substances cultivated or produced or processed illicitly, in whole or in part, in such country, or transported through such country, from being sold illegally within the jurisdiction of such country to United States Government personnel or their dependents, or from being smuggled into the United States. Such prohibition shall continue in force until the President determines and reports to the Congress in writing that—

(1) the government of such country has prepared, presented, and committed itself to a plan providing for the control, reduction, and gradual elimination of the illicit cultivation, production, processing, transportation, and distribution of narcotic drugs and other controlled substances within an explicitly stated period of time, with implementation commencing prior to the renewal of assistance to such country; and

(2) the government of such country has taken legal and law enforcement measures to enforce effective suppression of the illicit cultivation, production, processing, transportation, and distribution of narcotic drugs and other controlled substances.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. HEFNER

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEFNER moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56 and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment, insert the following:

SEC. 122. (a) None of the funds appropriated in this Act may be available for any country if the President determines that the government of such country is failing to take adequate measures to prevent narcotic drugs or other controlled substances cultivated or produced or processed illicitly, in whole or in part, in such country, or transported through such country, from being sold illegally within the jurisdiction of such country to United States personnel or their dependents, or from being smuggled into the United States. Such prohibition shall continue in force until the President determines and reports to the Congress in writing that—

(1) the government of such country has prepared and committed itself to a plan presented to the Secretary of State that would eliminate the cause or basis for the application to such country of the prohibition contained in the first sentence; and

(2) the government of such country has taken appropriate law enforcement measures to implement the plan presented to the Secretary of State.

(b) The provisions of subsection (a) shall not apply in the case of any country with respect to which the President determines that the application of the provisions of such subsection would be inconsistent with the national security interests of the United States.

Mr. HEFNER (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will designate the last amendment in disagreement.

The amendment reads as follows:

Senate amendment No. 57: Page 12, after line 17, insert:

SEC. 120. Of the total amount of budget authority provided for fiscal year 1984 by this Act that would otherwise be available for consulting services, management and professional services, and special studies and analyses, 10 per centum of the amount intended for such purposes in the President's budget for 1984, as amended, for any agency, department or entity subject to apportionment by the Executive shall be placed in reserve and not made available for obligation or expenditure: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any agency, department or entity whose budget request for 1984 for the purposes stated above did not amount to $5,000,000.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. HEFNER

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEFNER moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57 and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment, insert the following:

SEC. 123. Of the total amount of budget authority provided for fiscal year 1984 by this Act that would otherwise be available for consulting services, management and professional services, and special studies and analyses, 10 per centum of the amount intended for such purposes in the President's budget for 1984, as amended, for any agency, department or entity subject to apportionment by the Executive shall be placed in reserve and not made available for obligation or expenditure: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any agency, department or entity whose budget request for 1984 for the purposes stated above did not amount to $5,000,000.

Mr. HEFNER (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the votes by which action was taken on the conference report and the several motions was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include statistical facts, on the matters discussed in connection with the conference report on military construction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina.

There was no objection.

COMMEMORATING 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 284), commemorating the 25th anniversary of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. FUQUA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I do not intend to object, I rise in support of this resolution and commend the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for their work.

Mr. Speaker, over the last 25 years, this Nation and the world has witnessed a remarkable leap forward in scientific knowledge and technological capabilities. We owe much of this progress to America's space effort and the unparalleled performance by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA).

In 1958, the National Aeronautics and Space Act was passed by Congress with the objective of preserving "the role of the United States as a leader in aeronautical and space science and technology * * *." NASA was created with the charge of meeting this objective and, over the past quarter century, NASA has excelled in this mission with accomplishment after accomplishment.

Mercury, Gemini, Apollo, skylab, space shuttle—these are but a few of NASA's accomplishments.

We have gone beyond the confines of our planet and have brought back knowledge about the Moon, Mars, Venus, Saturn, Jupiter, and the far reaches of the universe.

World communications have expanded and their cost reduced. Remote sensing techniques have been refined enabling us to monitor the Earth's weather and agriculture patterns and better locate its resources. Aeronautics technology has been advanced to the point where America's position as an aircraft systems manufacturer is unmatched in the world. And we now have a space transportation system that is moving us headlong into routine space travel which our economy can use for its own commercial benefit. The list goes on and on.

Yes, NASA has done well. For 25 years, it has characterized leadership and excellence, and with our support, I am confident NASA will continue to meet the challenge of tomorrow as it has in the past.

Today, this body meets to consider House Joint Resolution 284, commemorating NASA's 25th anniversary. This resolution is our way of acknowledging NASA's contributions and thanking the men and women associated with this agency over the years for their dedication and exemplary service.

I urge my colleagues to join me in paying tribute to one of the finest organizations to serve this Nation by voting for this measure.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FUQUA. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I join with my distinguished colleague and chairman of the Committee on Science and Technology in support of House Joint Resolution 284 commemorating the passage of NASA's first 25 years.

The achievements we have seen from NASA since October 11, 1958, represent so many milestones in our Nation's history. You may recall several of these events:

Pioneer 1, launched on October 11, 1958, as NASA's first automated satellite in space;

Friendship 7, the Mercury capsule launched July 20, 1962, which carried into orbit the first American space traveler;

Apollo 11, the lunar module Eagle, which carried man to the Moon for the first time on July 20, 1969;

Columbia, launched on April 12, 1981, the first reusable space shuttle which propelled us into a new era in space transportation;

Further, hundreds of manmade satellites have performed countless experiments and sent back to Earth innumerable statistics to be used in such areas of space application as weather and crop predictions and communications.

The launch of the first space transportation system in 1981 marked the beginning of a new era in space transportation and research. The space shuttle's goal of providing safe, comfortable transport of passengers and cargo to and from space is well on its way to realization. A reusable shuttle will enable us to operate space laboratories to conduct research in medical care, manufacturing processes, and biological and life sciences. Further, shuttle payloads will bring us powerful capabilities in communications and navigation, in weather and agriculture forecasting, and in preserving our Nation's security.

We have seen benefits to the public safety and to medical technology. To name a few: Space technology applied to brake linings, highway grooving to prevent skidding, and aerospace systems applied to firefighting equipment. Medical spinoffs we can expect soon include a prosthetic device for speech problems, a mechanism to diagnose handicapped children's walking problems, and a device that will automatically deliver medication from an implant.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation before us gives Congress an opportunity to congratulate NASA for its outstanding work over these 25 years in aeronautics and space research. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications, I have had the honor of following on a daily basis the activities of the organization which spearheads our Nation's endeavors, and truly the endeavors of the entire free world, in space. We have seen the fruits of NASA's efforts in many related fields of technology, and we look forward to the exciting possibilities.

One exciting possibility is the planning and development of a space station—a manned, multipurpose open-ended space operating base in low Earth orbit. After the successes of our STS program, it is time to pick up another major space engineering initiative—a reusable, economic space station.

NASA's enabling legislation is the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958. My subcommittee has scheduled a series of hearings to review the basic policies of the act to determine whether these policies will be adequate to guide our Nation as well in the coming years as they have for the past 25 and whether changes to the act would be necessary or desirable at this time.

I urge my colleagues to adopt this resolution (H.J. Res. 284) introduced by Mr. FUQUA, designating October 1, 1983, as the 25th anniversary of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FUQUA. Further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BATEMAN).

Mr. BATEMAN. I rise today in support of this resolution commemorating the 25th anniversary of NASA with a certain degree of incredulity. When I reflect on the contributions that the space program has made to mankind, it is hard to believe that we are just now celebrating a 25th anniversary. After an examination of the list of scientific and technological breakthroughs and spinoff benefits resulting from NASA research and development over the last 25 years, a similar list of accomplishments from the centuries prior to this time pales in comparison.

At various times during these historic 25 years it was fashionable in some circles to criticize our efforts in space. We constantly heard from our detractors that we should stop spending billions in space that should be spent for programs on Earth. You do not hear too much of this kind of criticism anymore. I believe the record of contributions to mankind has become so overwhelming that even many of its harshest critics have been silenced. From agriculture to computer technology, medicine to communications, energy exploration and development, weather forecasting, national defense—hardly a single aspect of our lives has been untouched by the work of NASA.

I am especially proud to be sharing in the celebration of the anniversary of NASA. The First District of Virginia is host to some of the important work that NASA is conducting. From the NASA Flight Center at Wallops Island to the Langley Research Center at Hampton, NASA researchers, technicians, and employees are doing invaluable work that is carrying on the NASA tradition. Indeed, some of our earliest pioneering air and space research, under the auspices of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, was done at Langley, including aerodynamic design and windtunnel experimentation going back to the 1920's. This early work inspired the comment at the time that, "The present-day American position in all branches of aeronautical knowledge can, without doubt, be attributed mainly to this far-seeing policy and expenditure on up-to-date laboratory equipment."

This same attitude and commitment continues today at Langley and Wallops and NASA facilities throughout the country. Since those early days we have seen the development of a space program under the direction of NASA administrators and personnel that has carried us into space and back home to reap tremendous benefits here on Earth. We have extended our senses beyond our atmosphere to the Moon, to distant planets—beyond the very limits of our solar system.

The 25th anniversary of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration is not just the birthday of a Government agency, it is a tribute to a national vision and commitment, it is a salute to a remarkable partnership between our Government and hundreds of private corporations and institutions and the people behind them, and it is a recognition of the dedication that we have to science, technology, and the betterment of the lives of our future generations.

Congress and all Americans should take the time to reflect on NASA's last quarter-century of accomplishments and to look to the stars and imagine what we can achieve in the next 25 years.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and let me commend the gentleman, the chairman of our Science and Technology Committee, for the work, and I mean the tremendous work, that he has performed on behalf of our space programs and on behalf of NASA and its record of success through his years in this Congress.

Mr. FUQUA. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Hawaii (Mr. AKAKA).

Mr. AKAKA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 284.

Mr. Speaker, I want to particularly commend NASA for its great accomplishment in the U.S. space program.

● Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, October 1 is the 25th anniversary of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, fondly known to all as

NASA. It is my privilege to represent the dedicated men and women of two NASA facilities in my congressional district, the Marshall Space Flight Center Michould Assembly Facility and the NASA Slidell Computer Complex. Out of respect for them and all of their colleagues throughout the NASA family, I am cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 284, designating October 1, 1983, as "Twenty-Fifth Anniversary of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration."

I hope that this legislation and this anniversary will serve as a reminder of just how much NASA means to everyone of us. Our space program not only continued the pioneer spirit that built this country, but it also produces tangible technology that assists all of us in our everyday lives. Across the broader spectrum of advancing technologies NASA provides the space shuttle, exploration of the solar system, and the application of space capabilities in remote sensing of land resources, ocean and atmospheric conditions. These are remarkable achievements.

As a member of the U.S. Space Foundation and the Congressional Space Caucus, I say happy anniversary, NASA. And to the men and women of NASA I say thank you.●

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, it is may pleasure to join in the commemoration of the 25th anniversary of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. All Americans can be proud of the accomplishments made by the men and women of NASA for the last quarter century. NASA has put the United States in the forefront of space exploration and played an integral role in making the United States the leader in technological development.

I would especially like to commend the Ames Research Center, one of NASA's leading aeronautical research facilities, located in Santa Clara County. In striving to perfect the science of flying, the Ames researchers have increased the safety and efficiency of modern aviation. In addition, Ames is continually working on projects that help us to better understand our environment and cope with the forces of nature.

To all connected with the NASA programs around the country, I would like to say congratulations and keep up the good work. I urge all my colleagues to cosponsor House Joint Resolution 284 commemorating this silver anniversary.●

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, on October 1, 1983, the National Aeronautical and Space Administration will turn 25 years old. Although only 25 years old, NASA has made a monumental impact of our modern world. One of the most striking changes since 1958 has been that space applications are now common parts of day-to-day life. In many areas—communications, meteorology, science, high-technology transfer, and defense support—space has become a commonplace contributor to and an integral part of our everyday life.

The entry of the space shuttle into routine operations has opened the door for a wide variety of new products and services. Some of the systems and experiments that have already flown on the shuttle have demonstrated the potential of making major contributions to our Nation and to world society. With the progress of the space shuttle program, the day is fast approaching when we can bring to bear the unique attributes of operations in space to help alleviate a number of important problems facing the Earth.

I hope that this anniversary will serve as a reminder of just how much NASA has accomplished in the past and how much more it will do in the future.●

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like us all to pause for a moment to praise NASA on its silver anniversary. It is important to recognize this Nation's space agency not so much for its longevity, but for its many accomplishments which have allowed us to move light years ahead in space science and exploration over the last three decades.

We should look upon NASA as representing the best our Federal Government offers in terms of applying coordinated research to resulting innovative technology. NASA has always met the challenges demanded of it, and has often managed to reach higher than what has been expected of it.

When the National Aeronautics and Space Administration was first established 25 years ago, it wasted no time in proving itself as a prolific and productive space agency. Within a week, NASA had initiated the Mercury program, thus beginning the era of the U.S. manned space projects. Our manned space program achieved its ambitious goal of landing a man on the Moon before the end of the decade. While America's moonshot program was the most widely publicized aspect to date of the U.S. space program, NASA was simultaneously engaged in developing and launching satellites for communications, weather, and other scientific applications.

Although NASA made fewer headlines during the 1970's, the results of its space exploration activities continued to astonish the public. The landing of the Viking spacecraft on Mars brought us new, spectacular views of another distant globe. Since then, Pioneer 10 and 11 have sent back the first views of the more remote planets Jupiter and Saturn, followed by more dazzling pictures taken by Voyager 1 and 2.

It should also be noted that in 1975, NASA reached new heights in carrying out its assigned responsibility of cooperating with other nations in the peaceful application of technology. In addition to demonstrating international space rescue capability, the Apollo-Soyuz joint docking showed the world that the United States and U.S.S.R. could work together closely and compatibly.

This last decade saw yet another remarkable innovation in space technology with the development of the first reusable manned space vehicle. Our very successful space shuttle program allows us to consider further international space cooperation projects, permitting our shuttle to retrieve United States and international satellites. The shuttle can also carry the European-built Spacelab module for conducting scientific experiments in a shirtsleeve environment.

What is perhaps most impressive about NASA is that unlike other Federal agencies, it has been required by law to "provide for the widest practicable and appropriate dissemination of information concerning (its) activities and results thereof." While there are obvious exceptions to this rule, one cannot argue with the fact that since its inception, NASA has expanded our knowledge, and that of other countries, of the solar system and our esthetic appreciation of viewing unseen galaxies.

In providing us with a perspective of the universe, NASA space programs have afforded us a new perspective on our own lives. Federal support for this agency has directly improved the quality of life for all of us—enriching our knowledge of the Earth's atmosphere, enlarging our international communications network, and enhancing our ability to predict accurately crop yields, locate mineral deposits, and discover sources of pollution.

NASA has consistently allowed the United States to remain a leader in aerospace service and technology. We must continue to allow it to flourish.●

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, October 1 marks the 25th anniversary of the establishment of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and is a fitting time to review some of the remarkable accomplishments of our space program, a program that has been the wonder of the world.

From the launching of Pioneer 1, 10 days after the establishment of the agency, to the historic seventh flight of the space shuttle Columbia earlier this year, we have been reaping the benefits of our space program. Twenty-five years ago we could not have imagined the number and diversity of public benefits that would result from our efforts at space exploration.

Better management of our limited natural resources and protection of our environment, improved weather forecasting, advances in microcircuitry and miniturization, the manufacture of superior products in space: all of these advances, important as they may be, are perhaps overshadowed by the greatest gain of all. The technology base that has been developed through the space program by a team of government, industry, and university researchers and technicians has added immeasurably to our scientific knowledge, which, while important in itself, is even more important as an investment in and a resource for our future.

The University of Arizona Lunar and Planetary Laboratory in Tucson, Ariz., is a major center for this scientific effort and has been in the forefront of planetary research in this country. All of Arizona takes pride in the contributions we have made to the space program in a broad range of research topics from stellar astrophysics to the terrestrial application of space sciences.

I believe strongly in further development of our space program and exploration of our solar system. The recent recommendations of the Solar System Exploration Committee, established in 1980, represent a positive step toward finding cost-efficient ways for us to continue our country's leadership in the field. Recent cutbacks in funding have caused the cancellation or delay of several missions. New planetary mission starts have declined from 32 in the 1960's and 11 in the 1970's, to only 1 planned launch in the 1980's.

Our space science program has lost too many scientists and technicians to private industry or to other countries who are expanding their space programs while we are reducing ours. Our resource base is rapidly being depleted.

If we are to retain our leadership in this area and to continue reaping the benefits of increasing knowledge and developing technology we must supply a steady source of funding to NASA and its associated agencies. This silver anniversary of NASA provides us with an appropriate time to reaffirm our historic commitment to space exploration.●

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that Members of the House have shared my excitement at the astounding advances in aeronautics and space technology that we have witnessed over many years.

Today we have two manned spaceships, the Columbia and the Challenger, that regularly rocket beyond the Earth's atmosphere for missions in space and return to prepare for many more missions.

We have sent unmanned craft to study the planets of our solar system and send back volumes of scientific data. We have used satellites in Earth orbit to monitor the weather, advance communications, and conduct surveys of Earth resources. Our astronauts have explored the Moon.

These wonders and many others have been possible because Congress created the National Aeronautics and Space Administration 25 years ago and has since provided the financial resources for its great achievements.

Unlike some other programs of Government, NASA has been an outstanding success. The scientists and support personnel of NASA have achieved so much because of their dedication to doing things that have never been done before. In fact, they have done things that were not even considered possible only a relatively short time ago.

They have contributed immensely to the knowledge of our universe and to the application of that knowledge to improve the quality of life for humanity.

I salute them on this 25th anniversary of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.●

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to participate in this special order today to celebrate NASA's "Silver Anniversary," and I am proud to be a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 284, commemorating this upcoming anniversary on October 1.

I think that it is fitting as we look back on the 25 years since NASA's inception to note that NASA stands as an exceptional example of competence and innovation in research and in management. Teaming up with not only the aerospace industry, but with commercial business, and with our Nation's university research community, NASA has produced new technologies that broaden our knowledge not only of outer space, but our knowledge of our own environment here on Earth.

I am especially proud of the fact that NASA's Lewis Research Center is located in my district—at Lewis, in partnership with the universities and with industry, NASA is working to create technologies that are transferable to the aircraft engine industry, the energy industry, the automotive industry, and the space industry—as well as to countless others. Hand in hand, NASA and these industries are seeking new ways to create the technologies that contribute to our national defense, to transportation that is safe, swift, and reliable for business and for the general public, and to build more efficient commercial aircraft that will not only reduce the costs of air flight for passengers, but that will ease the environmental impact of the airplane as well.

I recently visited Lewis Research Center and was extremely impressed with Lewis' technology innovation program which assists nonaerospace business and industry to access their data and results. The work at the Lewis Research Center in space propulsion and power has helped to create the capabilities for space ventures, and for exploration of the Moon, the planets, "space stations," and to the assessment of our Earth's resources. Work done at Lewis Research Center, and other NASA centers offers the promise of future technologies that will provide more rewarding applications in the years to come including the possibilities of the creation of products in outer space that cannot be produced on Earth.

On this 25th anniversary of NASA, I want to join my colleagues in applauding the work NASA has done in pioneering the use of space to expand human knowledge and understanding of our world and other worlds. And, I join with my colleagues as we look forward to NASA's continued achievements in the future.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, this weekend our Nation reached a significant milestone in our race to the future. I refer to the 25th anniversary celebration of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

This anniversary is a time for retrospection and a time for gazing into the future. Without a doubt, throughout the past 25 years NASA has been instrumental not only in putting and keeping the United States at the forefront of the technological arena, but also in broadening the boundaries of our horizon.

The first official day of NASA's existence was October 1, 1958; 10 days later NASA launched its first spacecraft. Since that auspicious beginning, NASA has led the way in scientific, technological and engineering breakthroughs, and in space exploration. In 1961 the first U.S. manned space flight took place as Freedom 7 and Alan Shepard completed a 15½-minute suborbital flight. Nineteen hundred and sixty-two was the year that Friendship 7 and John Glenn completed the first U.S. manned orbital flight, a portent of greater things to come from NASA. The years 1963–69 saw enormous advances. NASA inproved systems and previewed the Moon with the Gemini program; Surveyor I made a lunar landing in 1966; and the early years of the Apollo program began.

NASA has also uncovered many secrets held by neighbors in our own solar system. Mariner 10 in 1973, provided the first closeup views of Mercury, the smallest of our galaxy's nine planets. The Viking program of the mid-1970's landed two spacecraft on Mars, effectively mapping the Martian surface, sampling the soil and atmosphere, and searching for extraterrestrial life signs. The Pioneer Venus program provided important data about Earth's closest planetary neighbor, and mapped nearly all of the planet's never-seen surface. Pioneer 10 left Earth 12 years ago on a trek that will take it out of our solar system and into intergalactic space to roam for millions of years. Most recently, the space shuttle, Columbia and Challenger have ushered in a new era of U.S. capability, to take advantage of space's benefits on a practical and regular basis.

The culmination of these explorations resulted in one of our country's proudest moments, the first manned lunar landing on July 20, 1969. The importance of such an accomplishment cannot be overstated. Neil Armstrong and the crew of Apollo 11 planted the American flag on the Moon, thus reaffirming the position of the United States as world technological leader, and signaling a monumental triumph of American scientific prowess. It generated major advances across a wide spectrum of scientific disciplines, and it demanded giant technological steps to accommodate those advances. In 1968–72 there were 11 manned Apollo flights involving 29 astronauts, 12 of whom walked on the moon; there were two manned orbital preliminaries, three circum-lunar flights and six lunar landing missions. The Apollo program ranks as the most successful in space exploration.

After the conclusion of Apollo, NASA turned its attention and genius toward Earth; developing and improving satellite systems, refining and revising aerodynamic designs, launching Landsat Earth resources survey satellites, and orbiting skylab for use as an interim space station and laboratory. These programs and others like them have helped us to learn more about our tiny corner of the universe.

Future plans at NASA include the development and launching of the Space Telescope, which will have the capability to seek out objects 50 times fainter and 7 times farther away than those now visible. It wil also be used to study Halley's Comet when it returns to Earth's vicinity in 1986. The Venus Radar Mapper, tentatively scheduled for a 1988 launching, will use synthetic aperture radar to pierce the clouds that cloak Venus and accurately map the planet's surface. A probe and radar mapper will be sent to collect information from Titan, a satellite of Saturn whose atmosphere is recognized to be similar to Earth's own at its nascence.

The list of NASA's accomplishments, advancements, and plans for the future could fill volumes. Our Nation is proud that NASA takes such an enthusiastic and bold approach to technology and its advancement, for in space there is no room for timidity.

The Fifth Congressional District of Maryland, which I represent, is proud to have within its borders the Goddard Space Flight Center. Goddard plays a significant part in NASA's research and development team, and, in fact, will be an integral contributor to the development of the space telescope. On this day, I would like to single out the employees and accomplishments of Goddard as well.

Perhaps the lonely voyage of Pioneer 10 best sums up our quest for knowledge and the secrets of the cosmos. Its trek is analogous to our own. Pioneer floats into the infinity of the unknown, not knowing where it will go, who it will meet, or when it will stop. Pioneer is almost 3 billion miles from home port, and should continue forever—an imponderable abstraction. So, too, shall man continue into the unknown.

Mr. Speaker, I want to extend my sincere congratulations to NASA and everyone associated with it, and may its next 25 years be as successful as its first.●

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection, and I thank the distinguished gentlewoman from Indiana (Mrs. HALL) for her cooperation and courtesy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 284

Whereas the United States embarked on an urgent national effort to enter the space age which was inaugurated by adoption of the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958, whereby the National Aeronautics and Space Administration was created on October 1, 1958;

Whereas, on October 11, 1958, NASA launched into Earth-orbit its first automated satellite, Pioneer 1;

Whereas the first United States citizen was launched into suborbital space aboard his "Freedom 7" Mercury capsule on May 5, 1961;

Whereas, on February 20, 1962, the first United States citizen was launched into Earth-orbit aboard his "Friendship 7" Mercury capsule;

Whereas, subsequently, literally dozens of astronauts have been launched into Earth-orbit to perform useful work and research for periods lasting as long as three months at a time;

Whereas, on July 20, 1969, the Apollo 11 lunar module, "Eagle," carried the first manned expedition to the surface of the Moon and, subsequently, five additional two-man crews would explore the lunar front side for science;

Whereas hundreds of unmanned satellites have scientifically explored near-Earth space, have mapped our planet's resources, charted its weather and provided a technical base from which commercial exploitation of space has become a reality;

Whereas two-thirds of the planets in the solar system have been explored and observed in detail by increasingly complex generations of interplanetary craft;

Whereas the birth of the first reusable space transportation system was realized on April 12, 1981, with the successful launch, orbital operation and ground landing of the space shuttle Columbia;

Whereas, drawing upon its NASA heritage, the agency has continued to push forward the horizons of aeronautical research and development;

Whereas cooperative space projects with other nations of the world have greatly enhanced relations, communications, and understanding among the inhabitants of "Spaceship Earth;"

Whereas, for twenty-five years, NASA has vigorously pursued the charter set forth by Congress—to realize the potential, practical benefits to be gained from aeronautical and space research and development—which has placed the United States in a preeminent position worldwide to utilize this technology; and

Whereas the twenty-fifth anniversary of the birth of NASA provides an opportunity to recognize the enormous achievements by that agency in aeronautics and space research and development, and in related fields of science and technology: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the day October 1, 1983, is hereby designed the "Twenty-fifty Anniversary of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration," and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the 25th anniversary of the birth of NASA provides an opportunity to recognize the enormous achievements by that agency in aeronautics and space research and development and in related fields of science and technology.

This resolution will highlight the fact that for 25 years, NASA has vigorously pursued the charter set forth by Congress—to realize the potential, practical benefits to be gained from aeronautical and space research and development—which has placed the United States in a preeminent position worldwide to utilize this technology.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of this resolution which commemorates the 25th anniversary of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration on October 1, 1983.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL SCHOOLBUS SAFETY WEEK OF 1983

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 137) authorizing and requesting the President to issue a proclamation designating the period from October 2, 1983, through October 8, 1983, as "National Schoolbus Safety Week of 1983," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I rise to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the joint resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 137

Whereas twenty-two million students are transported by schoolbus to and from school each day;

Whereas the safety of these students deserves the highest priority; and

Whereas a national program is underway to call public attention to the importance of schoolbus safety during the week of October 9, 1983, through October 8, 1983: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the period from October 2, 1983, through October 8, 1983, as "National Schoolbus Safety Week of 1983" and calling upon the people of the United States and interested groups and organizations to observe such week with appropriate activities and ceremonies.

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of this resolution which calls attention to the importance of schoolbus safety during the week of October 2, 1983, through October 8, 1983.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MUNICIPAL CLERK'S WEEK

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 92) designating the week beginning May 8, 1983, as "Municipal Clerk's Week," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inform the House that I do not object, the minority has no objection to the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 92

Whereas the municipal clerk, oldest of public servants, is the hub around which revolves efficient and responsive local government;

Whereas as local government has grown in responsibility and importance through the centuries, so has the commission of the municipal clerk;

Whereas the municipal clerk provides a direct link between past, present, and future by preserving records for posterity and implementing decisions of the legislative body, all the time seeking better and more efficient ways to do these jobs;

Whereas the accurate recording, careful safeguarding, and prompt retrieval of public records are vital functions, without which efficient and responsive local government could not exist;

Whereas municipal clerks follow a mandate to seek better and more effective ways to perform those critical responsibilities in light of the rapid technological advances of today's world; and

Whereas in keeping with this mandate, municipal clerks also are dedicated to continuous professional education and training, in order to stay abreast of those advances: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in recognition of the outstanding and vital services performed by municipal clerks, reflecting their dedication to public service for the community, the week beginning May 8, 1983, is designated "Municipal Clerk's Week". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. HALL OF INDIANA

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. HALL of Indiana: Page 2, line 5, strike out "May 8" and insert in lieu thereof "May 13."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Indiana (Mrs. HALL).

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

TITLE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. HALL OF INDIANA

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title amendment offered by Mrs. HALL of Indiana: Amend the title so as to read: Joint resolution designating the week beginning May 13, 1984, as "Municipal Clerk's Week."

The title amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 142, NATIONAL PRODUCTIVITY IMPROVEMENT WEEK

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 142) designating the week of October 3 through October 9, 1983, as "National Productivity Improvement Week," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to indicate to the House that I do intend to object, the reason being that we have a policy in the House, unwritten, that in order to bring a resolution to the floor it requires 218 signatures. As of this date, this resolution has 42.

It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 239, DESIGNATING OCTOBER 2, 1983, AS NATIONAL DAY OF RECOGNITION FOR MOHANDAS K. GANDHI

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 239) designating October 2, 1983, as a national day of recognition for Mahandas K. Gandhi, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do object, the reason being that here again, with respect to this resolution, the requisite number of 218 cosponsors is not at this time on this resolution.

Let me add, personally, that I certainly have no objection to the adoption of this resolution; but if we have a policy, I believe it should be followed.

Mr. Speaker, for these reasons, I do object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolutions just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

ALLEGED VAN BUREN LETTER DOES NOT EXIST

(Mr. SHUSTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks, and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Speaker, during the debate on coal slurry pipelines we twice heard recited for us a supposed letter from Martin Van Buren to Andrew Jackson concerning channels and railroads. This letter was supposed to somehow suggest when translated into today's language that it had relevance and we should support coal slurry pipelines. In fact, just this morning the coal slurry lobbyists took a full page ad out in the Washington Post and made that same letter the centerpiece of their ad. There is one minor problem, Mr. Speaker. The letter never was written. The letter never existed. The letter is a hoax. We contacted the Library of Congress and they researched it, and they replied as follows:

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, D.C., September 20, 1983.

DEAR MR. SHUSTER. This is in reply to your letter of September 20, addressed to John McDonough, a member of my staff.

We have seen more than a dozen examples over the last several years of a letter purported to have been written in January 1829 by Martin Van Buren to Andrew Jackson concerning canals and railroads. In every case only printed examples have been presented to us, never a holograph manuscript. Some of the printed examples we have seen have been addressed to Jackson as "President" at the "White House," and have generally been dated either January 1 or January 31, 1829. Jackson, as President elect, left Tennessee on January 19 and arrived in Washington on February 11. He could have been addressed as "President" at this time but it would have been inappropriate to address such a letter to the "White House" prior to the inauguration of March 4. The latter term itself, in fact, was not in common usage as a place of address. Following the inauguration, most letters sent to Jackson were simply addressed to him as "President of the United States."

The Library of Congress' collection of the papers of Andrew Jackson, which has been indexed in full, does not include the letter of January 31, 1829 (or January 1), nor is there a retained copy in this Library's collection of the papers of Martin Van Buren, which has been calendared. The earliest example of a letter from Van Buren to Jackson in our collections is dated February 23, 1829. In writing of this period, Van Buren's modern biographer has declared: "Van Buren was never the man to presume on Jackson, as he was too conscious of his position to initiate any correspondence with Jackson's lieutenant [William B. Lewis], though he responded when his advice was sought. As Jackson remained aloof in any personal exchange between the two but acted through Lewis, so Van Buren adopted the same stance, relying upon [James A.] Hamilton to maintain communications." Cf. John Niven, "Martin Van Buren: The Romantic Age of American Politics" (New York, 1983), p. 224-225.

There are other manuscript repositories that have smaller collections of Jackson and Van Buren Papers, but it is unlikely that the letter in which you are interested would be found in one of them. In fact, internal evidence in the copy of the letter that you made available to us indicates very strongly that it is spurious, the discussion of the "railroads," for example, does not ring true, since passengers on the Baltimore and Ohio, the first railroad incorporated as a common carrier of passengers and freight, were first carried in January 1830, and in single cars drawn by horses. In addition, over the greater part of this public career, Van Buren was not friendly to internal improvements in general, and to canals in particular. Finally, the reference to an "Interstate Commerce Commission" in the letter is not in keeping with terminology used in 1829.

We regret that we are unable to comment specifically on the original of the letter under discussion. If the source from which the printed copy was made was known, then it might be possible to carry the investigation further.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES H. HUTSON,
Chief.

So, like so much else that we have heard about coal slurry pipelines, the proponents of the arguments have given us a reason to vote for coal slurry pipelines which never really existed. This is a figment of somebody's imagination. And one more reason why we should vote against coal slurry pipelines.

FOCUS ON THE UNITED NATIONS

(Mr. LIVINGSTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, both liberals and conservatives are becoming increasingly concerned about the activities of the United Nations, a body that could not even enact a resolution criticizing the recent downing of Korea Air Lines flight 007 by the Soviet Union. The Heritage Foundation has conducted a thorough study of the United Nations and has issued several illuminiating reports which should be of great interest to my colleagues and the American people.

The following is the most recent of the Heritage Foundation reports on the United Nations, and I recommend it to all who are interested in foreign affairs, particularly in view of the recent controversy surrounding Ambassador Lichenstein's remarks at the United Nations. I would only add that in my view, Mr. Lichenstein's comments were very well taken.

THE WAYWARD U.N.: A DIGEST OF HERITAGE STUDIES

INTRODUCTION

The United Nations, say many Americans, has failed to create a more peaceful world. In a 1983 survey,[1] 48.8 percent of those polled indicated they do not believe that the U.N. is effective in furthering the causes of world peace and political stability among nations; only 42.8 percent believe that the U.N. furthers peace. Not only has the U.N. failed to fulfill the lofty hopes of its founders, it has become itself a major cause of global disharmony.

The mandate of the U.N. Charter to settle disputes by peaceful means has been ignored as the U.N. has welcomed guerrilla leaders and legitimized various terrorist organizations. The Charter provision "to employ international machinery for the promotion of the economic and social advancement of all peoples" has become the New International Economic Order—the banner of the underdeveloped Third World governments' attempt to redistribute the wealth of the developed nations. United Nations Secretariat staffing has often been consciously anti-American. And the so-called nonaligned nations have been organized into a pro-Soviet, anti-Western voting bloc.

Despite this, the United States continues to contribute about 25 percent of the U.N. budget—a share far greater than that of any other nation. This amounted to $310,838,765[2] in 1981 and did not include voluntary U.S. contributions to the U.N. and its specialized agencies. In 1981, total U.S. contributions to the U.N. reached $825 million.[3] By contrast, the Soviet Union has pledged to contribute a mere 14 percent of the budget and remains delinquent on about $200 million—most of it for peace-keeping operations.

What has happened to the U.N. since its founding? Or, at least, what has happened to the American perception of that institution? Why does the U.S. find itself under almost constant siege at the U.N.? These are questions that American policymakers are asking. How they are answered may well determine for the rest of this century the role of the U.S. in the U.N.

To this end, The Heritage Foundation's United Nations Assessment Project, over the past 18 months, has published nearly two dozen studies analyzing the operations, goals, agenda, and effectiveness of the U.N. More than two dozen additional studies are scheduled to be released in the next 18 months. Several of the studies have attracted widespread attention. This paper summarizes the findings of five of those papers.[4]

U.N. SUPPORT FOR TERRORIST ORGANIZATIONS

In 1974, the U.N. welcomed Palestine Liberation Organization leader Yassir Arafat. He addressed the General Assembly and the Security Council as if he headed a legitimate, sovereign state. Two years later, another leading terrorist organization scored a critical victory, when the General Assembly voted to support the Southwest African People's Organization (SWAPO) "as the sole and authentic representative of the Namibian people" (U.N. Resolution 31/146, para. 2). U.N. records show that, since 1975, at least $116 million has been spent or budgeted to support such groups—what the U.N. calls "national liberation movements" (NLMs). U.N. funding and political support for armed guerrilla warfare, however, is not authorized by the U.N. Charter. The Charter, in fact, mandates that "all members shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security and justice are not endangered" (Chapter 1, Article 2, para. 3).

U.N. support of NLMs has been curiously selective. No backing, for instance, has been given to pro-Western national liberation movements, such as UNITA, now fighting a successful guerrilla war against the Marxist government of Angola. Nor has the U.N. been willing to recognize the non-Marxist representatives of the Palestinians or the democratic political parties of Namibia in southern Africa. Instead, the General Assembly recognized the PLO and SWAPO as the "sole" representatives of the Palestinian and Namibian peoples respectively.

U.N. support of guerrilla liberation movements ranges from gifts of food, housing, and health services to radio channels for broadcasting propaganda. Both SWAPO and the African National Congress (ANC) of South Africa make wide use of U.N.-sponsored radio propaganda broadcasts. Military arms, equipment, training, and advisors for these NLMs are provided by the USSR, Cuba, and Eastern Bloc nations. But much of their "humanitarian aid" comes from the U.N., with most of the money—about 65 percent—from the U.S. and other Western industrial democracies.

Probably more important than the actual aid and development projects is the international political legitimacy that official U.N. recognition confers on the NLMs. This is enjoyed by four Marxist guerrilla groups: the PLO, SWAPO, ANC, and the Pan-African Congress (PAC). This U.N. seal of approval gives them an unfair advantage over their political rivals at home in terms of money, aid projects, publicity, and international lobbying power not available to their competitors. It also distorts their image on the international scene—making them appear to be the true representatives of their respective peoples though, in reality, all four are fighting for political survival at home.

The PLO

Before attaining U.N. recognition, the PLO was viewed widely as an unpredictable and dangerous international terrorist organization. The world's law enforcement agencies, in fact, have had no reason to change their minds about that. But since Yassir Arafat's speech at the U.N. and the creation of two PLO-dominated U.N. committees—the Inalienable Rights Committee and the Special Unit on Palestinian Rights—the PLO can now wave its U.N. identification badge and claim legitimacy. This boosts its image among other Arabs.

The PLO enjoys full observer status at the U.N. Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the International Labor Organization (ILO), the World Health Organization (WHO), and the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO). The Special Unit on Palestinian Rights publishes pamphlets implicitly supporting the PLO as the only real representative of the Palestinians. One booklet, available in the U.N. bookstore and distributed to U.N. centers world wide, is entitled "The International Status of the Palestinian People." Lauding Arafat as a freedom fighter, it justifies his and the PLO's use of terrorism by noting how successful the "Palestinian Commandos" have been through terrorism in bringing the Palestinian question to the world's attention. In 1975, the PLO was invited to attend the Fifth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, held in Geneva, Switzerland. The U.S. National District Attorneys' Association was outraged and called for withdrawal of the invitation, quoting from PLO Spokesman, the group's official newspaper. Only months after the Munich massacre of Israeli Olympic athletes, the paper boasted in its September 1972 issue: "We have to kill the most famous. Since statesmen are difficult to kill as they are well protected, we have to kill artists and athletes." [5]

Gerhard O. W. Mueller, an American who is Executive Secretary of the U.N. crime prevention congress, refused to withdraw the invitation, citing the PLO's official U.N. observer status.

In 1977, the PLO was admitted to the U.N. Economic and Social Council's (ECOSOC) Commission for Western Asia. Never before had full membership status been given to a noncountry. To make matters worse, the PLO has been allowed to chair the Commission. PLO members and influence, moreover, pervade the U.N. Secretariat. "All the Palestinians working at the U.N. are members of the PLO," Zehdi Labib Terzi, the PLO's Permanent Observer at the U.N., told The Heritage Foundation.

U.N. legitimization of the PLO extends to funding. In the 1982-1983 U.N. biennial budget, the Committee for the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People is to receive $71,800. The Special Unit on Palestinian Rights has budgeted $6,156,500 for the two-year period.

Aside from this direct support, the U.N. indirectly supports the PLO via the U.N. Relief Works Agency (UNRWA). Of UNRWA's 17,000 worldwide employees, all but about 120 "international staff" are Palestinians. There is strong evidence that this organization, run almost entirely by Palestinians, is dominated by the PLO. There is further evidence that the PLO controls the U.N. Palestinian refugee camps. The Associated Press reported on June 18, 1979, that PLO terrorists controlled three Palestinian refugee camps around Tyre and Lebanon's southern and eastern outskirts. These are UNRWA camps. Even more conclusive of PLO use of U.N. refugee camps is the statement of the Lebanese Ambassador, Edward Ghorra, in a letter to former U.N. Secretary General Kurt Waldheim:

"The Palestinians increased the influx of arms into Lebanon . . . they transformed most of the refugee camps—if not all—into military bastions . . . the camps, in fact, became centers for the training of mercenaries sent and financed by other Arab states." [6]

UNRWA's annual budget is about $200 million. Most of that pays for over 600 Palestinian elementary schools, according to John Miles, director of the UNRWA's New York liaison office. Roughly $20 million a year goes to the camps in Lebanon.

Since it is highly likely the PLO plays a large role inside UNRWA, should the U.S., which contributed $62 million to UNRWA in 1981, continue to participate in the Palestinian refugee program? According to a recent survey,[7] 90.8 percent of Americans polled believe that Congress should cut off all funding for U.N. organizations that aid terrorist groups.

SWAPO

The U.N. General Assembly in 1976 recognized SWAPO as the "sole and authentic" representative of Southwest Africa, the South African trusteeship often known as Namibia. Yet SWAPO is but one of 45 political parties representing Namibia's one million people. It has a well-documented record of terrorist attacks against civilians dating from the late 1960s. Addressing the U.N. General Assembly in 1973, SWAPO Leader Sam Nujoma declared:

"I pledge here and now that we will continue to talk to South Africa in the only language they understand and that is intensification of armed liberation struggle . . .".

SWAPO enjoys U.N. recognition and support as much as the PLO does. SWAPO is invited to the international conferences of such U.N. specialized agencies as the International Labor Organization, Food and Agricultural Organization, World Health Organization, United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), and the Universal Postal Union. It benefits from the free international public relations service provided by the U.N. Department of Public Information. The resolution providing for free international public relations notes the need "to intensify the widespread and continuous dissemination of information on the struggle for liberation being waged by the people of Namibia, guided by their liberation movement, [sic] the SWAPO." Like the PLO, SWAPO relies heavily on the Soviet Union and the Eastern bloc nations for military equipment, supplies, and military training. For humanitarian aid, SWAPO turns to the U.N.

The U.N. and its specialized agencies allocated at least $40 million in direct or indirect aid to SWAPO between 1977 and 1981 and for programs beginning and continuing during 1982-1986. The U.S. contributes about 30 percent of this.

The United Nations Development Program budget for 1977-1981 earmarked $7,750,000 for SWAPO; another $7,750,000 has been recommended by UNDP officials for the 1982-1986 budget. UNDP will receive another $4,477,870 for Namibia via the Namibia Trust Fund. As the sole "national liberation movement" recognized by the U.N. for Namibia, SWAPO will play a leading role in the distribution of this sum. And the United Nations has a separate fund of about $8.8 million called "Aid to Refugees and National Liberation Movements," divided among the PLO, SWAPO, and the two

South African terrorist guerrilla groups, the ANC and the PAC.

Another $17.6 million is on the drawing boards via the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO). UNCTAD also has submitted a large proposal for national liberation funding, which would direct yet more funds to SWAPO, ANC, and PAC "to provide an opportunity for the leadership of the NLMs to be more fully acquainted with the activities of UNCTAD in the area of international economic relations" and to build up "management capacity of NLM cadres" (U.N. Document TD/B/WP/16, p. 20).

In the $17.6 million UNIDO proposal for training of industrial managers, the U.N. sketches its blueprint for helping SWAPO. The proposal is divided into three parts: pre-independence, transitional, and post-independence aid. This program, like all the U.N. programs for Namibia/SWAPO, takes place outside Namibia and is dominated by SWAPO recipients. Since the intent is to train the professional cadres of a future independent Namibia, why is SWAPO the main beneficiary of these programs? Why has the U.N. decided that in some future Namibia, these professionals will come from SWAPO's ranks? The U.N., in effect, is feeding, clothing, educating, and giving civilian training to the SWAPO guerrilla army. And the U.N. is also training SWAPO candidates as government functionaries for the day when SWAPO seizes the reins of power in Namibia. What about the non-SWAPO groups in Namibia? Why do they not qualify for help from the U.N.? Why are they victims of the U.N. double standard?

THE NEW INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC ORDER

Most effort at the U.N. goes toward establishing a New International Economic Order—a scheme devised by the Third World radicals to redistribute the wealth of developed countries. NIEO seeks to transfer to the developing states the economic resources of the industrial nations, especially the U.S., and to control the activities of Western businessmen.

The arguments underlying NIEO Permeate most of what the U.N. does. According to the 1982 Report of the U.N. Director General for Development and International Economic Cooperation, entitled "Towards the NIEO," the existing economic order—"which (is) characterized by inequality, domination, dependence, narrow self-interest and segmentation"—should be changed. The enemy is the free enterprise market economy. One of the earliest attempts to use the U.N. to transform rapidly the economics of the Third World was UNCTAD. Established in 1965 as a permanent body for formulating general rules on trade between developed and undeveloped countries, UNCTAD began working on so-called codes of conduct designed specifically to help non-Western nations. UNCTAD also served as midwife at the birth of the U.N. Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, adopted on December 12, 1974, by a General Assembly vote of 120 to 6 with 10 abstentions. The U.S. was among the tiny group of opponents. A new breed of international regulators uses this charter, along with the NIEO, to justify schemes for an elaborate system of redistribution, which would compel the U.S. to share its technological resources and output with the developing nations.

Another scheme designed to benefit the developing nations at potentially great cost to the Western industrial societies is the Code of Restrictive Business Practices, adopted by the General Assembly in 1980. This Code forces multinational corporations to sell their technology and know-how more cheaply and less efficiently for the benefit of the Third World nations.

Perhaps the most widely known effort on behalf of NIEO is the Law of the Sea Treaty. After eight years of fruitless negotiations, the U.S. delegation on April 30, 1982, refused to approve the Draft Convention of the Law of the Sea Treaty. A main reason for U.S. opposition to the treaty was the attempt by the developing nations, represented by a coalition commonly referred to as the Group of 77, to use the negotiations as part of their general effort to establish the NIEO. They insisted that the Sea Law Treaty be based on the notion that resources of the earth, particularly the deep seabed mineral deposits, were the "Common Heritage of Mankind," to be enjoyed by all even though the very high cost of developing these resources would be borne by the U.S. and a few other industrial states. This would amount to a massive redistribution of wealth and technology, conflicting with American concepts of private property, free enterprise, and competition.

Another target of U.N. regulatory activity is the pharmaceutical industry. During the past six years, four different U.N. entities—UNCTAD, the U.N. Center for Transnational Corporations, UNIDO, and the World Health Organization (WHO)—have been trying to control pharmaceuticals. Enactment by WHO of a code recommending regulation of breast-milk substitutes, for instance, has serious implications for the regulation of food products in general and drugs in particular. WHO is also planning to regulate drug quality by establishing a body that would, in effect, supersede the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. UNIDO, moreover, is trying to redistribute the revenues of the pharmaceutical companies by limiting royalties and prices; it is also seeking ways to obtain licensing information and technology transfer for the benefit of underdeveloped countries.

The economic offensive against the industrial nations shows no signs of abating. U.N. Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar of Peru has called on the U.N. to continue and accelerate its efforts at redistribution. In a December 15, 1981, speech, he noted that he was assuming his post at a time when "the longstanding initiative for the renewal of global negotiations between North and South is coming back within the purview of the U.N."

AMERICANS AT THE U.N.: AN ENDANGERED SPECIES

A frequently ignored problem facing the United States at the U.N. is the diminishing number of Americans in top-level, decision-making posts. Though the U.S. foots 25 percent of the U.N.'s bill, Americans occupy only 17.32 percent of selected professional staff in the Secretariat of the U.N. system.[8] The U.N. Secretary-General admits that the number of U.S. citizens in senior and policy-making U.N. posts is well below the "desirable" range—and falling.[9]

At first, personnel quotas mirrored the size of a nation's financial contribution to the organization. The developing countries, however, forced a reinterpretation of the U.N. Charter provision that stressed "equitable geographical distribution." The weight of financial contributions was reduced and now affects only 55 percent of the quota. According to O. Richard Nottidge, Deputy Director for Policy Coordination at the U.N. Personnel Office, this proportion is likely to continue to diminish. Not only the U.S. loses when the number of Americans at the U.S. dwindles. Though other nations have sent hardworking, well-qualified nationals to the U.N., Americans are widely acknowledged to be among the most efficient employees. In addition, according to a high-ranking American who has worked in the Secretariat almost since its inception, most other nationals, especially from the developing states of the Third World, "do not understand the profit motive," and thus are less inclined to save the U.N. money and run it in a businesslike fashion. Some Secretariat employees appear to assume that the U.N. is to be used for private gain; this practice seems more prevalent, or at least more obvious, among non-Americans. Nottidge also states that "Third World countries may have good, qualified people—but not necessarily available for employment by the U.N."

While the role of Americans at the U.N. is shrinking because of Third World pressure, Moscow's power probably is mounting. It is well known, for example, that the Soviet Union has violated Article 100 of the U.N. Charter by placing Soviet KGB agents in the Secretariat.[10] Two Soviet employees arrested by the FBI in 1979 were subsequently convicted of espionage. Former U.N. Secretary General Kurt Waldheim even appointed a KGB officer as head of Personnel in Geneva, where the U.N. now has more employees than at its New York headquarters. According to Arkady Shevchenko, the highest-ranking Soviet official in the U.N. before his defection in 1978, a very high percentage of Soviet delegates assigned to the U.N. Secretariat and other internationally staffed U.N. organizations, as well as the Soviets' own U.N. mission, report in one way or another to the KGB.

THE NONALIGNED

The major force at the U.N. is the group of so-called nonaligned nations. Despite its name, the group is strongly pro-Soviet. The Communist bloc and less developed nations may have quite diverging interests, but share an anti-imperialist and anti-capitalist rhetoric. This seems to supersede common sense and the reality of international relations.

An Asian diplomat, who wishes to remain anonymous for fear of Soviet reprisals against his country, told The Heritage Foundation that developing countries usually side with the Soviet Union, even though many realize that Moscow does not help them much. Moscow has a miserly foreign economic aid program. And when it does contribute to such efforts as the U.N. Development Program, it does so in rubles, a non-convertible currency capable mainly of buying Soviet products.

The pro-Soviet lobby at the U.N., apart from clients such as Angola, Cuba, Ethiopia, Mozambique, and Vietnam, consists of countries whose relationship with the USSR is more tenuous but which, for a variety of reasons, adopt a political stance that is more clearly anti-Western than it is pro-

Soviet. Third World and Soviet affinity, however, goes beyond philosophy and such issues as foreign aid. Writes veteran U.N. observer Arieh Eilan: this fact has wider implications than the mere use of similar political cliches in speeches and resolutions; it has affected the practice of parliamentary democracy in the U.N. and has gradually destroyed all claims of objective adjudication that its (the U.N.'s) Charter so clearly stipulates.[11]

The result is a remarkably pro-Soviet voting pattern at the U.N. among the nonaligned. The percentage of support for the Soviet Union during the 1981 General Assembly shows overall agreement to be 84.9 percent (compared with 25 percent average agreement with the U.S.).[12]

CONCLUSION

Through the U.N., the U.S. is inadvertently supporting Marxist guerrilla-terrorist groups. American taxpayer dollars are being used to promote the New International Economic Order. Americans are being passed over for U.N. Secretariat posts, while KGB agents, in violation of U.N. Charter, hold high positions. And a group of nations claiming to be "nonaligned" in reality almost always endorses the Moscow line.

These cases are among many examples of the United Nations gone awry. For good reason, therefore, the U.N. is more suspect than at any time in its history and American support for it is plummeting. There are valid and pressing questions as to whether the U.S. is benefiting from its expensive U.S. membership, given the anti-American, anti-Western, anti-industrial, anti-capitalist majority in the General Assembly. Is the U.S. getting any value for all that it is spending in resources and energy on the U.N.? These are questions that the Reagan Administration and the U.S. public must—with urgency—begin addressing.

GORDON KUTSCHER

(Mr. SKELTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, over the past weekend, I had the sad occasion of attending the funeral of a constituent and friend, Gordon Kutscher of Jefferson City, Mo. During a period spanning more than a decade I had grown to admire and respect this man for his significant accomplishments.

Gordon Kutscher combined qualities of quiet strength and a gentle manner in a way that brought him respect. He was a recognized leader in his profession, his church, and in his community. He developed his talents as a teacher to the point where he was selected as the first executive director of the Missouri Advisory Council on Vocational Education, a position he filled for nearly 14 years. He served his church and had served as the president of the Trinity Lutheran Church of Jefferson City. His efforts in the Optimist Club led to three terms as district secretary-treasurer and a term as Missouri District Governor.

With all of this professional and community activity I know that Gordon Kutscher's first responsibility was as a husband and father. He met those responsibilities with the same strength and caring attitude that brought him high public recognition.

Please allow me, Mr. Speaker, to use my statement today as a means to reflect upon Gordon Kutscher's accomplishments. I extend my sincere sympathy to his wife Ann and to his three sons.

UNILATERAL EMBARGOES: THE CART BEFORE THE HORSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, this evening, my colleague, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS) myself, and other Members both on and off the Agriculture Committee, those having an interest and a concern for various policies and procedures, bills and actions taken by our Federal Government in regard to agriculture will be participating in a special order.

Mr. Speaker, tonight we will be focusing again on the senseless Soviet attack on a Korean Air Lines jetliner, 007, which confirmed again the fundamental inhumanity of the Soviet Government. In the wake of the outrage, a strong defense against Soviet agression is more necessary than ever. Our response must be firm—and it must be a continuing one.

But some in the Congress and out have proposed a response to the KAL atrocity that would be precisely the wrong thing to do: An embargo on grain sales to the Soviet Union, or at least a cancellation of the recently signed long-term agreement governing grain and soybean sales. Unfortunately, a unilateral grain embargo is like Will Rogers' description of prohibition: It sounds good, but it will not work.

Several of my colleagues will shortly explain just why it will not work. I should like to take a moment to sketch the overall dimensions of the question.

Mr. Speaker, There are clearly circumstances in which trade sanctions should be imposed. But in the current debate, those who have called for a grain sales cutoff seem to have done so because they really could not think of much else to suggest. This is not a sound reason to impose an embargo. We have to ask ourselves not simply whether an embargo is an option open to us, but also what would be the likely consequences of exercising the option unilaterally.

If all nations that sell grain to the Russians agreed to join in a sales cutoff, and if all of them abided by that agreement, and if agriculture was not singled out, but was part of an across-the-board trade embargo—then this approach would hold some promise. Unfortunately, that is a great many "if's," and recent history teaches us that unilateral embargoes hurt Americans more than Soviets.

How quickly we seem to unlearn the lessons of the last few years. The 1980 Soviet grain embargo is estimated to have cost this Nation $11.4 billion in overall output and 310,000 jobs. More than 9 months passed before prices for wheat, corn, and soybeans returned to preembargo levels. Price supports triggered by postembargo conditions cost the U.S. taxpayers more than $2 billion. Again, in 1982, the pipeline sanctions proved ineffective and idled American workers while severely straining the Western alliance.

Several problems make agricultural trade an especially poor foreign policy tool under most circumstances:

First, alternate sources of the embargoed product are easy to find because farm goods are essentially undifferentiated and available from many sources. This is precisely what the Soviet Union did in 1980. U.S. sales were lost in the short term, and in the long run the U.S. embargo provided an incentive for other nations to expand their production and exports under the "umbrella" of our embargo.

Second, because food supplies are a unique and overriding requirement, importers put special emphasis on reliable sources of supply. The U.S. suffers from a reputation as an unreliable supplier, and this costs us sales.

Third, the price effects of embargoes in commodities markets are usually much more pervasive than in manufacturing sectors.

Fourth, once an embargo is imposed, the disincentive to lift it is great, because it would appear to be "sending the wrong signal."

Despite all these disadvantages, an embargo might work if America's allies were behind it. But this has been precisely the problem in the past, and would be today. It is deplorable that the West would not join in concerted action against the Soviet menace. But it is a fact. And when we see how difficult it was to get agreement on relatively painless civil aviation sanctions and Security Council resolutions, we must agree that there is no prospect of widespread compliance with any trade sanctions the United States might unilaterally impose.

Should we do it anyway as many argue? Would we really "short" the Soviet market if we withheld grain sales from the United States, a very legitimate question? The new long-term agreement calls on the Soviets to buy at least 9 million metric tons of grain from us annually. If we refused to honor our commitment, our major competitors could make up that shortfall by increasing their total exports just 12 percent. They could make up for our wheat sales by increasing their total wheat exports by less than 8 percent.

In the past, we have put the cart of trade embargoes before the horse of Western unity. This has been our basic mistake. We must build up the cohesion and will of the non-Communist nations, including our own. As their ultimate defender, the United States must also be these nations' moral leader. But we do not fulfill that role by trade cutoffs in the absence of any discernible consensus whatever.

American farmers are patriots and will shoulder their part of the common defense burden. But they should not be singled out to bear the whole brunt of an embargo that cannot succeed. To waste our resources in this way would not be a rational response to Soviet aggression. It would simply weaken the most basic industry—agriculture—in a nation that is still the last, best hope for freedom: The United States, whose laws we in Congress are charged to make not with emotion but with the best wisdom we can muster.

Let us rededicate ourselves to a strong defense in the wake of the Soviets' brutal act. And let us rededicate ourselves also to a real and measurable strengthening of the Western alliance—not in force of arms only, but in force of will. But let us be ever mindful that an action against an enemy should be more than a noble gesture: It should hold some promise of having an effect. Experience teaches us that a unilateral grain embargo would not meet this test.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STENHOLM. I would be happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS).

Mr. ROBERTS. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I along with my good friend and colleague from Texas, Mr. STENHOLM, have requested this special order in an effort to educate our colleagues on why sanctions of this order and embargoes that single out one sector of the economy are not an appropriate response to the Soviets' downing of the Korean Air Lines flight 007.

In the broader picture, unilateral sanctions and trade disruptions are not appropriate foreign policy tools in a world that depends on trade and the free flow of goods between countries.

The savage downing of the Korean Air Lines jet has renewed the debate over the use of economic sanctions as a weapon in our foreign policy arsenal. Members of the media, some in Congress and, according to poll results, a majority of the citizens of the United States responded to the Soviets' act of barbarism with calls for immediate cancellation or suspension of grain sales made under the recently signed long-term grains agreement.

It is downright amazing how quickly we forget the lessons learned in recent years in the foreign policy and trade arena when it comes to imposing economic and trade sanctions. In the last decade, beginning with the Nixon administration, through the Ford administration, the Carter administration, and the Reagan administration, the foreign policy experts at the State Department and other agencies in the Federal Government have, with amazing regularity, pushed for trade sanctions to modify the behavior of other nations' conduct of foreign policy. Just as regularly, these policies have failed.

The most disastrous trade sanction tried in recent years was the Carter grain embargo of 1980. This grain embargo was the Carter administration's response to the invasion of Afghanistan. Unfortunately, the Carter embargo cost the nonfarm sector of the U.S. economy an estimated $11.4 billion in overall national output, 310,000 jobs, and $3.1 billion in personal income. The impact on the American farmer was that net farm income plummeted from $33 billion in 1979 to around $18 billion in current years.

Before the grain embargo, the United States supplied as much as 70 percent of the grain purchased by the Soviets. Last year we supplied just over 30 percent of their imported grain, and this year the percentage will decline even further. The 1980 grain embargo did little more than encourage our competitors to stimulate grain production. Argentina, Brazil, and Canada have all seized upon this opportunity and increased their production and exports to the Soviet Union. The European Common Market—particularly France—now supplies wheat to the U.S.S.R. whereas before they had an insignificant share of that market. Five countries now have long-term agreements with the Soviets that lock them into hard currency sales of bulk commodities.

In my view, the Soviet grain embargo was little more than symbolism. After substantial hardship was forced on the American economy and the American farmer, the simple fact remains that today, over 3 years later, the Soviets are still in Afghanistan. In nearly everyone's eyes, the embargo failed. But, yet there are those who want to go down that trail again.

I would hasten to add that this administration's record is not spotless when it comes to the use of economic sanctions. Last year the President tried to pressure our allies and the Russians by imposing sanctions on the export of technology that was being used in the construction of the natural gas pipeline. That effort failed. The pipeline is still being built. The real loser was Caterpillar and other American firms who had contracts to supply equipment for the pipeline. However, I would credit this administration with the fact that there has not been a knee jerk reaction to the airlines incident and the imposition of an embargo on grain sales. It is unfortunate that some Members of this body want to reimpose grain embargoes.

More to the point, this administration is just now beginning to repair some of the damage done by the 1980 grain embargo in terms of replacing market shares lost to other countries. The current cost of the farm program can, in part, be traced to the oversupply caused by the grain embargo. The last 3 years of declining farm income can be traced in part to the 1980 grain embargo.

America's reliability as a trading partner has suffered as a result of repeated use of trade sanctions over the last decade. No longer can our trading partners be totally sure that U.S. firms can honor their contracts and commitments. Certainly, the contract sanctity legislation that has been adopted in recent years has helped restore some of America's reliability as a trading partner, but with the news media and Members of Congress advocating the use of sanctions, I am sure potential purchasers of U.S. goods wonder if the contract they sign will be good.

I urge my colleagues to think of the consequences of imposing another selective embargo. The farm economy is beginning just now to see some light at the end of the tunnel. Due to the drought and the payment-in-kind program, we are seeing some improvement in farm prices. This will translate into better net farm income this year. This may mean that farmers will begin to purchase farm machinery, trucks, tractors. This will translate into jobs for the laid-off steelworker and the laid-off auto workers. It will translate into a more vigorous and healthy economy. Too often too many members of this body forget that when the farmer is healthy, so is the rest of the economy.

Mr. Speaker, back in 1980, President Carter, in response to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, took his grain embargo ax and gave the farmer 40 whacks.

Today, unfortunately, after seeing what the Soviets have done in the tragic murder of 269 people in shooting down Korean Air Lines flight 007, we have some in the Congress who want to give the farmer 41.

Unfortunately, we are getting used to this kind of treatment. And, I must say that from an emotional standpoint, and from a symbolic standpoint, imposing a grain embargo on the Soviet Union makes some sense. And, I want to make it clear that the farmer-stockman reacted with the same kind of anger and frustration and grief shared by all Americans following the Soviet's gunning down of the innocent victims of flight 007.

I understand the frustration and the anger. I share it. It prompted one columnist within the Washington Post to say, "At least Carter did something." Last Sunday, the Post carried a lengthy opinion piece claiming our agricultural exports represent little more than "hawking our grain" at the expense of our environment, farmers, and consumers. The New York Times sampled public opinion to find a majority favored another grain embargo.

In the other body, Senators MOYNIHAN, LEVIN, and BYRD could not wait to hold press conferences to indicate their willingness to use our grain to protest Soviet aggression. In this body, Congressmen WEAVER and FLORIO and others hurried to introduce resolutions calling for the suspension of the new long-term grain agreement with the U.S.S.R.

Immediately after the tragedy, the national media washed and dried and recycled every possible policy option this country could take. Once again, the selective use of agriculture and the farmer as a foreign policy tool headed the list. I understand all of this. I also understand the comment from one acquaintance of mine who said, "If the wheat farmer has to depend upon selling grain to the Soviet Union in order to make a living, maybe it's time for him to find another job." Or even more to the point, the comment that everyone was for a grain embargo except for some crybaby farmers. Crybaby farmers.

Let us talk about those crybaby farmers for a minute and what actually happened in farm country when all of this talk was taking place—not an actual embargo mind you, just the talk of an embargo.

In the first place, during that week of debate immediately following the shooting down of flight 007, the temperature was still setting record highs and no moisture was in sight out on the High Plains, 110°, 115°, 118°. That farmer got up at the crack of dawn to check his cattle tank and doubtlessly turned on the radio to get the morning market report. As it turned out, there was not any market. He learned the Russians had shot down a Korean passenger plane and already there was talk of another embargo.

Let us take it a step further and say he had already scheduled a session with his banker to determine if he could rework his loan coming due. If he was like most farmers in my county, he survived the last year by the skin of his teeth. He is now following a strict marketing timetable dictated by his banker. With his payment-in-kind grain and a good yield this year, he is just able to pay taxes and juggle his bills.

I might add he has been down this road before. There have been two grain embargoes with Ford and Carter, a beef price freeze under Nixon, consumer boycotts, truck and dock strikes, unbelievable interest rates, and despite what they say on the news about inflation, the cost of everything he has to have to stay in business continues to go up while his market continues at depression levels.

Add to that a current farm program that is not working, costing too much, and almost impossible for a farmer to pencil out, let alone explain to his consumer cousins.

All right, he gets in his old pickup and heads for the local elevator to find wheat prices already off the limit. He thinks, surely someone in Washington has learned from past experience that embargoes do not work, that restrictions on grain sales when other countries take up the slack make no sense, that while farmers went bankrupt the Russian troops were still in Afghanistan.

But now, the Soviets have murdered some 269 people, and folks, understandably, want the President to take action, any action. Now, this young man would also probably be a Vietnam veteran. He is also a patriot who loves his country and would fight for his and his neighbor's individual freedom. He knows about his counterpart in Poland. He knows about the Soviets exporting arms and revolution in Central America. He knows this President is making every effort to get our military back into shape. If the President wanted to send a real message to the Soviets and embargo everything, the whole works, fine. If push came to shove, he would go along with that.

Chances are when he left the elevator, he went to the local cafe where there were more pickups. Chances are most of those folks were wondering aloud about their immediate and long-term future given the fact Senators and Congressmen were falling all over themselves suggesting this Nation use their grain as a means of protest. And, that young farmer probably found out he and his banker really could not make any decision on his future given the political situation in Washington.

May I suggest to my colleagues and the press and all of those folks who write those public policy reports with all of those 35-cent words—this is not a spectator sport. Those are real farmers out there and what you say and suggest has an immediate effect upon their income. I did not hear anyone suggesting Senator LEVIN's auto workers or Senator BYRD's coal miners sacrifice a significant part of their income to finance reparations for those who lost their lives, a stronger military response, or some additional U.N. action to change the Soviet airspace policy. That would be ridiculous. But in the case of the farmer, that is precisely what some say he should do.

At the end of the week following the downing of flight 007, I would imagine our young farmer friend woke up at dawn, if he got any sleep at all, he tried to pick up the all-news station from Texas, I imagine he fumbled around in the kitchen to get some coffee started, he probably stared at his bills and his bookwork on the kitchen table that he has to take to his banker sometime, and no matter which way he figured it, the result would be the same. Unless there was some turnaround in the next few months or a year, he is going to have to sell part of his home place or he is going out of business or he is not going to make it. His hometown banker will not be able to carry him any longer.

I would imagine with all the talk about the embargo and trade sanctions and the like, he would think Washington was trying to tell him something; that he should not be in the farming business; that this talk about how the country needed young family farmers was just that, talk. After all, his dad probably told him that when he took over the family operation.

At the same time that my colleagues were in this well giving 1-minute speeches and introducing resolutions calling for this response and that response, he was probably staring out the kitchen window looking across the prairie with worry on his brow and pain in his eyes, just another crybaby farmer.

Such talk, my colleagues, is not cheap or without sacrifice in farm country.

Mr. HIGHTOWER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STENHOLM. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HIGHTOWER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in firm support of what my distinguished colleagues have previously stated about the futility of imposing a grain embargo on the Soviet Union or canceling the new long-term grain sales agreement as an irresponsible and ineffective response to the downing of Korean Air Lines flight 007.

We all condemn the Soviet Union's brutal and barbaric act of needlessly taking the lives of so many innocent people. However, some of our colleagues are insisting on useless symbolic gestures, which have been proven to be more harmful to the United States than to the Soviets, as a means of retaliation. The record indicates that trade sanctions simply do not work. Secretary of Agriculture John Block has gone so far as to characterize President Carter's 1980 embargo as "a case study in failure." I hoped that everyone learned a lesson from the embargo of 1980, which is believed by many experts to have been more damaging to the economy of our own country than to that of the Soviet Union's. By not honoring our current agreement with the Soviets and refusing to sell any of our grain, we would inform our farmers and the remainder of our economy that we in Congress failed to heed the recent lesson in history which clearly demonstrated that grain embargoes do not work. The Carter grain embargo on January 4, 1980, which was designed to be a protest of the Russian invasion of Afghanistan, much of the recent cry for an embargo to protest Russia's downing of KAL 007, was a dismal failure. The Soviet Union subsequently imported more grain than it did in any other year in its history, indicating the failures of such actions.

There are a number of reasons why the Carter embargo failed, the same which would bring about the failure of a new grain embargo. Embargoes simply will not work with fungible commodities such as grain, especially when the other sources of supply are so eager to accept any share of the Soviet market which the United States has chosen to hand them. It would be extremely bad judgment on our part to predict that others will buy our bad economic decision to once again impose an ineffective embargo on the Soviets.

Our call for unity among other grain-producing nations during the Carter embargo was met with outraged refusal from Argentina, patent lipservice from Canada, and sulky compliance from France. Nobody likes to play follow the leader when the leader declares a policy of punishing the enemy by beating himself over the head. The facts are these: Australia tripled its grain exports to the U.S.S.R. from 1979 to 1980; Canada doubled its Soviet grain exports; the European Common Market was charged by its own Parliament with undercutting the embargo effort by tripling its exports of total farm products to the Soviets in 1980, and Argentina nearly quadrupled its 1980 grain exports to the Soviet Union.

This year Canada, Australia, and the European Economic Community have harvested record or near-record crops, placing them in a very strong position to take over any portion of the Soviet market which we might relinquish via an embargo. These competing countries have also strengthened their hold on the Soviet market even more by signing trade agreements which will make it even more difficult to regain the 70-percent share of the Soviet grain export market which we enjoyed before the Carter embargo. Following the embargo our share of the Soviet market plunged to around 13 percent. Last year we recovered to about 30 percent, but all indications are that this year our share will decline even further.

Embargoes not only hurt our farmers, they also damage the entire U.S. economy. While the initial effects of the Carter embargo were partly offset by increased exports to other countries, losses to industry, Government, and farmers were substantial. Estimates indicate that: Our inland transportation industry lost $120 to $175 million in reduced freight business, the U.S. balance of payments lost up to $2.5 billion directly from reduced exports and up to $1.9 billion from lower unit values of all U.S. grain exports in 1980 and most of 1981. The Government incurred costs of $1.5 billion for acquisition of additional commodities, $1 billion for interest, storage, and handling of these commodities, and $375 million in the form of target price payments to wheat farmers. The largest impacts, however, are those that take into account not only the sectors which were directly affected, but producer and consumer sectors on a national basis. Estimates place these losses at $11.4 billion in overall national output, 310,000 jobs, and $3.1 billion in personal incomes earned in the U.S.

In its recently released report, "Technology and East-West Trade: An Update," the Office of Technology Assessment of the U.S. Congress stated that it is unlikely that sanctions and embargoes against the U.S.S.R. "have hurt enough to make a real difference." As for any symbolism generated by the embargo, the study indicates that the "messages sent to the U.S.S.R. have been unclear; and the U.S.S.R. may itself have benefited from the disruptions in the western alliance precipitated by U.S. policies."

I hope that my colleagues in the House will recognize the futility of such actions. An embargo of U.S. grain simply ignores the structure of the international grain market. American farmers have an enormous stake in exports. In 1982, the U.S. exported over $39.1 billion in agricultural commodities and had an agricultural trade surplus of $23.7 billion. One in three acres of U.S. farmland produces for the export market, with two-thirds of our wheat and over half of our cotton, soybeans, and rice sold into the export market. Put simply, exports are a very important key to American agricultural profitability. Restricting the exports of U.S. grain creates more market opportunity for other nations and puts an unjust foreign policy tax on U.S. agriculture and the rest of the economy. Rather, I would like to suggest looking at the positive aspects of continuing grain sales. Every dollar spent by Soviets for American grain is a dollar that is not spent for arms. It is time the United States stopped using the farmer and his grain as tools of foreign policy. Let us not forget that our quarrel is with the Soviet Government and leaders, not with the Russian people who are deprived and perhaps denied food by the failure to provide regular shipments of grain from the United States.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague and my neighbor from Texas for a very informative and helpful contribution to this special order.

I think the gentleman said a couple things that bear repeating. Three hundred and ten thousand jobs were lost as a result of the 1980 grain embargo. That is 310,000 American men and women who do not have jobs today because of the last time we imposed such unilateral sanctions.

Another point that I would like to emphasize is that the Soviets do pay in cash. Many times in the past they have paid in gold, but it is cash sales and that is more than we can say about much of the rest of the current agricultural trade in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. FRANKLIN).

Mr. FRANKLIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for yielding.

I want to take this opportunity to commend the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM), and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS) in taking the initiative on this most important issue to American farmers.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to this issue as a representative of a district which is as heavily agricultural as any district in America. Cotton, soybeans, and rice are the foundation of our total economy in Mississippi, and the success or failure of those agricultural commodities sends shock waves throughout the business community of my district.

Four times in the past 10 years our farmers, along with the farmers of the United States, have been told by our Government that they cannot export all of the products that they produce. When you consider that 1 out of every 3 acres planted in this country is planted for the export market, it is easy to see the devastating impact of any agricultural embargo.

Our country's reputation as a reliable supplier is, of course, diminished, and our direct economic loss is indeed substantial. In 1980 alone, the embargo cost our Nation over $11 billion in total output, along with many thousands of jobs, as my colleagues have indicated earlier. The price supports on the farm programs cost the taxpayers over $2 billion, and at the same time farm prices declined, and they stayed down for almost a year after that embargo was imposed.

We enacted that embargo, as we all know, to punish the Soviet Union. I believe it is interesting to note just how the Soviet Union responded to all that punishment we dished out. Very simply, they merely went somewhere else to buy what they wanted, and they found willing suppliers all over the world. Canada doubled their grain exports, Australia tripled theirs; the European common market tripled its exports, and Argentina quadrupled its exports of agricultural commodities. And if that embargo has accomplished its goal of getting the Soviets out of Afghanistan, I am certainly not aware of that fact.

So, while our Government has doled out all this punishment to the Soviets, our farmers have seen their foreign markets slowly but surely slip away. Reclaiming our percentages of those markets may well prove to be an impossible task now.

As long as our farmers continue to produce more and better crops, we as a Government have to do everything we can to remove any obstacles standing between our producers and their foreign markets. The fact of the matter is that we must try to sell our agricultural products to every major market of the world, no matter how repugnant that buyer's actions might be to us at home.

The hard realities of the marketplace, both domestic and internationally, demand that we do just that. If we are to have a firm and effective farm policy, Mr. Speaker, then we must respond firmly to outrageous activities by foreign nations. We have got to do that. Certainly a policy which serves primarily as a cause for economic chaos in the farm belt is hardly an effective one for us to take as a Nation.

We have used our farmers as political pawns before and it simply did not work. It did not work in the past, it will not work today, and I urge my colleagues to consider the real consequences of embargo politics. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. STENHOLM. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for his contribution.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STENHOLM. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Kansas.

I have been asked the question in the last couple of days why are we doing this, given the fact that this administration has made it clear: An embargo will not be invoked.

The answer to that is very simple. There are many of those here in the House who do not share that view, who, if they had their opportunity to present the legislation they have already introduced, we would be debating this very issue tomorrow afternoon.

So, the question is not dead at all. The question is before us, and I think that were it not for our demonstration of unanimity among farm States, that we again would be facing this issue itself in the form of an amendment or the form of a resolution in the very near future.

So, I think it is to the credit of the congressional forum that we bring this issue up, that we consider it in a very serious way.

I commend the administration for their position on this issue. They were under very serious pressure early on to do what past administrations have done, and that is to invoke an embargo in the wake of an international crisis. But there is a fundamental rule, and that rule, I think, ought to be clear and uppermost in the minds of all of us each and every time one of these situations occurs. And that is whatever sanctions, whatever kind of retribution we as a country apply, has to hurt them more than it hurts us. That is fundamental.

There are those in this House who disregard that rule. There are those in this House who believe that regardless of what pain it may inflict on us, that it is imperative that we show what economic muscle we can utilize in situations such as the Korean Air Lines incident.

Well, to them I would offer this reminder. We as a Nation, an economic power, must demonstrate international credibility. We owe the international community the assurance that, regardless of what international tension there may be, we will be a credible supplier of products, regardless of what they are.

We also need to insure that producers around this country can depend upon this Government for the continuity that they must have in farm export policy. I have had more than one farmer tell me that there is only one thing more unpredictable than the weather, and that is the Federal Government and its policy.

Well, I do not think there is any question about that. In the last few years our lack of continuity has been devastating on the farmers; it has been devastating on the markets. And I think it has been devastating to our international reputation.

A South Dakota farmer once told me in a conversation I had, not too long ago, that even if it does hurt them more than it hurts us he would be willing to suffer through the consequences, if one thing happened. That one thing would be that they not be singled out, that, as farmers, they would not once again be asked to bear the brunt of the kind of economic retribution that we so often want to impose. So do our friends—whether they are within the agricultural sector or the international sector, I think it is imperative that we make that statement loud and clear. Farmers are willing to accept their share of the responsibility as long as they are not to be singled out.

I think a recommendation I received not too long ago from some farmers in South Dakota made a lot of sense. That recommendation was that, rather than have an embargo, why would it not be in our best interests to get an agreement among all farm-exporting nations that we would add a surcharge onto every bushel of wheat and every agricultural product of any kind sold to the Soviet Union. That surcharge would then be used to pay, at least in part, the reparation to the families of the victims in the loss of the jet airliner. I think it makes a great deal of sense.

But we have to do more than just prohibit an embargo. We have to do more than simply say that we are going to rely upon exports, if indeed we look to some kind of continuity in the future. What we have to have is a long-term farm program that does not rely on the Soviet Union, that does not rely on any one country for the kind of economic prosperity for which we all look in the future.

We need exports. On that there is no question. We need research. On that there can be no question, as well. But I believe that we also need a strong and a well-thought-out, supply-management program that goes hand in hand with an export program.

So, let us loudly proclaim our opposition to the embargo. Let us hope that grain embargoes are now behind us, and let us develop a plan in which we are not dependent upon one country, we are not dependent upon one form of market enhancement. Let us, instead, depend upon a comprehensive plan in which we can look for some continuity, for some credibility, and for some confidence to the future.

I thank the gentleman for the time.

Mr. STENHOLM. I thank the gentleman from South Dakota.

I think the gentleman from South Dakota mentioned one point I would like to reiterate at this point. That is the question as to why focus the attention on a grain embargo today. He focused on it. And I would just point out, and I think our colleague from Nebraska will go a little more in depth to this in just a moment, that we have the Export Administration Act. It was due on the floor sometime in the next

2 weeks. We had to have a special bill today just to get us past October 1, because the current act expires as of October 1.

There are many suggested amendments floating around. The concern of the agricultural community is not only acts of commission, which an embargo is, but also acts of omission in which adding language to contracts, adding language to the Export Administration Act, that will again run up a warning flag as to whether or not contracts signed by American businessmen will mean what they say. It is better known as contract sanctity. And it is an issue that we must pay more attention to.

In the agricultural community we have been very concerned about past embargoes, and now we find ourselves with concern as to whether or not we are going to add language that will again cause concern and cause our customers and prospective customers to be looking for other markets.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DASCHLE. I appreciate the gentleman bringing up that particular case. I think there are going to be several different kinds of opportunities in which those, who support embargoes, can do so. And I think that they may be under the mistaken notion that Congressmen who represent farmers cannot agree on anything, that farmers, if they ever organized in a firing squad, would form in a circle. It is probably true in many instances. But I do not think there ought to be any question that when it comes to an embargo, there is almost unanimous support among the Democrats and Republicans, conservatives, and liberals, in terms of the effort that we would put forth in defeating any kind of an amendment of that kind.

So, I think that while we may have our differences of opinion on just about everything else, there is almost unanimity of opinion when it comes to an embargo. And I think that unanimity would be expressed in opposition each and every time an amendment would be offered.

Mr. WOLFE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STENHOLM. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STENHOLM. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. EMERSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to, first of all, commend the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Kansas for leading this dialog here this afternoon. I think it has been very enlightening in many respects.

As I travel about my own district and my State and run into people from all walks of life, I am very frequently asked the question, Why do we want to continue feeding the Russians after they have committed atrocities such as that of the Korean Air Lines flight 007? I always respond that it has nothing to do with our wanting to feed the Russians; it has to do with the fact that markets do exist in the world, and that if we are not filling them, others are very likely to.

I think the discussion we have had here this afternoon, this dialog, I hope will go a long way to informing the public that it is not our desire to do anything necessarily to favor the Russians but that we do live in a real world, further illustrating the fact that our experience with embargoes over the course of the past 10 years has been absolutely devastating to the agricultural economy of this country and to our own American producers and to many other related industries.

If embargoes are to be applied I think that most farmers would see some merit to them providing the embargoes were across the board and that agriculture was not singled out to pay the price and pay the price alone.

But I think in addition to that there would have to be another element and that is that our allies would have to act in concert with us. It would not be fair for us to impose an embargo and have our erstwhile allies in the world rush in as they have so many times in the past to fill the market that we are giving up.

I have, in conjunction with this effort, since the issue arose now several weeks ago introduced a sense of the Congress resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 174, saying that it is the sense of the Congress that there shall be no embargo unless it is across the board and unless it is adhered to by our allies as well as by ourselves.

I am pleased to say, having introduced that resolution last Friday, that we now have 40 cosponsors. The gentleman from South Dakota alluded to the fact that on this issue we have a lot of Republicans and a lot of Democrats, a lot of liberals and a lot of conservatives agreeing. That is true. Of the 40 cosponsors that we now have on this House concurrent resolution, 20 are Republicans and 20 are Democrats, and I think the full ideological spectrum of the House of Representatives is represented here.

So I want to take this opportunity to encourage others of my colleagues who may not already be on the resolution to join with us. We want to have as many cosponsors as we can and hopefully we can get some action on this resolution.

The gentleman from Texas has pointed out that this administration certainly has no intention of imposing an embargo but there are forces at work in the national media, in the House and in other quarters that think that that is the right way to go.

I think that we in the Congress have an obligation on behalf of not only our agricultural producers but all of those interested in this subject to say that no unilateral embargoes, embargoes that are not participated in by our allies, are going to happen again.

We are not going to shoot ourselves in the foot again.

I thank the gentleman for yielding and once again commend him and the gentleman from Kansas on their very fine efforts in this matter.

Mr. STENHOLM. I thank the gentleman for his comments in addition to his discussion. I think too many who might be listening or watching or maybe reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on this discussion may be thinking, well, cetainly here is a group of Congressmen representing their special interest: Agriculture.

I would plead guilty to that.

I represent a very rural, a very agricultural district. But I would also point out to those that may not recognize, that even in a district in west Texas, 35 counties, 33,000 square miles, the percent of my constituents who are farmers is less than 8 percent.

So what we are talking about is yes, a special interest, but it is a special interest to all of America because if you eat you are involved in agriculture. When we make decisions at the Federal level that affect us as embargoes in the past have indeed affected this industry, it has impact on everyone.

We have heard about the loss of jobs in the agricultural sector. Let us also recognize the figures now are estimated in regard to the embargo on pipeline equipment, sanctions on the shipment of heavy equipment to the Soviet Union in regard to the gas pipeline, in that instance we are now estimating 15,000 lost jobs in that one instance alone and that is nonagricultural. But it pertains directly to what we are talking about and the recognition that whatever we do, certainly the agricultural community stands ready to stand arm in arm with all of America in doing those things necessary to make certain that America provides our rightful leadership in the free world.

That is what we are trying to focus on.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STENHOLM. I now yield to my colleague from Missouri (Mr. SKELTON).

Mr. SKELTON. I thank my friend from Texas for yielding.

I also wish to compliment him on taking out this special order tonight on this very important issue.

You know, back in Missouri we have a saying that it is not so bad if you step in the hole the first time but it is the second time when you step in that same hole that it is pretty bad.

We not only have a situation here that is potentially stepping in the hole a second time, it is stepping in that hole a third time. You see, we have already had two agricultural embargoes, one under a Republican President and another under a Democratic President. This is, of course, and has been a serious problem for agriculture and farmers in America.

I think that we should not have an embargo. I was appalled to see a leader of the United States Congress the day after the tragedy that occurred to Korean flight 007 urging an agricultural embargo against the Soviet Union.

It took us some 2 years to get an agreement again dealing with grain with the Soviets and here is a leader asking that we forgo that.

What has happened as a result of the previous embargoes was a disaster to the American farmer. Many people across our land do not understand the impact it had on our economy or the impact it has upon agriculture in our Nation, but the farmer knows. You ask him about it and he will know.

I think we should live up to our word. I think we should step forward and produce and live up to the agreement.

An embargo does not do anyone any good. It hurts the American farmer. It does not assist us in our fight against communism and tyranny.

The farmers in this country have had a difficult time, as we all know, for the last 3 years. Then we have a situation now where there are those who want to impose another embargo and cause them to even have more difficult times.

The farmer in this country allows us to have the best bargain in the world and that bargain is the food that we eat here in this country. It is the food that we can export and do export. It is food at a reasonable price.

A recent survey showed that we in America spend only some 12 percent of our income for food as opposed to 26 percent, 52 percent or, in some cases, 72 percent of national income for food in some other countries.

The farmer needs to get back on his feet and an embargo is not the way. It would be counterproductive.

What we need is to go in the other direction. We have seen in the past 3 years a falling in the agricultural exports from this country. That has been a disaster to our agricultural economy and it has been a disaster to our smalltown economy. Small towns, as you know, depend upon the agricultural economy to be strong and, of course, when the smalltown economy is strong, large-town, city economies are strong, and it is all so interwoven. That is why we must do our very best to rebuild the agricultural exports that we once had and do a better job.

Agriculture is the largest industry in America. It is larger than the automobile industry, the steel industry, and the housing industry all combined. We must do our best to make sure that we increase that industry rather than sit by and watch it slowly die.

I am concerned that as we have been approaching the election year next year I have not seen the great debate develop over agriculture and the need for agricultural exports. I think this is something that should be discussed and discussed at length by those who are interested in either maintaining or obtaining the White House in this country.

We have the greatest potential economically in the area of agricultural exports and we are not taking advantage of it.

This is something that I hope those who are aspiring to the White House will look forward to and participate in.

I think those of us here in this body should do our best to see that the American consumer understands that this is something that will assist them in building up our economy because, you know, it all starts back on the farm.

If the farmer is doing well, he is going to buy that new tractor or the new automobile or the new dress for his wife, or the new shoes for his children.

This of course in turn causes the economy of a small town and in turn the economy of the large city to turn into something that is stronger and more viable.

So let the great debate begin on the need for agricultural exports.

I compliment the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM) for giving us this opportunity. I hope that today will be a landmark day in urging those who are interested in this issue to continue to spread the word so that all across America they will understand the need, not to go backward in an embargo, but to go forward to increase our agricultural exports in the days ahead.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Missouri for a very enlightening contribution to this debate tonight. I think he makes a very good point, one which I think I can safely say all who are participating tonight, Members of the Agricultural Forum, a group that has just been formed of those Members interested in agriculture, in our policies, what we do, whether we serve on the committee or serve on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on which we will hear from our colleague in just a moment; it is a subject in which we are all interested.

This group will be talking about the issues, tonight it is embargo, next week or next month we can talk about future farm legislation, export trade. There has been some excellent work recently done in the media questioning whether or not we ought to be exporting at all. We are exporting our water, we are exporting our energy that we do not have in great abundance in this country.

A lot of people have asked us why export at all? I think there are some very good answers as to why we export at all, when we think in terms of $35 billion in value which helps cut our trade deficit this year by $15 billion. In the past 3 or 4 years we have had trade surpluses in agriculture of $20 billion a year. It is something of national significance. It does need to have the opportunity to talk about the various alternatives.

At this time I would be pleased to yield to my colleague from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER).

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include related tables.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I begin by thanking the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM) for yielding to me. I would like to pay special tribute to the gentleman (Mr. STENHOLM) and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS), for the leadership they have shown in providing an opportunity for concerned Members tonight to develop what I think will be collectively a very important statement for our colleagues and for the American public on the question of the appropriateness or inappropriateness of grain embargoes and embargoes of agricultural products generally.

Certainly I think a number of excellent statements have been made here tonight.

I would also like to mention that I am very pleased to be a part of the effort begun by the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Texas in bringing together people who are interested in the best interests of the country as expressed through our concerns for agribusiness and agriculture.

And to my colleague from Missouri (Mr. EMERSON) for offering House Concurrent Resolution 174 of which I am proud to be a cosponsor.

Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration recently faced a most difficult international incident with the downing of the Korean airliner. In marked contrast with the past, however, the United States President did not attempt to punish the Soviets for their aggression and brutality with rash counterproductive export controls.

Rather, the President kept his promise. He remembered the painful lessons of the past. Instead of applying symbolic—but ineffectual—export controls, the President acted responsibly and thoughtfully by working with the other nations of the world to formulate a firm, continuing and apt expanding international response.

Regrettably, some other national leaders have not learned the necessary lesson. In a quest for a meaningful response to this latest act of Soviet barbarism, they have chosen to advance the most meaningless solution, a termination of the long-term agreement for the sale of United States grain to the U.S.S.R.

I hope that my colleagues and I, by taking to the well today, can quell permanently the possibility of such a response from this body or any other responsible national leader.

At first blush, the termination of sales agreements sounds like a logical way to "punish" another nation which engages in conduct of which we disapprove. Through a denial of this trade "benefit," supposedly that party or nation will be encouraged to alter its behavior to conform with the desired norm, so that the desired trade benefit will be restored.

A closer look at our past use of such "punishment" reveals that such actions have backfired. The targeted intended nation has been little affected while U.S. farmers, ranchers, and business owners have been dealt a staggering blow by the embargo boomerang.

The partial grain embargo of 1980, a response to Soviet moves in Afghanistan, offers a classic example of the folly of unilateral embargoes.

Under our 5-year agreement with the U.S.S.R., that nation could have purchased 918 million bushels (25 million metric tons) of grain and soybeans in 1980. By limiting Soviet purchases to the 294 million bushels (8 million metric tons) specified in the 5-year agreement, the 1980 embargo thrust upwards of 625 million bushels (17 million metric tons) of grain back on the market. Restrictions on the export of other commodities were applied as well. U.S. poultry producers, for example, lost an order for 65,000 metric tons of chicken. (Unlike grain producers, however, they went uncompensated for their losses.) Obviously, prices plunged immediately.

To take a closer look at the impact of the embargo on just one industry—the soybean industry—one can see the damage that was done. That industry lost 1.3 million metric tons of sales, causing prices to drop by almost $1 a bushel in the weeks following the embargo. Over $1 billion in lost inventory value was never recovered.

Schnittker Associates, in its study for the National Corn Development Foundation, estimated that the embargo cost the United States:

First, $11.4 billion in total lost U.S. output;

Second, 310,000 jobs;

Third, $3.1 billion in reduced personal income;

Fourth, $1.5 billion for acquisition of commodities by the Federal Government and $1 billion in increased storage/handling/interest costs for those added commodities;

Fifth, $375 million in added wheat price support expenses;

Sixth, balance of payment losses of up to $2.5 billion for lost export sales and up to $1.9 billion due to lower unit values of all grain exports in 1980–81;

Seventh, $240 million to $365 million in lost income for the ocean shipping industry; and Eighth, inland shipping income losses of $120 million to $175 million.

It is a staggering list.

As we should have expected, other nations eagerly stepped in to snatch up our renounced markets. Australia and Argentina, for example, jumped at the chance to sell grain to the Russians. As a result of the opportunity we handed them, Argentina subsequently signed a 5-year, 745-million-bushel (20 million metric tons) sales agreement with the Soviets. Sixty-five percent of that country's total grain exports now go to the U.S.S.R. In 1978–79, that figure was 10 percent, moving from 10 percent to 65 percent.

With regard to just the lost soybeans, the Soviets readily replaced these commodities with purchases of soybeans from Brazil and Argentina; rapeseed meal from Europe, Canada, and South Africa; soybean meal from Europe, Argentina, and Brazil; and palm oil from Malaysia.

Over Thanksgiving vacation of last year, I had an interesting experience. In Moscow I walked into the office of the Deputy Minister of Agriculture for International Affairs. His first comment, which took me back a little bit, was to ask me how the Nebraska Cornhusker football team was doing.

We got back on the usual track after he identified himself as a former Iowa State graduate—we got back on the track he wanted to pursue and that was that they—well—had found other suppliers for the agricultural products we were refusing to sell them.

Second, that our embargo was going to have no impact whatsoever on their internal or external policies.

And third, that they regarded us, even more than ever before, as an unreliable trading partner.

I think for me that just confirmed what I had thought in the first place, but it was interesting to hear it directly from the man most directly involved in the Soviet Ministry of Agriculture.

Agreements with our allies, irrationally developed after the announcement of the embargo, were mere window dressing. In essence, the United States was left to go it alone. Of the 5.7 million tons of suspended grain sales the Soviets replaced during the embargo period, the National Association of Wheat Growers reports that 68 percent came from countries that had informally agreed to cooperate with the United States on the embargo.

At the same time, U.S. sales to Russia plunged almost $2 billion. Our total share of the U.S.S.R. market dropped from a June 1979 high of 74.2 percent to a June 1981 low of 23.5 percent.

As a result of our ill-fated embargo, the Soviets locked in long-term supply agreements with a number of nations for a wide variety of commodities.

[2] In millions.

To repeat a painful, but truthful phrase, we have now become a "residual supplier" for the Soviets.

The economic sacrifices we made were wasted. The Office of Technology Assessment reported recently that—

It has yet to be convincingly demonstrated—indeed it would be virtually impossible to prove—that the U.S.S.R. has ever moderated its policies in response to threats or acutal impostion of trade sanctions.

The OTA further stated that—

U.S. sanctions and embargoes may well have hurt the U.S.S.R., but it is unlikely that they have hurt enough to make a real economic difference.

A particularly disturbing conclusion of the OTA should merit our special attention. That office warned "the U.S.S.R. may itself have benefitted from the disruptions in the Western Alliance precipitated by U.S. policies."

The lessons of the past have been painful. But I hope we have learned from them. I hope that we will take the opportunity that we have at this very moment to make certain that such misguided policies will never again be inflicted upon the American farmer and rancher.

Later this week, the Export Administration Amendments Act of 1983 (H.R. 3231), will come to the House floor. That bill, as presently written, will make it less likely that these mistakes will happen again. More so than target price legislation, and dairy price supports, reform of the Export Administration Act of 1979 is the most important agriculture issue of this session.

This bill will make four key changes in the current export control law which will have a special impact on the agricultural community.

First and foremost, the bill will establish a constitutional mechanism for the congressional oversight of foreign policy and short supply embargoes. Present law gives Congress 30 days to veto a Presidential embargo. A recent decision of the Supreme Court invalidating the legislative veto, however, has left Congress without any means of overturning an embargo decision. Had President Reagan acted to embargo the sale of grain to the Soviets in the wake of the Korean airliner incident, Congress would have been powerless to stop him.

As a result of language that I offered during subcommittee markup, H.R. 3231 now contains provisions for a constitutional veto mechanism. The provisions of the bill provide that an embargo may take effect for 60 days. If, at the end of that time, however, the Congress has not passed a joint resolution of approval, the embargo lapses. Not only does this meet the Court's test of constitutionality, but this approach also virtually assures that no protracted embargoes will ever occur. By relying on a positive act of affirmation for an embargo to continue, rather than an affirmative act of veto for it to be halted, the Congress places a far more difficult path before the President in his efforts to continue export controls on agricultural commodities.

Provisions of the bill also are designed to correct past folly, when the President acted first, and then consulted our allies and the Congress. As written, H.R. 3231 makes it clear that Congress intends this consultation to be real and prior to the fact.

Finally, the bill strikes at the heart of the embargo problem by stiffening our commitment to contract sanctity. In addition to the 270-day contract sanctity provision contained within last year's Futures Trading Act of 1982, the bill provides for absolute contract sanctity in situations when short supply controls are imposed. This contract sanctity would be in additions to the 270-day contract sanctity period given agricultural export contracts by Public Law 97-444, the Futures Trading Act of 1982.

Subject to your exceptions, unlimited contract sanctity would also be established when foreign policy controls are applied. Comparable legislation in the other body, however, has unlimited contract sanctity without such conditions. Such an approach is far preferable.

Agricultural exports are a major determinant of farm income, accounting for $1 of every $3.50 earned by the agricultural sector. Furthermore, roughly 1.2 million people owe their livelihood to the production, processing, assembling or distribution of agricultural exports, with more than 630,000 of those jobs being in the nonfarm sector. Given the pivotal role that agricultural exports play in the American economy, we must do everything possible to make certain that our sales effort continues unimpeded by any actions of our own. If the United States is to ever rehabilitate its reputation as a reliable supplier of agricultural products for foreign sales, we must pass the reforms contained within H.R. 3231. I solicit your strong support for that legislation.

I urge my colleagues, wherever they might be at this point, to listen and look long and hard at the arguments presented by my colleagues here this afternoon and tonight.

I thank the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM) and especially the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS). And I appreciate the opportunity to provide these facts for our colleagues and the American public.

□ 1800

AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR.). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER) for his very fine comments and I think the record should show that the gentleman has just completed a very well researched, articulate report or commentary on why a selective embargo not only is not in the best interests of agriculture, but not in the best interests of consumers, not in the best interests of our foreign policy, and I think speaking for producers in my district as well as farmerstockmen in Nebraska, I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

At this time, I yield to my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PATMAN), who, like myself, is a former marine, and stands firm in our Nation's defense, but not at the expense of agriculture.

Mr. PATMAN. I thank my colleague for yielding, and I want to add my congratulations to the gentleman for his work in organizing this special order and the other Members who are participating in it. I also want to congratulate my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM) for his cochairmanship of this effort. I believe this is extremely timely, and I am glad to be able to participate in this special order.

Mr. Speaker, I want to add my expression of opposition to any grain embargo which may be proposed in response to the Soviet Union's recent atrocities.

My district in south central Texas contributes significantly to Texas' position as a leading agricultural exporter. Farmers in our area were adversely affected by the 1980 grain embargo; and they remember the lessons from that ill-fated action, even if those who have called for another embargo do not.

As a nation, we lost some $11.4 billion in overall production, along with an estimated 310,000 jobs. With its nearby gulf coast ports, from which the grain exports leave this country, the 14th Congressional District lost even more than its share of the sales of wheat, rice, grain sorghum, corn, and soybeans. Many of our farmers are just now recovering from that loss; others have not recovered.

The embargo may have been a dramatic gesture, but it was a classic case of good intentions gone wrong. And the crushing irony is that, as the Office of Technology Assessment recently reported, we have never seen convincing evidence that the Soviet Union has moderated its policies in response to threats or actual imposition of this or any other trade sanction.

The report conceded:

U.S. sanctions and embargoes may well have hurt the U.S.S.R., but it is unlikely that they have hurt enough to make a real economic difference.

On the contrary, the U.S.S.R. may itself have benefited from the disruptions in the Western Alliance which came about as a result of the embargo.

Before the 1980 embargo, this Nation was the Soviet Union's preferred grain supplier. With the embargo, that demand simply went elsewhere. America's share of the Soviet grain market has fallen from 70 to 20 percent.

In short, a grain embargo at this point would be both ineffective and counterproductive. It would not render the Soviet Union's leaders any more repentant for the Korean airliner massacre—but it would make life a little more difficult for American agriculture.

If a less appropriate action could be taken by this Congress, it has yet to be seriously proposed.

Mr. ROBERTS. I thank my colleague for his kind comments and for his contribution.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. RALPH M. HALL).

Mr. RALPH M. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS) and the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM) for allowing us to avail ourselves of this podium for this special order.

Any present-day discussion on an embargo must have as its beginning a trip back to another day and time. Today, as in the midthirties we are in an agricultural emergency. As in the midthirties, when Franklin Delano Roosevelt tried to bring us out of a worldwide depression, people look to their Government for guidance and relief. Mr. Roosevelt passed a series of laws, later to be referred to as "trial-error." I might add that there was plenty of both—trial and some error.

We have found, however, that the part of Roosevelt's program that worked was the part that dealt with the dignity of work—the WPA, the CCC, the Forestry Service. One of the programs dealt with the American farmer. Price supports were introduced. And even though it was against the grain of the independent-thinking farm community, food was plowed up and destroyed at a time when the world was hungry. Men and women of agriculture complied and waited for a decent price support.

They still wait. Instead of fair and equitable supports, they received inadequate farm programs, leading to a steady but sure atrophying away of the family farm concept. It seems that either bad weather, or inadequate congressional support, or a combination of both, militated against a fair deal for those men and women who furnish food and fiber for the world.

This brings us to today. Today—now. As has been ably and fully reported by the media, the entire world is outraged at the brutal and violent actions of the Soviet Union in the Korean airline massacre. There is a worldwide cry for retaliation against the U.S.S.R. At a time when our response to the Soviet Union should be strong and positive, it would be inadequate for us as Members of Congress to send a weak message to the Soviet Union. A grain embargo as we have seen in the past is not an effective way of harshly reprimanding the Soviet Union for their barbaric action.

Agricultural trade overseas brings in money to the economy which offsets our trade imbalance. In 1982 the United States exported $39.1 billion in agricultural products. One out of every 3 acres of farmland produces for exports. I am told that before 1980 the United States had 75 percent of the Soviet grain market and now the United States has only 25 percent of the Soviet grain market, even though total Soviet imports are greater than before the embargo. The Soviet Union responded to the embargo by seeking their import needs from other suppliers. Perhaps they still purchase through some of our neighbors—our grain—lessening our profit. The agricultural embargo caused the agricultural sector of the economy to carry all the burden of world diplomacy.

This unfair burden on farmers only resulted in an inadequate retribution to the Soviet Union. Agriculture has suffered severe long-term losses from past embargoes; we must not continue to let the agricultural industry in this country suffer by using it as an unsuccessful tool of diplomacy. If the leadership of this country chooses otherwise—then we should put a decent support under the commodity to be sold, or embargoed. For example, $3.65 per bushel is a ridiculous support for wheat when the U.S. Department of Agriculture itself says it costs $5 a bushel to produce it.

We must not stand by and once again watch the men and women of agriculture suffer unilaterally for our action, or our inaction. If we do place an embargo on any other part of the world, we must not single out the farmers of America. We must, through the long-sought pursuit for parity, let our entire country participate in such an embargo.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I concur in what the gentleman has to say, and I commend those who are responsible for having this discussion here.

Back a few years ago I asked an intern in my office, a student from the Universtiy of Michigan by the name of Elizabeth Schrayer, to do a study on this history of embargoes not only in our country but in other countries. She did that history of embargoes, and the conclusions were two:

First, generally the country that imposed the embargo shot themselves in the foot. And second, an embargo can be effective only if you have a monopoly on the product.

We do not have a monopoly on soybeans or corn or food products generally; so that we ought to be most hesitant in moving in the direction of embargoes, frankly, of any kind—even pipes for pipelines or earth-moving machinery or anything else. We ought to make clear to the countries of the world that we are a reliable trading partner. And, ultimately, it seems to me that nations are going to trade in normal commerce or they are going to trade bullets. It is a heck of a lot better to be trading in normal commerce.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I have a question that I would like to address to my very distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON).

The gentleman mentioned that those countries which had imposed the embargo shot themselves in the foot. Could the gentleman explain that, please?

□ 1820

Mr. SIMON. If my colleague would yield, I would be pleased to explain that.

What happens is that when we impose that embargo, we end up hurting American farmers, for example. The Soviets, in this fungible international kind of trade situation, are able to get whatever they want, maybe with a little inconvenience, but they get it.

My figures will not be accurate, but I remember back about 3 years ago or 4 years ago we sold New Zealand some embargoed dairy products, about $10 million worth as I recall. About 10 days later, New Zealand sold the Soviet Union about $10 million worth of dairy products. Who are we fooling? Again, I commend the gentleman.

Mr. RALPH M. HALL. I again want to thank the gentlemen from Kansas and Texas.

Mr. ROBERTS. I thank the gentleman for his comments and his contribution.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. I yield to my colleague and friend, a member of the House Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. PENNY).

Mr. PENNY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I come to the floor today to join my colleagues in speaking out against another grain embargo. I want to commend my colleagues from the Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM) and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS) for sponsoring this special order.

We have in recent days heard again the call for a grain embargo against the Soviets. We all know that in the past a grain embargo has really only hurt American agriculture because the Soviet Union has been able to turn elsewhere to provide for their needs for agricultural products. We know that a grain embargo has not worked in the past and has only hurt American agriculture, and yet there are those who call for that response again today.

I endorse this administration's position in opposition to a grain embargo. We all agree that a response is necessary to the Soviet Union's downing of the Korean airliner, but I think that we also must agree that an effective response is one that is joined in by other nations around the world. A unilateral response by the United States is doomed to failure. We must work in concert with other nations, and in this case we certainly can because the Soviet action is an affront to the entire world and other nations will join us in certain sanctions.

We recently completed a long-term grain agreement with the Soviet Union. That agreement will help in part to restore our trading relationship with that nation. It was mentioned earlier here on the floor that we, prior to an earlier embargo, had 75 percent of the Soviet market for grain. That is now down to close to 20 percent. With this recent agreement, we can recover a portion of that market. I am told we can climb back to about 40 percent of the Soviet demand for grain.

It is important not only to reestablish that relationship with the Soviet Union, but it is important in terms of the message that it sends to other nations around the world, a message that will tell them we are again a reliable trading partner, and that is important to American agriculture. If we are to provide profitability for agriculture in the years to come, we must reestablish that reputation as a reliable trading partner.

Again, I join my colleagues in speaking out against a grain embargo. American farmers have already suffered due to low prices and high interest rates. We do not want those farmers to suffer further by the imposition of another grain embargo.

Mr. ROBERTS. I thank the gentleman for his comment, and again, for his contribution.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. I yield to my good friend and colleague on the House Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM).

Mr. STENHOLM. I thank my colleague for yielding and I will be brief in summing up now. I believe we are at the end of our special order, since we do not seem to have any other Members wishing to speak today.

In response to my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. RUDD) on his question to our friend, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON) about what we mean by "shooting ourselves in the foot," I have used that same term myself and I would try to answer that question.

Whatever we do in response to this particular Soviet aggression or any other Soviet aggression or any other action, we must always be mindful that that which we do has the effect of that which we intend, and that it reaches the target that we are shooting at. Three examples come to mind in which recent embargoes have, in fact, not reached the right target, but have, in fact, in my opinion, shot ourselves in the foot.

We talked about the 1980 grain embargo. I would also add the boycott of the Olympics in 1980. Who did we hurt by that action? Did we get the Soviets' attention? Did we do immeasurable damage to the Soviet Union? I think not. But we shot those young men and women who had trained a lifetime to participate in a once-only opportunity. You only go around once many times in the Olympics. We provided them with a lost opportunity. I think that is an example of shooting ourselves in the foot in accomplishing something that we do not wish to accomplish.

Then let us look at the latest attempt to embargo or to teach the Soviets a lesson, which I, myself, would like to see us do more of. In fact, I am searching for ways in which we can be effective.

When President Reagan proposed an embargo on pipeline equipment, even Maggie Thatcher, Margaret Thatcher, "The Iron Lady," a lady for whose great amount of courage and leadership I have great respect—when we looked over our shoulder to see if they were following, they were not. Again, whom did it hurt? The American autoworker, building the Caterpillar tractors in Illinois, was hurt.

I think that is what the gentleman was getting at.

Mr. RUDD. If the gentleman will yield, I thank the gentleman for the clarification.

Mr. STENHOLM. I thank my colleague from Kansas for yielding, and I thank all of the Members who participated, and especially commend the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS) for making this special order possible.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of this special order today by myself and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. I yield to my good friend and colleague, also a former member of the House Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from North Dakota (Mr. DORGAN).

Mr. DORGAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman knows, I have gone from the House Committee on Agriculture to the House Committee on Ways and Means. On Ways and Means we are very interested in international trade.

This special order focuses on the issue of grain embargoes. It is a very important special order and has an immense impact on my home State of North Dakota. Now, there are some Members of this House who are saying, "We should retaliate for the shooting down of the Korean airliner by imposing a grain embargo against the Soviet Union." It is important for us to think very seriously about what a grain embargo does; what it means to our economy; and what it means to those we impose an embargo against. We should have learned the hard lessons from previous embargoes.

Four successive Presidents have interfered with the marketing of grain abroad—four in a row.

Just a few moments ago, one Member mentioned the term, "shooting ourselves in the foot," another Member asked what that meant. Well, it seems to me that the 1979 embargo was indeed a lesson of shooting one's self in the foot because of a neighbor's actions.

We live on a very fragile planet, this planet Earth. We have to get along. We have some very severe tensions with some of our neighbors. From time to time we are called upon to take appropriate actions, to call for sanctions against some of those with whom we share this planet. The question we have to continue to ask our selves as Americans is, what kind of sanctions or what kind of remedies should we try to impose on the Soviets and others who are behaving in ways we do not accept or condone?

I come from North Dakota, which, as the gentleman from Kansas knows, was the largest wheat-producing State in the Nation for 1 year. Of course, the gentleman from Kansas comes from the district that, I think, produces more wheat than any other State in the Nation at this point. He never fails to bring that to our attention. For that we are all very appreciative. But whether a Member comes from the gentleman's district in Kansas or mine in North Dakota and represents agricultural interests, that Member understands the threat of a grain embargo. It is a very, very serious threat to those who make their living from family farming.

My guess is that if a grain embargo were really an effective way to improve our foreign relations with the Soviets, or to persuade them to change their policies, and if American farmers felt that was the right approach, farmers would say, "Fine." But American farmers know, first of all, that a grain embargo does not make any sense at all from a foreign policy standpoint. And it does not make any sense from an economic standpoint. It certainly does not make any sense from a foreign policy standpoint.

It accomplishes nothing. The Soviets can get grain through third and fourth party transactions, but they get the grain they need. The problem has been in the past that this country has embarked on unilateral grain embargoes. Our allies did not help us. They just produced and sold more to the Soviets. This accomplished nothing except shooting ourselves in the foot.

So, Mr. Speaker, I want to join those who are very concerned about grain embargoes. It makes good sense for us, when the Soviets are forced to spend their hard currency for a bushel of American wheat, to sell them wheat. A ruble that the Soviets spend for a bushel of American wheat is a ruble they cannot use to build another Soviet tank or jet fighter airplane.

I think grain embargoes are foolish, and I intend to fight against those who wish to reimpose them.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from North Dakota (Mr. DORGAN) not only for his comments but especially for his acknowledgement that the State of Kansas and, more particularly, my district does produce more wheat than any State.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I yield to my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. STANGELAND), who is also a member of the Agriculture Committee.

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I would like to commend the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS) and the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM) for requesting this special order to permit those of us from farm States to once again remind our colleagues of the futility of grain embargoes.

However, I deeply regret that this exercise is even necessary. Our discussion here today is in large part attributable to calls from many in the media and some in Congress for a unilateral embargo on grain exports to the Soviet Union as a result of the Korean airliner tragedy.

There is no question that the Soviet military's merciless behavior, and the subsequent lies and coverup which followed this atrocity, shocked and outraged the entire civilized world. But we must not let our anger over this blatant example of the Soviet regime's small regard for human life provoke us into taking an emotion-fed reaction that would end up punishing ourselves far more than it would the Soviets.

Let us clearly make the point today that unilateral food embargoes simply do not work.

There are several problems which make agricultural trade an especially poor foreign policy tool. Because farm goods are essentially the same product regardless of where they are produced and because they can be obtained from many different sources, the importing country quickly finds alternative sources to meet their food needs. This is precisely what the Soviet Union did during the 1980 grain embargo imposed by President Carter after the Soviets invaded Afghanistan. As a result, the U.S.S.R. was not forced to liquidate herds and flocks as some U.S. policymakers had predicted.

Unfortunately, however, the impact of the 1980 Soviet grain embargo was devastating on U.S. farmers and our rural communities. The immediate result of the embargo was a sharp decline in farm prices, which further contributed to a decline in net farm income that was already underway due to inflation and high interest rates.

Furthermore, the 1980 grain embargo cost our Nation 310,000 jobs and $11.4 billion in overall output. More than 9 months passed before prices for wheat, corn, and soybeans returned to their preembargo levels. In addition, price supports triggered by postembargo conditions cost U.S. taxpayers more than $2 billion. Yet, during this entire period, the Soviets had little difficulty in obtaining their grain requirements from our competitors and, to this day, the Russian military forces show no inclination toward pulling back from their military occupation of Afghanistan.

But the 1980 Soviet grain embargo was only one of several prior foolish and ill-conceived embargoes which have proven unsuccessful and robbed U.S. farmers of their foreign markets.

It is generally acknowledged that the Nixon embargo of 1973 spurred Brazilian soybean production to the point where Brazilian soybean production is now the greatest soybean competitor to the United States. As a result of this action, the Japanese Government encouraged soybean production in Brazil because they were alarmed about the prospect of supply cutoffs. This production also encouraged Argentine soybean production and exports which, in turn, compete against our farmers for foreign markets.

Subsequent embargoes in 1974 and 1975 during the Ford administration further eroded America's reputation as a reliable supplier in the international marketplace.

It is this subsequent and cumulative effect of embargoes which, perhaps, proves most costly to our farmers and the entire American economy. Because food supplies are an overriding requirement for consuming countries, importers place a special emphasis on reliable sources of supply. The United States still suffers from a reputation as an unreliable supplier, and America's farmers have been forced to bear the cost in terms of lost sales and lower farm prices.

The reaction of the United States against this international outrage must be firm and determined. However, it must not involve actions that capture media headlines and bow to public opinion polls, but rather our country's response should be one that can work. A unilateral embargo has never worked, it will not work today, and it would truly constitute another example of our Government "shooting ourselves in the foot."

Again, Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlemen for calling this special order.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. STANGELAND) for his contribution.

Mr. Speaker, I think the point has been well made. In my earlier comments and my earlier statement, I confess a parochial interest regarding an issue that affects the daily lives and pocketbooks of all the folks in my district, to the extent that perhaps my remarks were strongly worded and somewhat emotional. But I think that really makes the point.

I can understand the selective use of an embargo from an emotional and symbolic point of view, but the practical results are counterproductive, not only for the farmer but for the consumer and everybody in this country. I can report to the Members, after touring 58 counties of what we call the Big First District of Kansas, a tremendous amount of real frustration as to why we would go back down that trail, to the extent that farmers in my district and throughout the high plains and indeed throughout the country would be going bankrupt without any practical results from the standpoint that not one Russian troop would leave Afghanistan, Lech Walesa would not be helped in Poland, and in this particular case the Soviets actually changing Soviet policy with regard to their air flights would simply not be in the cards.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have really formed a new group, with the help of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM) and many others. We have over 30 Members of this body who have formed something called the Congressional Agricultural Forum, and to borrow a phrase used by one of the more famous broadcast journalists, it is our intent to tell the other side of the story when in fact we get some real front-burner issues here and when agriculture is getting its fingers burned. It will be bipartisan, and I would like to call it a continuing education program. If in fact we deem a future subject worthy of a special order, we will present it.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the Chair for his patience, and I thank my colleagues for their patience.

● Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, the Soviet Union's brutal attack on a civilian Korean jetliner confirmed again the fundamental inhumanity of the Russian Communist Government. In the wake of this outrage, a strong defense against Soviet aggression is more necessary than ever. Our response must be firm—and it must be continuing.

But some have proposed that we take precisely the wrong action—embargo grain sales to the Soviets, or at least abrogate the recently signed long term agreement governing grain and soybean sales. Unfortunately, a unilateral grain embargo is like Will Roger's description of prohibition: It sounds good, but it won't work.

If all nations that sell grain to the Russians agreed to join in a sales cutoff, and if they abided by that agreement, and if agriculture was not singled out, but was part of an across-the-board trade embargo—then this approach would hold some promise. Unfortunately, that is a lot of "if's," and recent history teaches us that unilateral embargoes hurt Americans more than Russians.

How quickly we seem to unlearn the lessons of the last few years. The 1980 Soviet grain embargo is estimated to have cost this Nation $11.4 billion in overall output and 310,000 jobs. More than 9 months passed before prices for wheat, corn, and soybeans returned to preembargo levels. Price supports triggered by postembargo conditions cost the U.S. taxpayer more than $2 billion. Again in 1982, the pipeline sanctions proved ineffective and idled American workers while severely straining the Western alliance.

In both cases, the problem was that America's allies were not behind the sanctions, and that the sales restrictions were selective. It is deplorable that the West would not join in concerted action against the Soviet menace. But it is a fact. And when we see how difficult it has been to get agreement on relatively painless civil aviation sanctions and Security Council resolutions, we must agree that there is no prospect of widespread compliance with any trade sanctions the United States might impose.

Would we really short the Soviet market if we withheld grain sales? The new long-term agreement calls on the Soviets to buy at least 9 million metric tons of grain from us. If we refused to honor our commitment, our major competitors could make up that shortfall by increasing their total exports just 12 percent. They could make up for our wheat sales by increasing their total wheat exports less than 8 percent.

The mistake we have made in the past is this: We put the cart of trade embargoes before the horse of Western unity. We must build up the cohesion and will of the non-Communist nations, including our own. As their ultimate defender, the United States must also be these nations' moral leader. But we do not fulfill that role by trade cutoffs in the absence of consensus. Our colleagues will do well to remember these points during the upcoming debate on reauthorization of the Export Administration Act.

American farmers have an enormous stake in exports. In 1982, the United States exported over $39.1 billion in agricultural commodities and had an agricultural trade surplus of $23.7 billion. One in three acres of U.S. farmland produces for the export market, with two-thirds of our wheat and over half of our cotton, soybeans, and rice sold into the export market. Put simply, exports are the key to American agricultural profitability.

To a large extent, America's agricultural export success has come about in spite of the actions of our Government. Four times in the past decade, American agriculture has been the target of export embargoes. The four embargoes are summarized below.

EMBARGO SUMMARY

Date	Country	Products	Reason
June 27, 1973	All	Soybeans, soybean products, cottonseed and cottonseed products	Control domestic prices.
Oct. 7, 1974	U.S.S.R.	All grains and soybeans	Control domestic prices, foreign policy.
Aug. 11, 1975	U.S.S.R.	All grains and soybeans	Uncertain crop supply, foreign policy.
Jan. 4, 1980	U.S.S.R.	All grain seed, soybeans, meat, poultry and dairy products, Animal Fats	Foreign policy U.S.S.R. invasion of Afghanistan.

Some may argue the embargoes of 1974 and 1975 were not foreign policy related, but the fact that they were aimed only at the Soviet Union is proof of their foreign policy nature. Thus, in the last decade U.S. farmers have experienced one short supply and three foreign policy embargoes.

The cost of these embargoes to American farmers has been enormous. It is estimated U.S. soybean farmers alone have lost a minimum of $12 billion in decreased crop value as a result of the four embargoes. Overall, most agree the net loss of the 1980 embargo to American farmers is as high as $40 billion. Clearly, a major reason for the severe recession plaguing American agriculture over the last 2 years has been the embargo and the continuing trade sanctions against the Soviet Union.

Aside from the direct monetary loss resulting from the four embargoes, their cumulative effect on America's reputation as a dependable supplier arguably has done more to impact American farmers. Determined to never again be in the position of having the United States cut off their needed supplies of soybeans, the Japanese and Europeans responded to the 1973 soybean embargo by collectively investing millions to develop an alternate supply of soybeans in Brazil and Argentina. As a result, Brazilian soybean production doubled by 1975 and quadrupled by 1980. Argentina's soybean production has expanded twelvefold since 1973. While the United States is still the dominant world supplier of soybeans to the world market we are increasingly facing strong competition worldwide from Brazil and Argentina. The 1973 embargo was the catalyst for that competition and we will suffer from it permanently.

Clearly it was the 1980 embargo against the Soviet Union which has most impacted American agriculture. With the imposition of the embargo the President canceled outstanding commercial export contracts for the 15.9 million metric tons of wheat and corn, 1.3 million metric tons of soybeans and soybean products, and several thousand tons of poultry and other products. Those commodities, the sale of which had already been accounted for by the market, were thrust back on the U.S. market causing a precipitous decline in U.S. prices and farmer income. The Soviet Union responded predictably to the embargo by seeking their import needs from other suppliers. They bought wheat from Canada, Australia, Argentina, Europe, and even India. They bought corn from Brazil, Argentina, South Africa, and Thailand. They bought soybeans from Brazil and Argentina, soybean meal from Brazil, Argentina, and the European Community. Vegetable oil was acquired from Malaysia, Europe, and Brazil. Manioc was acquired from Thailand. Poultry was purchased from Brazil and Europe, and beef and mutton was imported from Australia and New Zealand.

Thus, the Soviets were able to get all of the imports of food and feed they needed from our competitors, largely from our allies. They were forced to pay somewhat higher prices for a while, but they still acquired the supplies they needed. Since the embargo was imposed the Soviets have signed long-term commodity supply agreements with five major suppliers; Australia, Canada, Brazil, Argentina, and France. Before the 1980 embargo, the United States had 75 percent of the Soviet market. Now that the embargo is over the U.S. share is only about 25 percent even though total Soviet imports are greater than before the embargo.

While it is clear U.S. agriculture has suffered severe long-term losses from past embargoes we are no longer viewed as reliable suppliers, and too often viewed as the food and fiber supplier of last resort. The embargoes have provided our competitors with windfall markets and enormous incentives to expand their production. They have and will respond to those incentives, and become even greater competitors. Our customers abroad have been incited to increase their own food self-sufficiency as a way of reducing their dependence on the United States. These costs will be borne for years.

On the other hand, America agriculture questions what has been achieved by past embargoes. Inflation was 4 percent in 1973 when the short-supply soybean embargo was imposed, it was 6 percent in 1982. There are more Soviet troops in Afghanistan today than there were when the embargo was imposed or lifted. United States-Soviet relations appear, at least on the surface, to be worse than they have been for several years. From our vantage point, it appears the United States has substantially less influence over the Soviets today than we did before the embargo because of our reduced share of the Soviet market.

In order to protect American agriculture from future embargoes I offer the recommendations listed below for inclusion in the Export Administration Act. Some may question why American agriculture seeks greater protection than the agricultural export contract sanctity statute included in the Commodity Futures Trading Act of 1982. Certainly we cherish that provision. However, contract sanctity only prevents a President from forbidding the export of previously sold commodities. It does not prevent a President from unjustifiably forbidding future sales. If we are to restore our international reputation as a dependable supplier of food, feed, and fiber, we must have protection from the unjustified use of agricultural commodities as a tool of foreign policy.

1. EXEMPT AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES FROM FOREIGN POLICY CONTROLS

In order to protect American agriculture from future futile embargoes such as occurred in 1980, I urge my colleagues to eliminate the President's authority to impose foreign policy export controls on agricultural commodities. The record is clear such embargoes are not effective. They are totally unenforceable since other suppliers are quick to provide supplies withheld by the United States and because it is virtually impossible to control transshipments of U.S. exports to other nations. Worst of all, foreign policy agricultural embargoes force the agricultural sector to bear the costs of our foreign policy. American agriculture will be more than willing to bear its share of the costs of an embargo imposed to protect our national security, but we are not willing to bear the cost of embargoes imposed because someone from the National Security Council thinks it will enhance our foreign policy.

2. FOREIGN PARTICIPATION REQUIREMENT, 90-DAY LIMIT

A look back at the 1980 embargo indicates two critical areas which we feel deserve correction. First, there was no strict requirement that the President get other suppliers to participate in the embargo against the Soviets, nor was he required to lift the embargo once it became evident the Soviets were getting needed supplies of agricultural commodities elsewhere. Second, once the embargo was imposed it took a positive action on the part of the President to lift it. Even though many in the administration chose to lift the embargo there was a concern that its lifting would send the wrong signal to the Soviets and to the American people. The result of these two factors resulted in a totally ineffective embargo being maintained for too long.

I urge Congress to mandate the President to seek multilateral commitments from other food and fiber supplying nations of their participation in the embargo prior to imposing such an embargo. Further, any export controls imposed by the President should be limited to 90 days in duration. Should the President desire to extend the controls beyond 3 months, he should be required to determine that the controls are achieving their objective, and that other nations are not exporting competing commodities to the target nation. If other nations are violating the embargo the President should be prohibited from reimposing the controls.

American farmers are patriots and will shoulder their part of the common defense burden. But they should not be singled out to bear the whole brunt of an embargo that cannot succeed. To waste our resources in this way would not be a rational response to Soviet aggression. It would simply weaken the most basic industry—agriculture—in the last, best hope for freedom—the United States, whose laws we are charged to make not with emotion but with the best wisdom we can muster.●

● Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, this week, as the House takes up reauthorization of the Export Administration Act, I intend to work for strong language in the bill protecting American farmers from being unfairly singled out to bear the burden of our foreign policy. In the wake of the atrocity of the shooting of Korean Air Lines flight 007, we have had, once again, to deal with those who were quick to call for a unilateral, single sector embargo on trade with the Russians. Thankfully and appropriately, the administration chose to pursue other responses. But the lessons of that episode are clear: We still need an effective and clear policy toward trade embargoes, especially grain embargoes.

In spite of the enormous need to export our grain, foreign sales this year will still be some 12 percent below 1982's level. In large part, the reason for the drop in exports has been the 1980 embargo; still some 2 years later, sales have failed to recover to preembargo levels and will be some 40 percent below the record shipments of 1979. Those of us from farm country know very well the full effects of this trend. I hope my urban colleagues will recognize that an embargo on grain sales affects their constituents too: About 500,000 nonfarm jobs depend directly on agriculture exports and those exports pumped some $30 billion into the nonfarm community last year. According to USDA estimates, each dollar of farm produce sold abroad generates $1.05 in additional, related economic activity in the domestic economy. Finally, while the rest of the U.S. trade balance is way out of kilter, the agriculture trade balance is running a $23.7 billion surplus—it could be even greater.

Why? what has happened to our sales? In a word, the Soviets turned elsewhere when our allies refused to support us. Since the embargo, all of our major competitors have struck new bilateral agreements with Moscow and Russians quickly embraced these new supplies. On the other side of the trading world, the Chinese cut off purchases in retaliation for our restrictions on imports of their textiles. Now there is considerable concern that, in spite of some recent purchases, the Chinese will not meet their minimum commitments because our competitors jumped into the void we left.

Perhaps the first lesson is clear: A unilateral embargo has little, if any, chance of success. Until we can secure the cooperation and coordinated help of our allies, an embargo imposed for foreign policy reasons will fail, it will simply fail to cut off supplies and shipments.

Even if we succeed in attaining the cooperation of our allies, if we heap the burden of the embargo all on the shoulders of American agriculture, we threaten the economic base riding on our farmers, the effects will not stay down on the farm, they will, as they have over the last several months, ripple through the rest of the economy. American farmers will play a leading role in supporting our foreign policy, but they simply cannot afford to play that role solo. They need help, and I believe it is our duty in the House to insure fair treatment.

To that end, as we consider the Export Administration Act, I believe we need to strengthen the contract sanctity provisions so that if the administration decides to impose export controls and void contracts then in effect, the controls would have to be placed on all goods and technologies. Thus, if future circumstances warrant such strong action, as an embargo—which should only be undertaken with prior assurances of cooperation by our allies and other suppliers—would have to be across the board on all shipments to the target country. Farmers would not then, as they have done so in the past, have to bear the burden alone. Not only do I believe this approach insures basic fair treatment for agriculture, I believe it would result in a more effective—because of the requirement that controls broad based—action and signal of U.S. policy.

Finally, in spite of clear signals from the administration that it will not impose a grain embargo in response to the Korean airliner incident, some of my colleagues have proposed just such an action. I am afraid they have failed to learn the clear lessons of the past and would, once again, subject American farmers to more problems than the solutions hoped for by a unilateral grain embargo. We have the opportunity this week to make a clear, unequivocal policy that the U.S. Government will not pick on agriculture as the lone water carrier for our foreign policy, and I hope we will approve this much needed and forthright action.●

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentleman for yielding and commend both the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM) and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS) for taking this special order to bring to the Members' attention the serious problems that occur from the use of an embargo on the export of agricultural commodities as a tool of foreign policy.

If I may, I would like to take a slightly different perspective from that of the previous speakers in that I would like to point out some of the troubles that occurred for dairy farmers from the last Soviet grain embargo. And make no mistake about it, an embargo on one agricultural commodity has a significant effect on the quantity of other U.S. commodities produced and the price received for them.

As an example, in 1979 total U.S. milk production was approximately the same as it was 20 years ago—123.4 billion pounds as compared with 123.1 billion pounds in 1960. Yet, 1981 figures showed an annual production of 133.0 billion pounds—an increase of 11 billion pounds in just 2 years.

Is it just a coincidence that the grain embargo occurred at the same time as this dramatic increase in production? Hardly.

The facts are that consumption of dairy products, while increasing, was not increasing fast enough to keep pace with the new production levels. Further, the price dairy farmers received for their milk has not changed since October 1, 1980. Accordingly, there were few, if any, consumption or price considerations that could explain the significant increase that occurred in production.

On the other hand, it is not difficult to see the relationship between the grain embargo and increased milk production. Surplus grain drives grain prices down and, most succinctly stated, cheap grain means more milk. This is because, in times of moderate to high grain prices, dairy farmers seldom feed their cows to their capacity. Lower prices will enable farmers to feed more grain to their cows, thus creating more milk.

Further, cheap grain permits farmers to keep relatively unproductive cows that would have been otherwise culled. This cannot help but increase total milk production as it did between 1979 and 1981.

Finally, and perhaps most significantly, low grain prices force cash crop farmers into dairying, in whole or in part, to maintain cash flow. This can be seen statistically in a single year between 1980 and 1981 when overall milk production increased by 3.4 percent, but production in South Dakota increased 5.8 percent, in North Dakota by 6.9 percent, Nebraska by 6.9 percent, and in Montana by 7.3 percent. These are hardly traditional dairy States.

As the gentlemen before me have clearly expressed, an embargo on agricultural commodities hurts Americans more than the Nation subject to its provisions. It hurts us in many, many ways—some that are obvious and many more that are hidden from plain view.

The effect of a grain embargo on the dairy industry is one such hurt that is less obvious than others. But, in the end, it is one that has hurt us the most whether we are taxpayers who pay for the dairy price support program or family dairy farmers who depend on that program for our very survival.

Clearly, we must learn from our prior embargo errors. For the sake of our agricultural industry and all Americans, we cannot repeat those mistakes. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me to discuss this important issue.●

● Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, since the world learned of the atrocity committed by the Soviet Union under the guise of security and 269 innocent civilian victims met a flaming death, we have collectively been striving to find words adequate to express our repugnance and horror. Primal instincts are to seek revenge and retaliation. But, we in America and the rest of the civilized world live under an umbrella of laws, written and implied. We also live in a world which stands but one hasty act from a holocaust which would end life on planet Earth as we know it. So reason must replace revenge.

In striving for a consensus for the present and future, it is sometimes necessary to read the past. I quote:

> It would be naive and uninformed to assume that (an) embargo (of grain would not) have an adverse effect on American farmers, who faced skyrocketing production costs and plummeting incomes last year.

In that quotation, I am not predicting, I am citing history. That was part of a statement I made in February 1981 in which I advocated the Reagan administration lift the grain embargo imposed by the previous administration. I pointed out then that the estimates were the grain embargo had cost the Soviet Union $1 billion, but it had cost the U.S. taxpayers $3 billion as our Government sought to ease the impact on our farmers. And, we all know the final bill has not yet been presented to the Congress or to the taxpayer or to the farmer.

Going back to July of 1972, the United States has imposed seven embargos. In reference to the most recent, the administration has responded that the U.S.S.R. sales suspension was supported by the European Community, Canada, and Australia. Yet a world wheat trade outlook for 1983–84 which crossed my desk yesterday anticipates U.S. trade of wheat and wheat flour to be 38.1 million metric tons, down from 40 million metric tons during 1982–83 which was certainly not a banner year. At the same time, the exports from Australia are expected to increase from 8 million metric tons to 11.5 million metric tons. We do not fault the Australians for selling their farmer's products. The point is that the United States cannot set a unilateral world food policy. We cannot call a press conference and declare an effective embargo.

During this years' hearings before the Agriculture Appropriations Subcommittee on which I sit, Chairman WHITTEN pointed out that the American farmer can no longer afford to subsidize the foreign policy of the United States. I quote from 1983 hearings:

It is unconscionable to refuse to sell food (overseas) * * * then make the farmer bear the cost of that policy.* * * The history of our efforts at production controls clearly demonstrates that such controls are not a satisfactory substitute for competitive sales abroad.

President Reagan on March 22, 1982, said, in reference to the 1980 embargo of grain trade with the Soviets—

Other countries didn't hesitate to increase their production and displace U.S. sales.

Sales, I might add, we are still trying to recoup. He continued:

The bottom line is the Soviet embargo was bad for our farmers, bad for our economy, but not that bad for the aggressors we were supposedly going to punish.

The President said:

There may come a day when our national security is threatened and the issue of an embargo is raised again. In that case, I would not hesitate to declare (an) embargo, but only if it were part of a complete boycott and if we could have the cooperation of other nations so that we wouldn't end up hurting ourselves.

The provocation then was the invasion and occupation of Afghanistan; the provocation now is the senseless slaughter of 269 men, women, and children from many nations. Yet the same conditions generally prevail. Although the American concept of the preciousness of human life has been most harshly violated and the average American's basic and particular compassion for women and children has suffered a traumatic realization that the Soviet military mind has no compassion and little concern for human life, we are not at the present time in a condition where our national security is threatened.

We are outraged, incensed, and appalled at the gross subhuman conduct of the Soviet Union and the United States, through diplomatic channels and the world forum of the United Nations is properly seeking redress of our grievances, as civilized people do.

Mr. Speaker, in truth I do not know what our posture should be to attain justice in the light of the barbarous act of the Soviets. I do know, however, that entering into a unilateral embargo in an attempt to muzzle the Soviet Bear will not work except to the detriment of the American farmer who has, as we say in my part of the country, just about all the misery he can say grace over right now.●

UNITED NATIONS GET AN "F" FOR FAILURE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. RUDD) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, recent actions of the United Nations have put them in the limelight and being in the limelight has shown that this institution has no intention to or simply cannot perform the duties that it was set up to do.

The butchery of the passengers of KAL flight 007 demonstrates once again the effete. Sterile nature of this institution that is slowly but surely destroying the best intentioned efforts of this country and other peace loving nations to being and preserve peace in this world.

The recent inability of the United Nations to pass even a watered down resolution condemning the calculated and cold blooded murder of 269 innocent men, women, and children by the Soviet Union is another reminder of the abysmal failure of this body.

The Charter of the United Nations adopted in 1945 states that the goals of the organization are: To provide international peace and security; to aid in the development of social, cultural, and economic ties between diverse countries of the world; and also to promote the principles of freedom and human rights for all men. If we were to grade this institution by its success in those stated goals, the United Nations would get an "F" for failure on all counts.

Since 1945, the United Nations has failed to prevent or even resolve satisfactorily over 100 armed conflicts. Today, the fighting, bloodshed, and death in Africa, Latin America, Lebanon, Afghanistan, and Chad, to name just a few, are terrible and terrifying testimonies to the ineffectualness of the United Nations.

American marines are dying in Lebanon because the United Nations has not been able to successfully contain a Soviet backed Syria from its long anticipated conquest of that country. American advisers are in Latin America because the United Nations will not recognize the terrorism spread through the Managua, Havana, Moscow axis, the real "devil's triangle" in the Caribbean.

Because of the failure of our best efforts, and the feebleness of the United Nations, we have seen a Hungary and Czechoslovakia crushed under Soviet tank treads; a divided Korea; a rampaging Vietnam; Kampuchea with 2 million murdered citizens; three major Middle Eastern wars in as many decades; and an African continent threatening to erupt from the Cape of Good Hope to the Mediterranean Sea due to Soviet and Cuban adventurism.

The simple failure of the United Nations to keep the peace is not the whole story, however. When we look into this body and its proceedings, we see a concerted effort by those who profit from war, death, and destruction; to turn this body into a threering circus of anti-Americanism, support for worldwide terrorism and an almost mindless obedience to the prescripts of the "new international economic order" which simply translates into redistribution of the world's resources by legislative fiat.

This peace-loving body has contributed over $116 million since 1975 to so-called national liberation movements which are nothing but ill-disguised terrorist and guerrilla groups. This "peace loving" body has made the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) a member of its body with permanent observer status. This is the same PLO which butchered athletes at the 1972 Olympic games and proudly claimed that, "We have to kill the most famous. Since statesmen are difficult to kill as they are well protected, we have to kill artists and athletes." This is the same PLO whose leader felt it necessary to pack a pistol when he addressed the U.N. General Assembly. He showed, by that action, just what he thought of the United Nations. This is the same PLO which trained current members of the Sandanista government in Nicaragua as far back as 1969. This government has virtually outlawed religious freedom in that country, is locking up political prisoners or anyone not "working for the revolution", and has reneged on its promise to hold free and open elections.

Finally, this body has been kept alive, by the most part through the generosity and long-standing patience of our country, the United States. In 1982, the United States provided the largest source of funds for the United Nations. Fully 31 percent of the U.N. budget was paid for by the United States. The next highest contributor was the Soviet Union, at a paltry 10 percent. That does not take into consideration the U.S. leadership in multilateral, bilateral, and unilateral economic aid to most of the countries of the world. That does not even take into account the millions the U.S. taxpayer spends on the U.N. delegation for such mundane but necessary expenses such as police protection.

Despite all these contributions, despite our ability, and sometimes willingness to put up with such outrageous absurdities as the Soviet inspired "Zionism as racism" resolution passed by this body in 1975, we have gotten nothing for our time and trouble.

In light of the most recent failure of the United Nations to even hand the Soviet Union a slap on the wrist for its murder of 269 innocent men, women, and children, I think it is time for this Nation to reassess its position and role in the United Nations, especially regarding the amount of financial support it gives to an institution whose impotence is beyond doubt and which has become a platform for the most virulent anti-Americanism seen anywhere on the globe.

I would support legislation that would dramaticly reduce the amount of money that our Nation now allocates to the United Nations.

THE MSRTS: MIGRANT EDUCATION'S FOUNDATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT) is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, as a strong supporter of the migrant student record transfer system (MSRTS) in Little Rock, Ark., I am pleased that the appropriations bill approved by the House last Thursday for Labor-HHS-Education includes $255,744,000 for the migrant education program. This appropriation, which is the same as the fiscal year 1983 level, includes funds for the MSRTS, which maintains health and academic records on each migrant student and transfers them with the child as he moves from school district to school district. I have witnessed the maturation of this system of inter- and intra-State coordination, and recognize its great value to the migrant community.

The appropriations measure also includes $7,500,000 for the high school equivalency program (HEP) and the college assistance migrant program (CAMP), which enable students from poor families of migratory and seasonal farm workers to obtain high school diplomas and subsequently to be placed in steady employment or into postsecondary education.

I think my colleagues will agree that considering the legislative history of the program, the preponderance of evidence overwhelmingly supports the position that Federal categorical funding is required if the needs of migrant children are to be met adequately. As you will recall, States, given their own priorities and concerns, have never responded to this mobile population. Prior to Public Law 89-750, in 1966 only three States had appropriated any funds for migrant education. The migrant program differs from other educational programs in that the highly mobile child is often the concern of many school districts in more than one State. Therefore, the success and continuity of the migrant child's education depends largely on the leadership of the Department of Education with the joint cooperation of the States.

Under Public Law 89-750, for the first time, payments were provided under title I, ESEA to State education agencies to provide and meet the special education and health needs of migrant children between the ages of 5 and 17. In this act, States were required to coordinate with other States in the transmitting of pertinent information in respect to school records for migrant education. The national migrant student record transfer system became the eventual result of this provision.

Education of migrant children presents unique workload problems for the school districts. These children move frequently from school district to school district for periods which often do not coincide with normal school terms. The lack of educational and health histories prior to MSRTS made grade placement difficult and medical needs unknown.

The U.S. Department of Education, with the cooperation of the States, moved swiftly to correct these various inequities and developed curriculums in reading, math, early childhood, and oral language. They also developed a very extensive health record which provides teachers and administrators immediate access in connection with the placement and provision of health care for migrant children. Since that time, you can find many exemplary demonstration models for coordination, teaching exchange, and joint curriculum development, through this program. Interagency coordination has become a reality, with the Department of Education working with both the U.S. Health Department and the Rehabilitative Service in providing much-needed and complex service to the migrant population.

Since the original amendment of 1966, Congress has strengthened this law on several occasions in order to be sure that the total needs of migrants and handicaps were being met. Public Law 90-247, signed into effect on January 2, 1968, was the basis of calculation for payment to the States. Again in 1970, Public Law 91-230 was signed into effect on April 13, 1970, which required the States receive their money based on the number of migrant children served. Then later, Public Law 93-380 was signed into effect on August 21, 1974, which allowed the States to operate the programs for migrant children directly through the local education agencies (LEA's), which was a clear indication even at this late date that some States did not really care about this mobile population of migrant children. The latest amendment to that act was Public Law 95-561, dated November 1, 1978, which even went further and strengthened MSRTS and the transferring of the education and health information on migrant children.

Prior to 1966, 9 out of 10 children of migrant farmworkers never entered high school and only 1 out of 10 who entered ever graduated. Most migrant children up to that time usually dropped out of school in the fourth or fifth grades. As one can understand, their attendance was erratic due to their traveling, and with the need of the families to have them working in the field, as well as other conditions of the poverty which surrounds them continually, there was a great lack of continuity of curriculum and instruction. Above all, a prevalent negative attitude by the local community, coupled with the migrant student's commitment to their families and their poor health and nutrition, certainly detracted from their ability to learn when they did attend school.

Since the Federal Government moved so humanely and has continued its efforts to strengthen the migrant program, it has become one of the most effective Federal programs. A large part of the credit for this is due to the cooperation of the Federal and State authorities. To date, the migrant program currently serves approximately 800,000 migrant children in 49 States plus Puerto Rico. I firmly believe that the migrant program is a model that can be used in the development of many other educational programs, and hope my colleagues will join with me in assuring that this success story is continued.●

PENSION PLAN SOCIAL INVESTING ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 1983

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CORCORAN) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today enforcing existing prohibitions against social investing of pension funds and strengthening the avenues of recourse available to victims of violations of fiduciary responsibilities under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA). ERISA was enacted to provide pension benefit security for participants in private sector pension plans.

Prior to enactment of ERISA, abuses of retirement funds by fiduciaries had reached appalling levels. Many, many workers who had paid into retirement plans in good faith found themselves enjoying a penniless retirement due to mismanagement and outright abuse of pension funds. ERISA established much-needed standards for the handling of the enormous sums of money that American workers invest in retirement plans, sums totaling over $600 billion today.

Chief among these standards is the requirement that a fiduciary discharge his duties "solely in the interest of the participants and beneficiaries" of a retirement plan and "for the exclusive purpose of providing benefits to participants and their beneficiaries." Unfortunately, this provision of the law is under attack today from union officials desirous of gaining access to this wonderful "slush fund" of financial leverage. In a recent case, the District Court of Virginia awarded more than $500,000 to retirees victimized by union trustees of the local health and welfare trust fund who had diverted one-third of the fund into a "social investment" furthering a compulsory unionization drive.

Social investing exists when a decision to invest is based on the desire to attain social goals of some type rather than to provide the best rate of return and best retirement benefit possible. To the extent that benefits as a goal have been placed secondary to social goals, social investing violates ERISA. That the incident cited is not an isolated abuse of responsibility is evidenced in the statement by Owen Bieber, president of the UAW, that the UAW "would invest in some projects which don't 'make money' in a commercial sense but which do produce desirable social returns on investment."

It is all too clear that investments that "don't 'make money' in a commercial sense" are lousy investments! They are not investments that you or I would make to provide for our retirement years, to guarantee that we will be able to pay our bills and put food on the table when we are no longer able to work. They are charity, and regardless of how lofty the charitable goal, workers do not invest in retirement plans to be charitable. ERISA was emphatically not passed to insure financing for charitable causes. Its goal, plainly and simply, was retirement security, and I know of no better way to eliminate retirement security than to invest in projects that do not make money.

With over $600 billion in hard-earned dollars in pension funds today, we must take steps to guarantee that rate of return will be the determining factor in investment decisions, as required by standards of fiduciary responsibility. We must establish penalties sufficiently harsh to deter advocates of social investing from wiping out the savings of America's workers and retirees.

The Pension Plan Social Investing Enforcement Act of 1983 amends ERISA to strengthen existing prohibitions against social investing by establishing criminal penalties and punitive damages for individuals convicted of violating fiduciary requirements established in ERISA. Criminal penalties in my bill include fines not to exceed $10,000 and/or imprisonment not to exceed 5 years, in line with existing criminal code penalties for theft or embezzlement of employee benefit plan funds. Punitive damages, which would go to the injured parties in the suit, the workers and retirees, could not exceed the amount of money involved in the breach of fiduciary responsibility.

In addition to establishing criminal penalties and punitive damages, the Pension Plan Social Investing Enforcement Act would tighten existing procedures for obtaining exemptions from prohibited transactions. My bill would strengthen existing requirements that exempted investments, maximize the rate of return on investment. Prior to approving any request for exemption, the proposal would have to be published in the Federal Register and written notice would have to be given to all interested parties, including workers and beneficiaries participating in the plan. An opportunity for public hearing on the proposed exemption from required standards would have to be provided, and recourse could be had through any district court in the United States. Together, these steps will insure that participants in plans will be notified of requests for exemption, will have the opportunity to register their views on the proposal, and will have ready access to the courts if necessary to protect their hard-earned investment in a retirement plan.

Pension money belongs to the workers, not to the fiduciaries, and it is the responsibility of the Federal Government to insure, as promised under ERISA, that retirement benefits will not be frittered away by self-seekers. By establishing clear and tough penalties for violations of fiduciary standards and by guaranteeing full information and access to decisionmakers and to redress, the Pension Plan Social Investing Enforcement Act of 1983 will better protect the financial futures of workers and retirees, a goal none can quarrel with. I urge my colleagues to actively support America's workers and retirees by supportng my legislation when it is considered by Congress.●

LEBANON: A DANGEROUS QUIET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, the reports today indicate that Beirut and the rest of Lebanon are enjoying a respite from the latest outbreak of fighting. There are also reports that the political factions are getting ready to talk; but I think it would be foolish to assume that the problems in Lebanon are close to being resolved. The quiet is dangerous, especially if it lulls us into thinking that peace is at hand. Far from it. New fighting could break out at any time. The factions might never be able to come to any kind of agreement. There is no suggestion whatsoever that either Syria or Israel is about to pull out and leave Lebanon to the Lebanese. What we have to remember is that fighting could flare at any time and that if it does, it will be the U.S. Marines and their fellow "peacekeepers" who will once again be caught in the middle.

The basic question that we must ask remains unchanged. What is the mission of the Marines? What are our goals in Lebanon? Are those goals attainable within any reasonable cost? And should we maintain the Marine forces there indefinitely? For if we pass the so-called compromise resolution endorsing the Marine expedition, soon to come up before the House, we are indeed giving the President a blank check to do whatever he likes for as long as he wishes. Before we approve any such thing, we must satisfy ourselves that it is the right and above all the responsible thing to do.

For myself, I believe that the United States ought to declare that its objectives, insofar as the mission of the Marines is concerned, have been satisfied. This is the time to declare victory, get out, and call upon the United Nations to supervise the peace, and accept responsibility for trying to arrange a stable government for Lebanon. It makes no sense to leave our forces in the middle of the most ancient and violent of religious and civil and international conflict. It makes no sense to leave those men in what is in fact a militarily impossible place. As matters now stand, they are nothing but targets—hostages, in a manner of speaking, to the whims of whatever fanatic or groups of fanatics that decide that they, the Marines, make a good target.

I have never believed that members of the Armed Forces should be asked to do the impossible. I have never believed that they should be used as political pawns, and I have never believed that they should be put at risk and told that they could only shoot in defense. Such policies did not make sense back in the early days of Vietnam, and they do not make sense today. Nor can military forces become a substitute for political cohesion in a foreign country. The will to live in peace with one another is not a thing that can be imposed by any outside intervention, and especially one that is as tenuous as this one is. The history of Lebanon is one of centuries of sectarian and familial-feudal conflict. The passions did not cool under European intervention. France was in occupation for over 50 years, and they were only stayed temporarily by the political arrangements imposed by France some 40 years ago. They did not cool when President Eisenhower dispatched Marines, 14,000, in his day, nor when the Reagan administration did so last year. I doubt that any one of us in the House fully appreciates the complexity—let alone the depth—of the problem in Lebanon.

But if anything is certain, it is that if the administration wants to impose its will in that country it had better be prepared for years-long occupation. I do not believe that any such indefinite occupation is to the best interests of this country. That is the kind of task that ought to be under the aegis of an international organization.

What we must understand is that there are limits to what we can do, even with the best of intentions and the highest of motives. There are limits to what military force can achieve when the issues are century old, religious, and familial. There are, in other words, limits on how far a country can go to impose some sense of order in another country that has been beset by disorder since time immemorial.

Therefore, let us not delude ourselves, let us not assume that just because the guns are temporarily quiet for the time being the problem is resolved. There is not even a beginning to the solution at this point. At best, there is a thread of hope. That is hardly justification for endorsing an indefinite stay of our forces in an area that could again erupt at any time. Indeed, the only reasonable course of action is to declare that the peacekeeping forces have achieved their mission and turn the task over to the United Nations, which is the agency that should have borne in the first place this task.

I yield back the balance of my time.

INTRODUCTION OF THE INDIAN WATER RIGHTS DISPUTES ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. RICHARDSON) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a bill entitled the Indian Water Rights Disputes Act. This legislation would establish a Federal Mediation Board to resolve water rights disputes between Indians and non-Indians and would authorize funds for the legal fees of non-Indians should a water rights suit be brought against them by the U.S. Government on behalf of an Indian tribe or organization.

In my home State of New Mexico in the counties of Santa Fe, Cibola, and Sandoval, we are currently experiencing a number of costly and lengthy water battles that threaten to divide Indians and non-Indians who have worked side by side in this region for years. In a case that has been ongoing for 17 years, New Mexico against Aamodt, four Indian pueblos in the Pojoaque Valley of New Mexico are claiming historic and superior rights to all of the surface water in the valley. The merits of this case will be, and should be, decided by the courts. But these disputes are not limited to New Mexico and will become a growing national problem in the years ahead if we do not act now.

Congress must do something to prevent these court fights from developing in the future and to provide assistance to those who have been placed at a legal disadvantage. The legislation I am introducing today is designed to address these problems.

First, my bill would establish a Federal mediation board to hear Indian water rights disputes. The board would be an independent and impartial panel of experts assigned the task of investigating and resolving water rights disputes which involve Indians. The board would also monitor, on a continuing basis, potential conflict areas. Should the U.S. Government initiate action seeking to ajudicate historic water rights for an Indian tribe or organization, the Government would have to bring this matter before the mediation board. In other words, the board would have exclusive jurisdiction over any water rights dispute where the U.S. Government is representing an Indian tribe. The board would attempt to resolve the dispute through negotiation and mediation. However, if no settlement could be reached, the board would resolve the matter through binding arbitration. The board would have all the necessary judicial and investigative powers and its final decision would be binding but could be appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals.

Second, under this legislation, when the arbitration process begins, funding for legal fees would be provided to non-Indians. The Indians rightly have the U.S. Government to represent them. But many non-Indians cannot afford the legal represenation they deserve. Upon the initiation of a water rights case against them by Indians. Non-Indians could apply to the board for funds to assist them with their legal fees. Non-Indian defendants could be compensated for the reasonable expenses of attorney fees, expert witnesses, studies or reports which are found by the board to be necessary for the preparation of the party's case. All non-Indian defendants would be eligible for legal funds. This provision will be retroactive upon enactment of the bill and would provide much needed financial assistance to non-Indians currently involved in waters rights court cases. In essence, this provision insures equal access to justice.

Mr. Speaker, while I am hopeful this legislation will be effective in preventing lengthy water rights court cases and alleviating some of the hardships these cases cause. I think that Congress must continue to look ahead at the future of water use in the southwest and throughout the Nation. Many of the water distribution systems in New Mexico are outdated and in need of improvements. The Federal Government has a role in assisting localities improve their water utilization facilities. We must make certain that this scarce resource is used efficiently and to the benefit of all.

I urge Members to cosponsor this important legislation.

This legislation simply is founded on the premise that every American has the right to equal justice. Indians are represented because of the treaty relationship, by attorneys, paid for by the U.S. Government. But in many cases there are many non-Indians that suddenly receive in the mail a letter saying they are being sued by their own Government, and these are American taxpayers. Some of these non-Indians are poor. Some of these non-Indians have been engaged in costly legal fights over many years. What this bill provides is economic and legal equity. It is not a non-Indian measure.

I think there are few Members in this body that have the record I have in representing Indians in the U.S. Congress. But this is an issue that right now is affecting several counties in New Mexico, but soon will affect many States in the West. Instead of reacting to crises and potential tension and division among races in New Mexico, especially between the Hispanic and Indians that are so deeply involved and culturally have been together for so many years, I think this legislation is something that will look to the future.

What it also does is it sets up some arbitration and mediation services. Why is it that every time we have a dispute between neighbors, between friends, that we go to court? Why is it that lawyers in this country are becoming the highest paid profession? Why should we give them so much business when perhaps settling disputes through mediation is the most proper avenue. I have nothing against lawyers. But I do have something against lengthy legal disputes, against the tensions and frustrations caused by those lengthy court disputes. Let us submit this issue to arbitration and mediation. But also let us remember that while this country has been founded on the principles of equality for all, and has done a tremendous amount to help many people in this country who have been left behind, and that means Hispanics and Indians and many other minorities of which I am a member, this does not mean that those that are non-Indians in a water rights case should not necessarily be taken care of but treated with justice and equality.

It is my hope that this legislation will correct this inequity, and my hope that in the years ahead we will not have to resort to court battles and tension and all kinds of recriminations but have new ways to resolve our problems.

Water is a scarce commodity. The energy crisis was the crisis of the 1970's and early 1980's. We have the crisis of scarce resources. The crisis of the late 1980's and 1990's is going to be the absence of water. The time has come to at least treat one potential problem in this whole water issue with some equality, fairness, and efficiency.

I yield back the balance of my time.

AN AMENDMENT TO THE EDUCATION OF THE HANDICAPPED ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FRANK) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, today I have filed a bill to amend the Education of the Handicapped Act that will remove the age limitation on individuals who benefit from the act. Currently, the education programs that are authorized by the Education of the Handicapped Act are limited to those individuals that are between the ages of 3 and 21. This limitation leaves those over the age of 21 without educational benefits.

This problem was first brought to my attention by several parents of handicapped children in my district and by the administrators of the Crystal Springs School in Assonet, Mass. These children have greatly benefited from the programs under this act but will become ineligible once they turn 22. The staff at the Crystal Springs School does very good work with handicapped children. As administrators of programs under the act they have expressed to me the need for a continuation of these types of programs past the secondary level.

I believe that it is our duty to provide educational services to all handicapped citizens so that they may productively participate in society to the fullest extent possible. To this end my bill authorizes the Secretary of Education to make grants and contracts to institutions and other nonprofit educational agencies for the development and operation of specially designed postsecondary programs for vocational, technical, continuing or adult education for all handicapped individuals. This bill promotes collaborative efforts between educational and adult services agencies; the mainstreaming of handicapped individuals; and independent living situations. I believe that this amendment to the Education of the Handicapped Act will give all of our handicapped citizens the educational support they need to lead independent and productive lives.●

BILL TO CREATE INDEPENDENT NATIONAL ARCHIVES AND RECORDS ADMINISTRATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, today Congressman GLENN ENGLISH and I are introducing the National Archives and Records Administration Act of 1983. This bill will establish the National Archives as an independent agency responsible for insuring the preservation and public availability of our Nation's documentary history.

This bill will restore the archives to the independent status that it held when it was created in 1934. Fifteen years later, the Archives was incorporated into the newly formed General Services Administration in response to the first Hoover Commission's recommendation that the Federal Government's housekeeping functions should be put under one roof.

Although the original Hoover Commission concept of bureaucratic consolidation resulted in improvements in many Federal Government functions, in the case of the National Archives and GSA, the arrangement has been fraught with problems for a number of years. Restoring the Archives to independent status will enable it to carry out its vital document preservation, maintenance, and distribution functions more effectively. This action will be especially appropriate in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the National Archives in 1984. I hope my colleagues will join Congressman ENGLISH and me in supporting this important measure.●

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 2867

By Mr. ECKART:

ADEQUACY OF CERTAIN GUIDELINES AND CRITERIA

SEC. 23A. (a) Subtitle D is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"ADEQUACY OF CERTAIN GUIDELINES AND CRITERIA

"SEC. 4010. The Administrator shall conduct a study of the extent to which the guidelines and criteria under this Act which are applicable to solid waste management and solid waste disposal facilities, including landfills and surface impoundments, (other than guidelines and criteria under subtitle C) are adequate to protect underground sources of drinking water. Such study shall include a detailed assessment of the degree to which the criteria under section 1008(a) and the criteria under section 4004 regarding monitoring, prevention of contamination, and remedial action are adequate to protect such sources and shall also include an analysis of any additional enforcement authorities which the Administrator deems necessary for such purposes. Not later than 2 years after the date of the enactment of this section, the Administrator shall submit a report to the President and the Congress setting forth the result of the study required under this section.

(b) The table of contents for such subtitle D is amended by adding the following new item at the end thereof:

"Sec. 4010. Adequacy of certain guidelines and criteria".

And make the necessary conforming changes in the table of contents.

"(5)(a) establishment of a cooperative program, on a demonstration basis with the Department of Transportation, consistent with provisions of this Act, the International Aviation Facilities Act, the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, and United States foreign policy goals to:

"(i) initiate technical assistance programs with the aviation authorities of other governments; and

"(ii) initiate programs to assist United States firms in their efforts to export aerospace products and services. Such programs may include, but are not limited to:

"(A) use of United States firms in technical assistance programs initiated with foreign governments;

"(B) assisting United States firms to prepare and submit proposals to foreign governments or foreign aviation concerns;

"(C) providing technical consultation and project management assistance to United States firms once foreign governments or aviation concerns have awarded contracts to United States firms; and

"(D) assisting United States private sector civil aviation entities to develop training programs, by providing Federal Aviation Administration safety information, educational material, and advice.

"(b) The Secretary shall report to the Congress not later than April 30, 1985, on the implementation of this program making recommendations on the advisability of its continuation and expansion to involve other sectors of the economy and federal departments or agencies.".

By Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI:

—At the end of the bill, add the following new section:

SEC. 205. INCREASE IN TITLE XX SOCIAL SERVICES FUNDS.

Section 2003 of the Social Security Act is amended—

(1) by adding "and" after the semicolon at the end of paragraph (2) of subsection (c);

(2) by striking out paragraphs (3), (4), and (5) of subsection (c) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(3) $2,800,000,000 for the fiscal year 1984 or any succeeding fiscal year."; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) In order for any State to receive an allotment for the fiscal year 1984 or 1985 in excess of the allotment to which it would be entitled if the amount specified in subsection (c) for that fiscal year were reduced by $200,000,000, the Governor of such State shall submit to the Secretary and make available to the public (prior to January 1, 1984, in the case of the fiscal year 1984, and no less than 3 months prior to October 1, 1984, in the case of the fiscal year 1985) a report certifying that at least one-half of any additional funds received from the State's allotment for the fiscal year involved (over and above the funds to which the State would be entitled if the amount specified in subsection (c) for such year were reduced by $200,000,000)—

"(1) will be used for social services directly related to the impact of unemployment on individuals and families in the State, and

"(2) will be allocated among the various areas and localities in the State in amounts which bear a direct relationship to the respective levels of unemployment in those areas and localities.

Such report shall set forth the manner in which such additional funds will be used within the State for social services needs related to unemployment, and shall include a description of and justification for the criteria to be used in making the allocations referred to in paragraph (2) of the preceding sentence.".

H.J. RES. 367

By Mr. ALEXANDER:

—Insert the following new sections at the end of the joint resolution:

SEC. . Section 329 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1970) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Eligibility of an applicant for assistance under this subtitle based upon production losses shall be determined solely on the basis of the factors designated in this section and shall not be affected by the Secretary's failure to designate a county or counties for emergency loan purposes, except that the applicant must establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary that such losses were sustained as a result of such disaster. The determinations of the Secretary under this section shall be final unless found by a court of competent jurisdiction, on the basis of the administrative record, to have been arbitrary, capricious, or otherwise not in accordance with law or regulations issued in accordance with law.".

SEC. . Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Agriculture shall, within 30 days of receipt by a county office of the Farmers Home Administration of an application for a loan under subtitle C of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1961 et seq.), advise the applicant for such loan, in writing, of approval or disapproval of the application. Failure to advise an applicant, in writing, of approval or disapproval of the application within this time period shall constitute approval of the application.

SEC. . (a) Any finding made by the Secretary of Agriculture under section 321(a) of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1961(a)), during the period beginning on July 1, 1983, and ending on September 30, 1984, that a natural disaster exists with respect to farming and ranching operations in an area shall be deemed to be a determination made by the Secretary that an emergency exists in such area for purposes of—

(1) section 813 of the Agricultural Act of 1970 (7 U.S.C. 1427a), and

(2) section 1105 of the Food and Agricultural Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2267).

(1) under—

(A) section 813 of the Agricultural Act of 1970 (7 U.S.C. 1427a), without regard to any limitation specified in subsection (c) or (d) of such section, to sell grain at a price not less than 75 percent of the current basic county loan rate for such grain in effect under the Agricultural Act of 1949 (or a comparable price if there is no such current basic county loan rate), or

(B) section 1105 of the Food and Agriculture Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2267) to provide assistance, or

(2) in accordance with both subparagraph (A) and subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) to sell grain and provide assistance, to eligible farmers and ranchers for the preservation and maintenance of foundation herds of livestock and poultry (including their offspring) until September 30, 1984, or such earlier date that the Secretary determines such emergency no longer exists.

(c) For purposes of this section, the term "eligible farmers and ranchers" means farmers and ranchers who are eligible to receive loans under section 321 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (U.S.C. 1961).

By Mr. JACOBS:

—Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That (a)(1) contrary to an oft repeated myth, the Constitution is not ambiguous about placing in the Congress the authority and responsibility for declaring war policy and the Constitution is not ambiguous about placing in the President, as Chief of all United States military commanders, authority and responsibility for faithfully executing such war policy.

(2) Just as a rose by any other name is a rose, a war by any other name is a war.

(3) When our military was ordered to fire against one side of the Lebanese civil war on behalf of another side, the United States was placed in a de facto posture of war.

(4) The security of the United States is no more dependent on developments in the centuries-old religious war in Lebanon than it is in developments in the centuries-old religious war in Northern Ireland.

(b) There shall be an immediate and orderly withdrawal of the United States Armed Forces in Lebanon and Lebanese waters and airspace, except for personnel assigned as guards at the United States Embassy in Lebanon, during the 72 hour period beginning on the date of enactment of this joint resolution.

(b) If the President determines that an extension of the six-month authorization period specified in subsection (a) is needed, he shall report to the Congress on the purpose and need for the continued participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon. The report shall include the President's recommendation for the duration of the additional authorization period, which may not exceed an additional twelve months. Any such report shall be submitted to the Congress during the fifteen-day period beginning forty-five days prior to the expiration of such six-month authorization period. Any extension of the authorization period which is provided by the Congress pursuant to this subsection shall be for such period as the Congress may determine, not to exceed an additional twelve months.

(Amendment in the nature of a substitute.)

—Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This joint resolution may be cited as the "United States Armed Forced in Lebanon Resolution".

REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS

SEC. 2. (a) After the end of the 90-day period beginning on August 29, 1983, no funds appropriated by the Congress may be obligated or expended for peacekeeping activities in Lebanon by United States Armed Forces unless, before the end of that 90-day period, either—

(1) the President has submitted to the Congress the report required by section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution; or

(2) the President has certified to the Congress that a ceasefire is in effect in Lebanon and is being observed by all parties and that significant progress is being made in negotiations to broaden the base of the Lebanese Government and achieve a political resolution of existing differences.

(b) If the President makes a certification under subsection (a)(2), he shall, at the end of each 30-day period thereafter, submit a report to the Congress pursuant to section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution unless at the end of such 30-day period he makes the certification described in subsection (a)(2). If the President does not submit either the report or the certification required by this subsection at the end of any such 30-day period, then the report required by section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution shall be deemed to have been submitted for purposes of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution as of the end of such period.

INTERPRETATION OF THIS RESOLUTION

SEC. 3. (a) Nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the President from withdrawing United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon if circumstances warrant, and nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the Congress by joint resolution from directing such a withdrawal.

(b) Nothing in this joint resolution modifies, limits, or supersedes any provision of the War Powers Resolution or the requirement of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, which relates to congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon.

By Mr. SPRATT:

—Further amend Page 5, after line 2, to insert the following additional subparagraph:

(11) a detailed report to the Armed Services Committees, in classified form, if necessary, with respect to the rules of engagement applicable to United States Armed Forces deployed in Lebanon.

By Mr. STRATTON:

(5) due to diplomatic and political requirements, members of the United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon are deployed in a location near the Beirut International Airport that is difficult to defend and that exposes them to serious risks;

(6) the problems in Lebanon require a political, not a military, resolution;

(7) continuation for an additional period of participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is necessary (A) to permit the Government of Lebanon to broaden its base to include appropriate representation in the Government of Lebanon of all Lebanese groups, and (B) to allow the Lebanese Armed Forces an opportunity to receive the training necessary to enable them to provide for internal security of Lebanon on their own;

(8) an immediate withdrawal of United States Armed Forces from Lebanon would only increase the likelihood of expanded conflict in the area and lead to a political result unfavorable to United States foreign policy interests in the Middle East;

(9) if fighting in Lebanon continues, there is substantial potential for escalation of United States involvement in hostilities;

(10) because of the changing character of the situation in Lebanon, the United States should not irrevocably commit itself to participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon for an open-ended or extended period;

Page 4, line 9, strike out "six months" and insert in lieu thereof "sixty days".

Page 4, line 19, after "each participating country" insert the following: "and a description of the contribution of each participating country to the achievement of the objectives of the Multinational Force in Lebanon and of any other aid that each such country has provided to the Government of Lebanon".

Page 4, line 25, strike out "and".

(7) the level of fighting that has occurred during the reporting period and, if a ceasefire is in effect at the time of the report, the prospects for the continuation of this ceasefire:

(8) the estimated additional cost to the United States during the reporting period of participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(9) the number of United States military casualties during the reporting period as a result of participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon; and

(10) a statement of the progress made during the reporting period in negotiations designed to lead to a political settlement in Labanon.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

LINE-ITEM LEASH ON RUNAWAY SPENDING

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, with a $200 billion deficit in fiscal year 1983 the Federal Government is heading into the worst economic disaster our Nation has ever faced. It is our runaway spending that has put us in this situation and if we continue down this path, I fear that America as we know it will not be here for our grandchildren to enjoy. It is time to face this fact and it is time to take action.

Henry Hazlitt offers us hope in an inspiring commentary, which appeared in the Wall Street Journal on September 9. He correctly points out that the problem rests with Congress. In order to please constituents and interest groups, Congress all too readily includes extraneous appropriations in the budget it passes. Because the President must accept or reject an appropriations bill in its entirety, he has no choice other than to pass these padded bills in order to insure vital appropriations. Since Congress will never stop its pork-barreling, Mr. Hazlitt contends that a constitutional amendment granting the President line-item veto power on appropriations bills is necessary to put an end to this nonsense. Someone must stand up and take responsibility—it is clear that Congress will not. Mr. Hazlitt suggests that we allow the President to do so.

I urge my colleagues to take a few minutes to read the following article. Mr. Hazlitt gives us a viable solution—one that warrants serious consideration by each and every Member of Congress.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Sept. 9, 1983]

LINE-ITEM LEASH ON RUNAWAY SPENDING

(By Henry Hazlitt)

We have had 45 federal deficits in the past 53 years, and uninterrupted deficits in the past 15 years.

There are two ways of preventing or ending deficits. One is to cut spending, and the other to increase taxes. We can, of course, try a little of both.

This is the approach contemplated in the balanced-budget constitutional amendment before Congress. Even many of those people who have reservations favor this amendment on the ground that something is better than nothing. But the proposal raises serious questions. It is complicated. It imposes detailed directions on Congress that many believe have a very questionable place in the Constitution. Its spending and taxing restraints may not allow for an emergency, such as a war or a natural disaster.

Perhaps the main objection to the balanced-budget amendment is that it puts at least as much emphasis on obliging Congress to raise taxes to achieve a balance as it does on cutting expenditures. This mistakes the nature of the problem. The real evil in the budgets of the past half century has been growing, reckless outlays, and not the deficits per se.

If federal expenditures are at a reasonable level, there isn't any great problem in finding the taxes to pay for them. But the higher the spending, the more formidable the taxing problem becomes. Taxes always undermine incentives, sales, employment and production. The higher the taxes, the greater the harm they do to the whole economy. Beyond a certain point, raising tax rates brings in lower revenues.

LIPPMANN'S PROPOSED REMEDY

All this may seem too obvious to mention, but it is persistently overlooked. This first struck me forcefully when I encountered a New York Herald-Tribune column on March 5, 1959, in which Walter Lippmann complained: "Both parties are pretending that they are struggling to balance the budget. In fact neither the Administration nor the Congress shows any sign of being willing to vote the taxes which are absolutely essential if the budget is to be balanced."

Mr. Lippmann's proposed remedy followed from his initial assumption that all the spending already going on, plus a great deal more, was absolutely necessary.

The fallacy of trying to balance the budget mainly with increased taxes can most easily be recognized if we look at the budget record since, say, this Lippmann proposal.

In fiscal 1959 the deficit was $12.9 billion because, though budget receipts were $79.2 billion, outlays were $92.1 billion. In 1960 taxes were higher, and revenues jumped to $92.4 billion, enough to have balanced the 1959 budget. They did achieve a small surplus—for one year. But in 1961 spending was raised to $97.8 billion, and deficits came back.

If we now look at 1983, the estimate of budget receipts is $598.3 billion, nearly eight times such receipts in 1959. But to no avail. Spending has increased far more, leaving us with a prospective deficit of $210 billion, the highest ever.

If we carry the record back to 1931, when our string of deficits began, we find we have increased our revenues 193 times. Even allowing for the inflation that the deficits themselves have largely brought about, Congress has increased our tax burden 30 times in real terms—without stopping the deficits.

So let us finally drop the delusion that we can pay for any level of spending by raising taxes. That myth has been leading us only toward increased unemployment and economic stagnation. And let us finally put aside, also, after the past half century's record, the idle hope that Congress can somehow be induced to return to responsibility or to discipline itself. What we desperately need is an outside curb on the current unrestrained power of Congress to spend.

How has this license come about? Doesn't the president have the same power to veto appropriation bills as he has to veto other measures? Theoretically he does. But Congress has perfected the device of throwing in pork-barrel, log-rolling and other vote-buying appropriations with those that the president needs to carry on the government. In addition, Congress has perfected the practice of passing its appropriation bills at the very end of a session, so that if the president vetoed a typical omnibus spending bill in order to get rid of an objectionable item, he would be left without any money at all. So far as appropriations bills are concerned, Congress has usurped total power. The presidential veto has been reduced to a nullity.

The cure for this would be a constitutional amendment granting the president power to reduce or veto individual items in appropriation bills.

This isn't a new proposal; it has a long history. There isn't any evidence, it is true, that the question was even discussed in the Constitutional Convention of 1787. But by the time of the Civil War, when the Confederate states delegates met to frame their own constitution, the problem had been recognized. And they specifically provided for the presidential item veto. In 1867, President Andrew Johnson complained that Congress had thrown, objectionable provisions into a section of an appropriations act that "virtually deprives the President of his constitutional functions as Commander in Chief of the Army." He felt forced, nevertheless, to give his approval to the measure, "but to accompany it with my protest."

Then, President Ulysses S. Grant asked Congress in 1873 to amend the Constitution "to authorize the Executive to approve of so much of any measure passing the two houses of Congress as his judgment may dictate, without approving the whole, the disapproved portion or portions to be subject to the same rules as now." Presidents Rutherford B. Hayes, in 1879, and Chester A. Arthur, in 1882, repeated this recommendation, though confining it to appropriation measures.

Franklin D. Roosevelt was the next president to ask for the item veto, followed by Dwight D. Eisenhower. Harry S Truman in his "Memoirs" wrote: "One important lack in the presidential veto power, I believe, is authority to veto individual items in appropriation bills."

Despite this long history, Congress has done precisely nothing. The apparently insoluble problem that confronts us is how to get congressmen voluntarily to give up or share a power that they have managed to usurp.

If we can't get two-thirds of Congress voluntarily to submit to the states an amendment giving the president the item veto, how can we get around this obstacle?

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

There is a glimmer of hope. The item veto is so essential to fiscal discipline that in 42 of our 50 states the governor already has this power. In at least some cases, he must have got it through voluntary action by the legislature. (This certainly has been helped by the fact that the states can't print money to cover their overruns.)

If Congress can't be persuaded to take the initiative in submitting a constitutional amendment allowing a presidential item veto, there are two alternatives. One is for two-thirds or more of the state legislatures to ask Congress to call a constitutional convention for the single purpose of drafting and submitting an item-veto amendment. Congress would be obliged to comply. The delegates to such a convention would need to meet only a day or two to carry out their assignment.

ADVANTAGE AND DISADVANTAGE

Another course would be to try to persuade Congress to permit a presidential item veto by simple legislation. This alternative actually was suggested by Mr. Roosevelt in his annual budget message of Jan. 3, 1939: "A respectable difference of opinion exists as to whether a similar item veto power could be given to the President by legislation or whether a constitutional amendment would be necessary. I strongly recommend that the present Congress adopt whichever course it may deem to be the correct one."

The advantage of granting the item veto by legislation would be that it would take effect immediately. The disadvantage is that the power could be taken back more easily by Congress or that Congress in the first place might be more reluctant to grant an item veto to the president then in office.

One question certain to be raised is whether a big-spending president actually would make much use of an item veto. One answer is that in that case, granting the power wouldn't do any harm. But it would at least remove the alibi that presidents have as long as they lack this power. With it, they could be held strictly responsible, as they in fairness can't be now, for the spending result. As matters stand, the president is directed to present a budget, and in the eyes of the public is held responsible for it, though he has neither the power to appropriate nor any real power to cut outlays.

Presidential power to reduce or veto individual items in appropriation bills certainly would make a real difference. If we can get back to prudent and responsible spending, the task of raising the matching revenues won't seem insuperable any longer.●

SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT COMPANY ACT 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. PARREN J. MITCHELL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, 1983 marks the 25th anniversary of the Small Business Investment Company (SBIC) program. Twenty-five years ago, small businesses, in spite of their enormous benefits to society, were often unable to obtain startup and expansion capital from established lending institutions. Congress acted to close this "equity gap" with the passage of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, paving the way for the development of an entirely new type of financial framework. The program has been a tremendous success, primarily in terms of generating small business growth, creating employment opportunities and increasing tax revenues for the Federal Government.

SBIC's are privately managed and operated financial institutions, licensed by the Small Business Administration, which provide equity capital, long-term loans and management assistance to small and independent businesses, especially those with significant growth potential. They are permitted to supplement their private investment capital with funds borrowed from the Government at an interest rate slightly above the cost of money to the Federal Treasury. There are approximately 500 SBIC's in operation today, and the Washington-based National Association of Small Business Investment Companies estimates that nearly $5 billion has been invested in 66,000 new and growing small businesses since the program began.

Congress also recognized that the Government should help stimulate SBIC's to invest more funds in minority-owned small firms. In 1971, a new and specialized form of SBIC was authorized to invest in small businesses owned by minorities and Vietnam war veterans. Commonly referred to as minority enterprise small business investment companies (MESBIC's), these investment firms are an integral part of the SBIC program, governed by similar regulations, and are especially responsive to the needs of the minority business community. Between 1974–82, MESBIC's have invested more than $260 million in small, disadvantaged firms. Today there are approximately 140 MESBIC's in operation.

Attesting to the SBIC program's success is an economic-impact study by Deloitte, Haskins & Sells (DH&S) and Arther D. Little, Inc., which showed that SBIC-backed firms experience growth rates almost 10 times as great as those of other small companies in such key areas as sales and profits. These firms have created hundreds of thousands of new jobs and have been in the forefront of the Nation's advances in technology and productivity. The DH&S study also showed that the employment growth of SBIC-assisted small firms has been 10 times greater than that of American companies in general. It costs the Federal Government only $312 to create a permanent, full-time job through the SBIC program.

In addition to supplying small business with needed equity capital, SBIC's have provided a bargain for American taxpayers. A separate cost-benefit study has shown that the program is one of the most cost effective ever developed by the Government. For every taxpayer dollar invested in the SBIC program, the Government has received $110 back in the form of tax revenues.

One of the most interesting features of the SBIC program is the partnership it involves between the public and private sectors. As the only venture capital program sponsored by the Government, it is an excellent example of how Government and private resources can work together for the full benefit of small business and the Nation.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate 12 companies spurred to success with financing from an SBIC or MESBIC. These firms will be honored at the SBIC industry's 25th anniversary celebration dinner on September 27 here in Washington. These distinguished small businesses are: American Frozen Foods, Inc., Bridgeport, Conn.; Ault, Inc., Minneapolis, Minn.; DICOMED Corp., Minneapolis, Minn.; Digitron, Inc., Dayton, Ohio; Essence Comunications, Inc., New York, N.Y.; E. R. LEBANON: ERRORS AND LESSONS

HON. MICHAEL A. ANDREWS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw my colleagues' attention to an editorial published in yesterday's Christian Science Monitor written by Representative SCHEUER, the distinguished chairman of the Natural Resources Subcommittee of the Committee on Science and Technology. This editorial, which deals with our policy in Lebanon, reflects the deeply held beliefs of our colleague from New York. Representative SCHEUER speaks with the voice of experience. He has served in this body for 19 years, has traveled extensively in the Middle East, and this article reflects his great concern for the security of the State of Israel and his desire to bring peace to that troubled region.

LEBANON: ERRORS AND LESSONS

(By James H. Scheuer)

A year ago, I stood in the streets of Beirut talking with ordinary Lebanese as they celebrated the departure of PLO guerrillas, the election of Bashir Gemayel as President, and their hopes for peace at last after more than a decade of communal strife inflamed by Arafat's gunmen and Syrian troops. Beirut was on the verge of regaining its role as a prosperous center of culture, finance, and communication in the Middle East.

Today, the hopes are dashed and Lebanon is a mess. The President elected a year ago was assassinated, the government of his brother-successor teeters near collapse and American soldiers are being killed and maimed on foreign soil for the first time in many years. Today, instead of having been humiliated and ousted as an influence in the region, Russia has massively rearmed Syria and holds a tight grip on the Syrian Army with "advisers" down to the battalion level. The Soviets have deployed SAM-5 missiles, manned exclusively by Russians and command-linked directly to the Soviet nuclear-missile network in southern Russia.

A year ago, with the PLO's military apparatus facing elimination and Russia's military equipment and political support of its radical clients discredited, the Reagan administration leaped in. Instead of backing our Israeli and pro-Western Lebanese allies, Ronald Reagan, like his predecessor, succumbed to the hubris that ultimately plagues provincial politicians suddenly thrust on the world stage. Overeager, quick to assert itself, and with a zeal uncomplicated by any depth of understanding of the historical forces involved, the administration rushed in and saved our adversaries—Syria, Russia, and the PLO—from certain political and military defeat at the hands of our allies—Israel and Lebanon. Every Druze mortar shell is a deadly reminder of opportunities lost.

The Reagan administration systematically and publicly attacked Israel. Weinberger condemned, Reagan frowned, and State Department Arabists fumed. Instead of focusing attention on the small, incremental steps that could build on the peace process, the administration diluted the climate for peace by advancing a quick fix, dubbed the Reagan Plan. The United States chose the critical moments of opportunity for both Lebanon and Israel to divert attention toward an unachievable, all-encompassing Middle East settlement. This set us apart from our supposed allies while their forces were still in the field.

We pandered to Hussein. He flirted and demurred until even Ronald Reagan must have realized that a Jordanian King cannot be a statesman when he fears assassination for merely talking of peace with Israel. We pandered to the Saudis. They have taken our AWACS, recycled our petrodollars to the PLO, and have continued to undermine the peace progress begun at Camp David.

Basically, Ronald Reagan and his administration have frittered away Lebanon's opportunity of a year ago to join Egypt as another nation at peace with Israel. The Reagan Middle East policy has lurched from confusing and ill-timed to vague and dangerous.

What are the broad policy lessons of Lebanon?

After 35 years of Jordanian and Syrian refusal to negotiate with Israel, the US should stop trying to entice them into the peace process with extravagant promises, sophisticated weapons sales, and a hope that US indecisiveness and weaknesses will be interpreted as flexibility and "evenhandedness."

For 60 years, Syria has insisted that all of Lebanon is a part of a "Greater Syria." Syria has cast its lot with the Soviets. No carrots offered by the US will induce them to quit Lebanon, particularly with their cherished goal of annexing Lebanon within sight.

Saudi money and influence is always going to place its highest premium on deflecting radical Arab threats to the monarchy's survival rather than advancing any plans, large or small, for peace in the region.

Arab states will sign a peace treaty with Israel (as in the case of Egypt), or find a modus vivendi (as in the case of Jordan and Lebanon), when it is in their best interests and when their leaders do not fear assassination by radicals for seeking peace with Israel.

Unfocused American political intervention can often be counterproductive and downright dangerous. Grandiose "overall" settlements make good press conferences, but they also send the wrong signals and can turn the potential for an incremental step toward peace into a major combat imbroglio dragging us closer to a full-scale war in the Middle East.

While it is clear that all of Lebanon's problems cannot be solved by any single event, it is equally clear that the withdrawal of Syria and a lessening of Soviet control is the crawling before the walking, the sine qua non, of the Lebanon equation.

What then should we do now?

First, we must prevent the collapse of the pro-Western Gemayel government, if for no other reason than that it would be interpreted as an instant American debacle. Congress must make it clear that our military presence is neither an open-ended blank check nor a face-saving exercise of such short duration as to constitute merely a "decent interval" before Syrian forces and their radical proxies march into Beirut.

Second, the Gemayel government must be persuaded to negotiate a genuine rapproachement with those Lebanese elements patriotic enough to reject Syrian collaboration and Russian domination. Obviously, much will depend on our ability to convince the Lebanese that our treatment of Israel over the past year will not be repeated with them at some critical moment.

Finally, the US must recognize that only effectively coordinated US-Israeli efforts will be successful in deterring Soviet-Syrian designs in Lebanon and throughout the Middle East. It is time for a new strategic agreement between us and our democratic ally, Israel. The US must make it clear to Syria, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and the USSR that continued intransigence will result in stronger American support for Israel and, ultimately, for Israeli claims in the Golan, Gaza, and the West Bank.

With dependable American support and a consistent Middle East policy, Israel and moderate Arabs can be brought together by time and self-interest in an accommodation indistinguishable from peace. Israel and Egypt do not have a perfect relationship, but Israelis and Egyptians are not killing each other, either. Reproducing this situation within Lebanon would be a significant contribution to peace.●

IMF BILL IS REALLY A JOBS BILL

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, in much of the debate on the increased U.S. quota for the IMF, the impact on U.S. employment seems to be lost. "More than 300,000 U.S. jobs have been lost as a result of declines in Latin American growth and imports," according to Bob Hormats, writing in the September 21 Washington Post. The loss of ability to import by Latin countries directly affects the U.S. economy. It is essential that we do what we can to support a stimulation of Latin economic development and trade to help our own economic resurgence.

Some say that supporting the IMF does not help a country improve its economy or help the United States improve its exports because the IMF requires a restriction on imports. Yet, the figures show that in 19 out of 26 recent cases where a restructing program has been required by the IMF, those countries have been able to increase their growth and imports in the first years compared to the period before implementing the IMF program.

I urge my colleagues to review Mr. Hormats' comments.

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 21, 1983]

THE IMF BILL IS REALLY A JOBS BILL

(By Robert D. Hormats)

Congress has before it a particularly important jobs bill: legislation to increase the resources of the International Monetary Fund. Its fate will significantly affect that of hundreds of thousands of American workers whose jobs depend on exports to developing nations. In fact, because roughly 4 percent of U.S. GNP depends on Third World markets, this legislation, and additional support for the World Bank, must be part of any serious strategy for sustained U.S. recovery.

There is a curious paradox today in Washington. On one hand, strong concerns are raised about problems caused or made worse by high developing-country debt: political unrest abroad, particularly in South America, and large U.S. trade deficits, with the attendant loss of American jobs. On the other hand, there is strong resistance in many quarters to providing adequate resources to the very institutions responsible for facilitating a smooth resolution of the debt problem—the IMF and World Bank.

So far developing-country debt has not led to the financial crisis many feared. Nor, however, is it close to being resolved. Most high-debt countries continue to recognize the need to reduce the gap between debt and their ability to service it and to overcome structural problems that weaken economic competitiveness. But high world interest rates, slow recovery in many industrialized countries, trade barriers and commodity subsidies that impede developing-country exports, and the cost and scarcity of new loans are placing a heavy burden on these countries.

Factories in a number of high-debt developing countries are already beginning to fall into disuse and disrepair because of the lack of funds to import necessary spare parts and raw materials. Budget restraints force cuts in health, nutrition and education programs; this hurts people already suffering from depressed economic growth and high unemployment. And investment in new productive capacity is being postponed.

These factors are generating intense social and political pressures. Most developing nations have high rates of population growth, no unemployment benefits and only recently established political systems. Long periods of economic decline, high unemployment and cuts in social programs cause severe hardship. The potential for instability is enormous. Even relatively localized dissidents, whose objectives are primarily political or parochial, can magnify their influence by playing on economic discontent. Such discontent has surely strengthened the forces that are causing the U.S. concern in Central America. It would be considerably more alarming if economic problems encouraged, and strengthened support for, extremists of the right and left in the larger countries of the hemisphere.

But the economic plight of developing countries does not affect their citizens alone. From 1975 to 1981, U.S. exports of goods and services to Third World countries increased from $40 billion to almost $100 billion—creating approximately 1.5 million new jobs in this country. Altogether in 1981 nearly 2.5 million American jobs depended on exports to developing areas.

As developing nations have pursued austerity policies to reduce debt, their imports have fallen dramatically. This is particularly true for Latin America—the largest developing-area market for U.S. products and the region with the largest debt burden. In 1982 exports to Argentina fell by roughly 40 percent, to Mexico and Chile by about 35 percent, to Brazil by 10 percent. 1983 has been a further fall. More than 300,000 U.S. jobs have been lost as a result of declines in Latin American growth and imports. This has had a particularly adverse effect on U.S. firms that produce capital goods (e.g., tractors and machinery) and industrial supplies (e.g., metals and chemicals) and on American farmers.

Next week's annual meeting of the IMF and World Bank will need to address the debt situation with a sense of urgency. Declines in growth, by causing a trade surplus, improve the ability of countries to service their debt but reduce public support for doing so. Most developing countries seem prepared to accept austerity and net outflows of capital for a limited time in order to repay at least a portion of their debt. They bear such costs in part to maintain access to foreign private and government-supported financing, in part to avoid the trade disruptions that would follow debt repudiation, and in part because they expect that after a reasonable time austerity can be eased and capital inflows will resume.

But if heavily indebted countries suffer prolonged net capital outflows, if their access to foreign markets and borrowing from commercial banks and government institutions is frustrated, and if their economies continue to decline, the debt issue will become increasingly politicized within and among them. Pressures will grow for unilateral (as opposed to negotiated) measures, including various types of moratoriums.

Healthy world recovery would, of course, considerably improve the outlook. But this cannot be counted on. And even a relatively strong recovery would not eliminate certain structural problems. Moreover, resolution of the debt problem itself will be an important component in ensuring sustained recovery in the industrialized countries. Therefore a focused set of measures to address the debt issue specifically is needed.

The IMF and World Bank must be given increased resources if they are to help facilitate resolution of the debt problem without political instability or sharp reductions in gowth. An increase in their funds is not, of course, the whole answer. But, if effectively utilized, such increases can help ease the debt burden and in so doing create the incentives to encourage: (a) continuation of adjustment efforts and repayment of debt; (b) prudent increases in commercial bank lending, and (c) willingness to reconcile differences through negotiation between borrowers and lenders.

The most urgent requirement is passage of legislation, without inappropriate encumbrances, to provide the U.S. share of recently agreed increases in IMF quotas and in the General Arrangements to Borrow (an IMF "backup fund"). Unless the IMF has additional resources it will be unable to meet new requirements to support adjustment measures. High-debt countries unable to obtain IMF support will suffer a further sharp reduction in growth. New commercial bank lending will decline. Political stability will suffer a serious blow, as will American trade.

In a very real sense, in addition to being important to avoid unrest in this hemisphere, this is a "jobs bill"—which will improve export prospects for U.S. industries still suffering from high unemployment. An increase in IMF Special Drawing Rights to bolster depleted foreign exchange reserves would also add a margin for growth and trade. And, toward these same ends, industrialized countries should agree to facilitate IMF borrowing in their markets in the event that becomes necessary to augment its liquidity.

Additional development assistance through the World Bank—and more co-financing between it and commercial banks—is needed to help high-debt countries to stengthen the productive sectors of their economies, reorient production away from import substitution, and improve opportunities for private investment. World Bank funds are also critically needed to address social and human needs.

The World Bank also should be permitted to accelerate lending for spare parts, industrial supplies and new equipment to overcome stagnation in key sectors. And it should be encouraged to develop new arrangements—perhaps even a new facility—that permits it to guarantee a portion of new commercial bank loans to supplement World Bank lending. Finally, and of greatest importance to the poorest nations, it is vital that there be a large replenishment of the International Development Association, the World Bank's soft loan window. These funds are vital to the low-income peoples of Africa and Sourth Asia, and also free up somewhat higher cost funds for the Western Hemisphere.

While Congress and the administration must clearly make budgetary trade-offs, and the choices are particularly hard in light of pressures to cut the budget deficit—which in my judgment is the key to sustained U.S. and world recovery—it would be wrong to believe that funds could be withheld from the IMF or World Bank without a major cost to the United States. The same country that spends so much to counter threats to stability in Central America, Africa and the Middle East must see the lack of wisdom in failure to provide the relatively small sums needed to avoid to conditions that breed instability in this hemisphere and elsewhere in the world. And, if we are serious about recovery in the United States and reducing unemployment, then we surely cannot fail to support programs to resolve the debt problem, for to do so would jeopardize markets in developing countries that take a larger percentage of our exports than Europe and Japan combined.●

BARTER PROMOTION ACT OF 1983

HON. COOPER EVANS

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. EVANS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today the "Barter Promotion Act of 1983," which was introduced in the Senate as S. 1638 by Senators TOWER, HUMPHREY, SYMMS, and NICKLES. This bill again points out the urgent need for reform in the system whereby our Government-owned surplus agricultural products can be swapped to offset the unmet goals of the national defense stockpile. The current world economic situation and our own domestic situation make innovative methods to facilitate trade attractive. These conditions include the high world debt problems which are precluding the smooth flow of much needed agricultural goods to some of our potential customers; slow world markets for many of the strategic and critical materials which are not available in the United States, but may be exported by other nations; huge Government-owned surpluses of dairy products (over 470 million pounds of butter, 851 million pounds of cheese, and 1.3 billion pounds of nonfat dry milk); and limited appropriations for the national defense stockpile in spite of the fact that the value of the unmet goals is valued at over $10 billion.

Under the barter authority included in the Commodity Credit Corporation (CCC) Charter Act, barter of some 60 materials from 50 countries was facilitated from 1950 to 1973. In 1973, the program was suspended for a number of reasons including changes in the strategic stockpile goals, and an inability to match suppliers of strategic materials with those which need our surplus agricultural products. Also, during the 1970's, our agricultural exports expanded at an unprecedented rate—total sales in fiscal year 1972 were $8.2 billion and by fiscal year 1981, the figure was $43.8 billion. However, the world economic situation has taken its toll on our exports and USDA is projecting a second consecutive year of decline in total exports to perhaps $34.5 billion. Since February 1982, two new barter arrangements with Jamaica have been negotiated.

However, as Senator TOWER pointed out when he introduced this bill, reform is needed in the barter authority. There are four major problems with the current authority which this bill attempts to correct in the interest of again making barter a tool for trade:

First: Due to a 1968 amendment, all U.S. Government barter contracts must be bilateral involving a direct exchange between the two countries. However, during the barter program that had begun in 1950, the contracts had evolved from bilateral to multilateral to open-ended. This evolution reflected the fact that opportunities for strictly bilateral deals were limited and the prospects for exchanges increased if third parties could be involved. This bill I am introducing today would allow a return to multilateral contracts, provided that such agreements do not displace cash sales of U.S. agricultural products or disrupt world market prices.

Second: Government-to-government barter is expensive and cumbersome. Our earlier program relied on private companies and it is the intention of this bill to again encourage private involvement.

Third. Currently, it takes nothing short of a Presidential mandate to pull all the interested agencies within the U.S. Government together to arrange a barter deal. Two barter deals have been negotiated under the current administration, both involving the shipment of dairy products to Jamaica for bauxite, and both were initiated at the direction of the President. There have been several proposals for barter transactions presented to one or more of the agencies interested in barter but due to disagreement among the agencies, none have been negotiated. This bill will require that an office be set up in the Executive Office of the President to coordinate our barter policy.

Fourth. The Government accounting conventions may preclude any efforts to expand our barter activities since the Commodity Credit Corporation must be reimbursed for all of the agricultural products used to acquire the strategic material through barter. However, the current level of appropriations ($120 million in the current fiscal year) for the national defense stockpile severely limits all purchases of materials. For example, the repayment for the Jamaican bauxite barters will be carried out over several years. This bill removes the present requirement that the CCC must be reimbursed.

This bill also requires the Secretary of Agriculture to report to Congress the activities of the administration's ad hoc interagency barter discussion group.

During this period of large international debt, tight budgets, and scarce foreign exchange, the fine-tuning of methods to keep trade flowing should be encouraged by the Congress. In the interest of expanding agricultural trade while at the same time bolstering the national defense stockpile, I urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

TRIBUTE TO HONORABLE LOUIS L. GOLDSTEIN

HON. PARREN J. MITCHELL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, Louis L. Goldstein, State Comptroller of Maryland, will be honored by the Mental Health Association on Wednesday, September 28. He will be celebrating his 70th birthday and 45 years of service to the citizens of Maryland.

I have known Goldstein for many years, and he has been consistently a hard worker, honest, and sincere. He has given the State of Maryland his perseverance, dedication, and strong will to do the very best he can to serve its citizens.

Mr. Goldstein was elected State comptroller in 1958 and has been reelected each time since 1958. He also was elected and served in the Maryland State Senate from 1946 to 1959.

Marylanders know this very witty and lively man as "Louie." He is a good friend, and as such, I listen to his report on the tomatoes, potatoes, cucumbers, and other vegetables he raised on his farm in southern Maryland, better known as Calvert County.

Louis L. Goldstein is a man of principle, integrity, and commitment, and God will continue to bless him "Real Good."●

KILLING THE GOOSE THAT LAYS THE GOLDEN EGG

HON. JOHN N. ERLENBORN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, whenever the opportunity is presented, I encourage people to communicate their opinions and problems with regard to Federal legislation to those who are elected to represent them. I especially urge this kind of communication when pension issues are involved because they are inevitably complex and the vast universe and variety of pension plans add to the confusion.

Oftentimes, the reaction I get seems to be, "But is anyone listening." There is the distinct feeling that, when it comes to pensions, too many of our colleagues hold to the theory that tax advantages for providing pensions are just another shelter for the rich. Therefore, so this school of thought goes, reduce and restrict the pensions of the owners and managers who pay the costs and never mind the objections being raised.

What this thinking overlooks is that the result of this misinformed logic, which so clearly was followed most recently in enactment of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 (TEFRA), is that those who bear the cost will decide it is not worth it. In other words, the ultimate result will be fewer employer-sponsored pension plans—not because the idea is unsound, but rather because we who write our tax laws will not heed the warnings we get.

One of those who heard my plea that the "pen is mightier than the sword," recently wrote me on how he tried to turn TEFRA around and how his efforts fell on deaf ears. If we persist in ignoring the reality of why employers sponsor pensions, he warns, there simply will be no pension plans sponsored. I urge my colleagues to read—and heed—his message, which follows:

WALTON LANTAFF SCHROEDER & CARSON,
Coral Gables, Fla., August 15, 1983.

Hon. JOHN N. ERLENBORN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ERLENBORN: I am a member of the Florida Bar but unfortunately was unable to attend the luncheon at the Florida Bar meeting at Disney World on June 17, 1983. I did have the opportunity of reading the speech that you presented at that time, and I agree almost completely with everything that you have said.

There is one point that I must express my disagreement on. In your closing you indicated that you felt that the "pen is mighter than the sword" and asked the audience to write their own congressman and senators to assist you in keeping the public and private pension systems headed in the right direction. I have to say that I am totally disheartened by the lack of response and lack of action which the letters which I wrote and letters which hundreds of my clients wrote during the initial consideration of H.R. 6410 and then the abomination that was enacted as The Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982. We wrote, called, sent telegrams and did everything that we could to express our concerns about the impact of the pension legislation initially proposed in H.R. 6410 and ultimately incorporated in The Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act. I received very few replies and, in fact, only two Congressmen from Florida have seemed at all interested. The Honorable William Lehman is the most interested, and he has been very helpful.

I have concluded that the pension issue has been perceived by many congressmen and senators as being a "rich taxpayer" issue and if a substantial amount of correspondence is received, it is dismissed as being prompted or promoted by rich taxpayers who want to avoid paying taxes. As you and I both know, this is not true but it is certainly the perception that many legislators have. I simply do not know how to eliminate that perception.

I have traveled to Washington to testify before Senator Chafee's Committee and then before the Internal Revenue Service within the last four months. I think that both of these trips were a waste of time and money, but I felt that I must make the effort. I will continue to write, call and testify as the situation demands, but I am frank to say that I am totally disheartened by the general inclination which I believe prevails in Washington to tinker with the private pension plan system to the end that it will be so repaired that it will completely break down. Everyone must understand that there is an element of self-interest in the sponsoring of a pension plan and if the benefits, for the owners who pay the costs of the pensions for all the other employees are reduced and restricted to the extent that it is not worth the costs of covering the other employees, there simply will be no pension plans sponsored. Most of my clients can, through tax shelters and other sources, obtain essentially the same or a greater current tax deduction. I would hate to see them go to tax shelters rather than sponsoring pension plans, but that is certainly the direction in which Congress is pushing them.

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

With best personal regards,

Sincerely,

CHARLES P. SACHER.●

AN EXPLANATION OF THE FEDERAL SUPPLEMENTAL COMPENSATION ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1983

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act Amendments of 1983 would modify and extend the current Federal supplemental compensation program for the long-term unemployed. The bill would:

Extend the program for 18 months; and

Provide for a three-tier schedule of benefits.

SECTION 101.—This section extends the expiration date of the Federal supplemental compensation program for 18 months, through March 31, 1985.

SECTION 102.—This section amends the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act to provide for a three-tier schedule of benefits: 10 weeks in a 5-percent period; 8 weeks in a 4-percent period; and 6 weeks in a low-unemployment period. This is a simplification of the four-tiered system that remains in effect through September 30, 1983.

SECTION 103. Subsection (a) provides that the amendments to the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act are effective for weeks beginning after September 30, 1983, when the present program would terminate but for the extension provided for in this bill.

Subsection (b) provides that the Secretary of Labor shall propose to each State which has an agreement in effect under the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act of 1982, a modification of the agreement to provide for payment of benefits under the act as amended by this bill. After such modification is proposed, a State will have 3 weeks to agree to the modified agreement, and if the State fails or refuses to enter into a modified agreement, the Secretary of Labor is required to terminate the agreement with the State effective with the end of the last week which ends on or before such 3-week period.

BUDGET ESTIMATE

Outlays for benefits and administration: Fiscal year 1984—$2.2 billion; fiscal year 1985—$1.1 billion; 18-month total—$3.3 billion.●

THE NEW FEDERALISM

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, the administration's New Federalism proposal represents a major shift in national priorities and resource allocation that is troubling on many different fronts.

While this plan has not been successful to date, it will not disappear as long as conservative programs and ideology dominate the national scene.

I would like to share with my colleagues the conclusion of a paper on New Federalism written by my son Larry while he was a student at the University of California at Berkeley.

NEW FEDERALISM

Seen in its larger context, the Reagan administration's "New Federalism" appears to be part of a conservative trend dating back to the Nixon administration to cut back on federal welfare responsibilities and perhaps dismantle the welfare state. This includes attacks upon the role of the federal government in providing uniform minimum standards for basic human needs, for public infrastructure, and for other "public goods" such as environmental quality and occupational safety.

Under the guise of decentralizing political power and promoting state and local autonomy, the "New Federalism" would abrogate federal responsibilities to human welfare and public infrastructure needs. The proposal ignores the criteria and concerns that have led to the historical development of the national agenda and federal role in domestic concerns. In particular, federal funds and political initiative are crucial to maintaining spillover and redistributive services as well as to ensuring uniformity in provision of public service. As a result, the "New Federalism" would likely lead to a significant reduction in basic public services in many states and localities, especially those services for low income and disadvantaged persons. Current regional, interstate, and intrastate disparities in provision of public services would be exacerbated.

As part of the Reagan administration's broader economic program and ideology, the "New Federalism" aims at shifting national resources from social programs to military programs, from the poor to the rich, and from the public sector generally to the private sector.

By eliminating federal aid for many domestic programs, the "New Federalism" would free up national enery and revenues for increases in military spending.

The "New Federalism" would contribute to a shift of national resources from poor to rich by eliminating federal aid for most poverty programs. Meanwhile, the administration's current tax reductions send national revenues mainly to wealthy individuals and large corporations.

The "New Federalism" would contribute to a general shift of national resources from the public sector to the private sector. It would eliminate billions of dollars of federal aid for domestic public services that could not or would not be restored by many states and localities. In addition, by shifting excise taxes on the tobacco, alcohol, telephone, and oil industries from the federal to state level, industries would almost certainly pay less taxes. Meanwhile, the current tax breaks to wealthy individuals and large corporations distribute national resources to the private sector. The administration's reduction of regulations on industry also shift national resources from the public to private sector.

These shifts in national priorities and resource allocations are troubling on many different fronts. The appallingly poor quality of public services is reaching crisis proportions in many areas; air, water and land pollution, decaying urban areas, declining education, increasing poverty, and deteriorating infrastructure demand attention and federal involvement. Meanwhile, the escalating arms race threatens the survival of the whole planet.

The shift of resources from the poor to the rich and from the public sector to the private sector are ultimately defended as part of the supply side economic theory in which increased private investment and productivity would bring prosperity to all. In order to remove the foundations for these shifts and the "New Federalism", supply-side economics must be given the public discrediting it deserves and a comprehense economic plan must be developed to replace it that will address real concerns for decentralized economic power and local autonomy.

Briefly, the main assumption behind supply-side economics that justifies shifting resources to the private sector is that business has a capital shortage which is preventing it from investing in domestic productivity. All the evidence suggests that U.S. corporations have had, on the whole, no shortage of capital and no trouble investing and making profits in foreign markets, real estate, short-term financial markets, and mergers.[1] The problem is that they have not been investing in domestic technology, structures, and jobs. Instead of abdicating its role as concerns industry, the federal government needs to create incentives for productive investments and disincentives for non-productive investments, such as lowering interest rates for the former and raising them for the latter.

The "New Federalism" has not been successful to date and will probably not reach a vote in Congress by 1984 even in a modified form. Because it is embedded in the administration's broader economic program and ideology, however, it will not disappear as long as conservative program and ideology dominate the national scene. Future perhaps successful attempts will be made to eliminate federal responsibility for human welfare and public infrastructure needs under the pretense of decentralizing political power and promoting local autonomy.●

CAPT. CHARLES EDWARD BIELE, SR.

HON. ROBIN TALLON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a fine citizen of my district who passed away on September 19.

Charles E. Biele, Sr., age 78, a retired Navy captain, was residing in Myrtle Beach at the time of his death. He served in the Navy for 31 years as a naval communications expert including World War II and the Korean conflict. Before the war, he served aboard destroyers and battleships. He was the district communications officer in the Panama Canal Zone at the beginning of World War II and served in the same capacity in Guam during the Korean conflict. He concluded his career at the National Security Agency.

At age 19, Captain Biele was a radio operator aboard the SS Tredenick, a British merchant ship which spent 6 months in the South Seas. He was the first American on Rabaul and the only American to take part in the first two-way radio contact between Australia and the United States and again from New Zealand to the United States.

Captain Biele was an active radio amateur for over 64 years and belonged to almost every amateur radio organization. In 1982, he was nominated to the Amateur Radio Hall of Fame and was runner up to BARRY GOLDWATER who won. In 1963, the Palmetto chapter of the Quarter Century Wireless Association awarded him a plaque for his outstanding contributions to amateur radio. The following month the International Quarter Century Wireless Association presented him with a scroll honoring him for his achievements and outstanding contributions to amateur radio.

Captain Biele belonged to the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Retired Officers Association, the American Forces Communications and Electronics Association, the Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers, the American Radio Relay League, the Veterans Wireless Association and, the Myrtle Beach Amateur Radio Club.

Captain Biele served his country and community throughout his life. He will be deeply missed by all those who knew him.●

MAYOR EDGAR ENOCH: A LIFETIME OF SERVICE

HON. RONNIE G. FLIPPO

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to one of the most outstanding and dedicated public servants in the history of Alabama.

The Honorable Edgar Starnes Enoch will retire October 1 from his duties as mayor of Sheffield, Ala., ending an illustrious career of 42 years of service, including 35 years as city clerk and treasurer, and 7 years as mayor.

It is hard to imagine a city of Sheffield without Edgar Enoch.

Born in Stephenson, Ala., in 1908, he moved to Sheffield in 1918 and was educated in the public schools of Sheffield. He later earned a B.S. degree from what was then Florence Normal School—now the University of North Alabama. He also studied at Peabody College and Vanderbilt University in preparation for a teaching career.

He taught school in Colbert and Lawrence Counties, and served as principal of Howell-Graves School.

On October 7, 1941, he was appointed city clerk and treasurer of Sheffield, but served only a short time before entering the U.S. Army in the midst of World War II. He distinguished himself with service in the 34th Infantry Division at Anzio and many other places that are now famous in military history.

Following the end of World War II, he returned to Sheffield and resumed his duties as city clerk.

He served with distinction in that capacity under eight different mayors, including Lynn Manning, Hoyte Greer, J. K. Johnson, Leonard Beard, Paul Saywell, Lewis Timberlake, B. F. (Buddy) Walden, and F. E. (Buddy) Draper.

His first retirement came in June of 1976, when he stepped down from the office of city clerk. But the call of public service was too great for this fine gentleman, and he was elected mayor of Sheffield that same year.

John Watkins, long-time executive director of the Alabama League of Municipalities, said Mayor Enoch had one of the longest tenures of any public official in Alabama. "He has given his life to public service, and he is the most unselfish man I have ever met. I never knew him to fail to answer any call for help. He is a terrific, fine man," Watkins said.

Former Mayor Lewis Timberlake, who is himself a distinguished public servant, said, "I don't know anyone who has been more dedicated to Sheffield than Edgar Enoch. We are certainly going to miss him."

To show you the kind of man Edgar Enoch is, when he attended his last city commission meeting, with tears in his eyes, he thanked everyone "for putting up with me for so long."

Perhaps the greatest tribute to the efficiency and effectiveness of Mayor Enoch's work is that he leaves Sheffield with a surplus of $414,109. During his last year, he increased the surplus by some $240,000. In these times of tight budgets and inflation, I find that absolutely incredible.

Edgar Enoch did not stop working when he went home from city hall. He was the song leader and teacher of the men's bible class at Sheffield First United Methodist Church, as well as an active member of the Sheffield Kiwanis Club for the same period that he served the city so well.

The spouses of public servants also make valuable contributions. I therefore want to pay tribute to Sheffield's First Lady, Mrs. Louise McFarland Enoch. She came to Sheffield as a young TVA employee and is still working as a legal secretary. I want to publicly thank Mrs. Enoch for all she has meant to Sheffield.

Words are not adequate to express my appreciation and admiration for the contributions of Mayor Enoch. As we pause to wish him good luck, good health, and God speed, we are deeply grateful for his matchless service and gladdened that this second retirement probably will not last either, even at age 75.

Knowing Edgar Enoch, if there is work to be done, he will be a willing worker.●

IN HONOR OF MARYLAND STATE COMPTROLLER LOUIS GOLDSTEIN

HON. BEVERLY B. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, there is a lot to say about Louis Goldstein, and as we well know, Louis Goldstein usually has a lot to say. We are honoring him for 45 years of distinguished service, although I would like to note that he has had trouble finding anyone to hire him besides the State of Maryland. Also, it is commonly known that Louis was the subject of the first human cloning operation, and this is how he manages to attend political functions in Hagerstown, Annapolis, Baltimore, and Salisbury at the same time. I may one day attend a political function when Louis is not present, but I do not know where in the world it would be. I expected to see him at the South Pole, but was told that I had just missed him.

It has been my privilege to know and work with Louis Goldstein for many, many years, and the State of Maryland is extremely fortunate to have had a man of his energy, integrity, and caliber in its service for so long. I look forward to his next 45 years as the great comptroller of the great State of Maryland.●

UNESCO—A FORUM FOR EDUCATION OR ANTI-AMERICAN PROPAGANDA?

HON. GERALD B. H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, as the Congress weighs the proper level of American taxpayer support for the United Nations, it is important for all of us to reflect on what this body has become under the influence of Soviet surrogates from the Third World. U.N. headquarters in New York seems oftentimes to house a vocal group of anti-American extremists who alternately insult our country and interfere with our foreign policy. Why even UNESCO, the seemingly nonpolitical educational and cultural arm of the United Nations is not all it seems, but is rather a front for intensive Soviet propaganda and espionage, as reported in the August 27 issue of the British Economist.

The Economist article follows:

[From the Economist, Aug. 27, 1983]

EVEN WORSE AT UNESCO

The worms in the Unesco can are wriggling out, and the Americans are fed up with paying to keep them in. Especially as the chief occupation of many people at Unesco nowadays seems to be to nag the United States and the west in favour of the radicals of Asia, Africa and the Soviet block.

Many of the Americans and west Europeans on the staff of the Paris headquarters of Unesco are liberals loth to agree with the Reaganites on anything. But now they do. Their morale is low, trampled by a mixture of nepotism, maladministration, reverse racism, and an apparently incorrigible tilt towards the hardliners of the third world. The Soviet Union is smiling. A lot of Unesco schemes are worthy but the organisation's purported aim—to further education, science and culture—is increasingly hidden behind a smokescreen of political rhetoric and propaganda.

The American government and seven other rich western countries pay for nearly two thirds of the Unesco budget (a lot of which is gobbled up by the organisation's lavish Paris offices). The proposed budget for 1984 and 1985 is a sturdy $433m. But the vote on budgetary and other matters is democratic, with each of the 160 members carrying equal weight. So the eight rich grumblers are bound to be outgunned. Their only sanction is to withdraw from Unesco.

The bad blood is not just between the west and the rest. The most notable recent fall guys do not, in Unesco-speak, qualify as "imperialist". The first top-level casualty was a Mexican, Mr. Rodolfo Stavenhagen, who became head of Unesco's social sciences division in 1979 with a high professional reputation. Two years later he left because of what he called "the atmosphere of distrust, denunciation and a sort of bureaucratic terrorism which has led to total intellectual suffocation".

He was replaced by a lady from Zaire whose rewriting of programmes led to the resignation this year of the respected Swiss head of the division for human rights and peace, Mr. Pierre de Senarclens. A recent poll of staff members showed that only 3% of them thought Unesco was recruiting high-quality people and deciding promotions on the basis of professional efficiency.

The latest casualty is another Unesco stalwart, Mr. Dragoljum Najman of Jugoslavia, who is considered to have been largely responsible for the elevation of a Senegalese, Mr. Amadou-Mahthar M'Bow, to be director-general of the organisation in 1974. Their differences came to the surface in June when the Jugoslav returned from a year at Harvard to discover that he had been demoted from his assistant director-generalship.

These differences are symbolic as well as personal. Mr. Najman objects to the "regality" of Mr. M'Bow's rule at the Paris palace. But the two also stand for different traditions. Mr. Najman is an experienced international civil servant and competent scholar, inspired by the fierce non-alignment advocated by Nehru and Tito. Mr. M'Bow and his friends have supplanted such members of the Unesco old guard with placemen, many of them left-wing Africans, radical Arabs or overt pro-Russians.

The professionals say that worthwhile projects are being turned from genuine education into propaganda, often by incompetent managers chosen for their political or national connections. The bloated bureaucracy of Unesco has long been a Parisian joke. The number of assistant directors-general has swollen from five to 13.

It is partly by default that the western governments on Unesco's executive board have allowed this to happen. In the Carter era and before, American administrations seemed to prefer a quiet life to challenging Mr. M'Bow.

Now even the most devoted liberals are glad that Mr. Reagan is taking a tougher line, not just by pulling apart the more waffly programme proposals and opposing the campaign for "new world information order" but also by scrutinising the budget, which the Americans say should have zero growth. They reckon that the latest draft provides for a real increase of 37%. The state department is now reviewing American membership.

The biggest grouse, however, is against the alleged increase in the politicisation of projects. Current Unesco operations in Afghanistan, for instance, are said to be virtually Sovietised by the selection of Soviet staff members or Soviet sympathisers to run them. Three Unesco-employed Soviet spies recently expelled from France by the French government remain on the payroll "on extraordinary leave". The United States, in effect, remains their biggest single paymaster. The contract of one of them has just been extended in absentia.●

A TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM COOPER, JR.

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to pay tribute today to a devoted public servant and close personal friend, William Cooper, Jr., who died recently after a 20-year battle with cancer.

Bill served the people of the town of Aberdeen in public office for a quarter of a century, elected 10 times to the town's board of commissioners, including service as mayor, and once to the Harford County Council. He was extremely devoted to the town of Aberdeen, his first love, and its people. He wanted to make sure that the taxpayers got their money's worth. He had the rare combination of a sharp mind and commonsense and fought with all his heart for what he thought was right. There are a lot of smart people in politics, but the number of people with courage, guts, and integrity are very small. Bill Cooper had those qualities. He believed in the community, and he was a public servant of the best sort. His honesty earned him the support of the voters, the respect of his colleagues, and the admiration of his friends. As strongly as he felt about his politics, he never held a grudge. As one associate said, "He could have the most heated argument with you, and then he would turn around and make you laugh before you left the room."

He was extremely devoted to his family as well as his town and fought his personal battle with cancer with the same steadfast courage with which he fought his political battles. Through it all, he still had more concern for others than he had for himself. As one of his close friends said, "When he was hurting so bad, he was still trying to help someone else." I can think of no higher praise than that.●

SATELLITES SAVE LIVES

HON. HAROLD L. VOLKMER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a recent incident which dramatically demonstrates the success of the U.S. civil space program and the extent to which it touches our own individual lives.

On August 1, two Canadians making their way through the Tashka Rapids on the Winisk River were tossed from their canoe and left stranded in the wilderness below Hudson Bay. Ashore, the men activated their emergency locator transmitter, which emits an internationally recognized distress signal. Five hundred and seventeen miles above the Earth, the NOAA-8 environmental monitoring satellite in orbit picked up the signals. The satellite picked up the first signal at 11:40 a.m. EDT, and it received the second signal at 1:35 p.m. EDT.

Canadian rescue forces launched a twin-engine Buffalo aircraft to search for the pair later in the day. Because of the distance involved, the plane did not reach the vicinity until slightly after midnight on August 3. On the search plane's second pass over the area, the crew spotted the two canoeists, and they dropped a portable radio and supplies. A helicopter was dispatched to pick up the pair and fly them to a hospital in Moosonee, where they were treated for minor injuries.

The satellite which picked up the canoeists' distress signal, launched from Vandenberg Air Force Base in California last March 28, is part of an international program known as COSPAS/SARSAT—search and rescue satellite aided tracking. Other participants in the program include Canada, France, and the Soviet Union. The Soviets have two search and rescue equipped satellites in orbit. The satellites receive distress signals from planes and ships and relay them to stations on the ground where officials detect and locate the accident and dispatch rescue forces.

This rescue of the two Canadians marks the first time the American satellite has been instrumental in a rescue. This rescue was among six recent incidents in which 10 lives have been saved through the use of these satellites. These 10 bring to 58 the number of people who have been saved since the international program in September 1982 made satellite-aided rescues possible.

I am greatly pleased by their achievement. It is a tribute to our commitment to the peaceful use of outer space and also to our continued efforts to achieve international participation and cooperation in space applications.●

A TRIUMPH FOR THE VOICE OF AMERICA

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, when we debated the resolution condemning the Soviet Union for shooting down the Korean airliner, I pointed out that one way of hurting the Soviet Union would be to make our international broadcasting stations—the Voice of America and Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty—the best and most technically advanced in the world.

We have recently had definitive proof of the value of the Voice of America (VOA). On Saturday, September 24, 1983, President Reagan delivered an address carried live on the Voice of America and beamed to the Soviet Union. We have no way of knowing as yet what effect that broadcast has had, but we do know that the Soviet press agency TASS, a government agency like every other communications institutions in the U.S.S.R., has denounced the broadcast. What better proof do we need that at least some Russian listeners heard the broadcast—or, in any event, that the Soviet rulers heard it and thought enough about it to blast it? Can you imagine any American President ever taking the time and energy to condemn a broadcast made over Radio Moscow to the United States? The rulers in the Kremlin know that even if a relative handful of Soviet citizens heard that broadcast, the seeds of doubt are planted concerning the officials' lies of the Politburo concerning the airliner.

As long as we can send the truth to the Soviet Union, the Soviet rulers always have to think twice about what they say. They spend more on electronically jamming our broadcasts than we spend on our entire international broadcasting operation. The Voice of America and Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty are worth three divisions of troops—at least.

At this point, I wish to insert in the RECORD, "Soviet Denounces Reagan's Address" from the New York Times, Monday, September 26, 1983.

SOVIET DENOUNCES REAGAN'S ADDRESS

(By Serge Schmemann)

Moscow, Sept. 25.—The Soviet press agency Tass today denounced President Reagan's Voice of America broadcast as a "fresh demagogic speech" and a "propaganda performance" designed to camouflage the militaristic course of his Administration.

"President Reagan was trying to assure that he wishes a dialogue with the Soviet Union," Tass said. "But what is the real worth of these hypocritical statements when the whole world sees that Washington's present policy is aimed not at a dialogue, but at a confrontation with the U.S.S.R., at aggravating the international situation?"

Western diplomats said that the Tass reaction followed generally predictable lines, given the normally strident attacks on President Reagan in the Soviet press and the fact that Tass has already denounced the arms proposals that the President plans to announce Monday at the United Nations.

In his address on Saturday, which was carried live by the Voice of America in several languages, Mr. Reagan appealed to the Soviet people to "please understand" why there has been an international outcry over the Soviet Union's destruction of a South Korean commercial jet Sept. 1 with the loss of 269 lives. The President also spoke of his personal commitment to achieving agreement on disarmament.

ATTACK CENTERS ON PRESIDENT

The President, however, gave no details of his new proposals, and Tass accordingly directed its attack more at Mr. Reagan than at his new offers.

There was little immediate indication of what impact Mr. Reagan's speech may have had among Soviet people. The Voice of America's Russian-language broadcasts are jammed in many areas of the Soviet Union, although Russians eager to follow the news have learned to tune in after midnight, when the signal is strongest.

There was no advance notice, however, that Mr. Reagan was planning to speak, so Russians who do not routinely listen probably missed the speech.

In addition, public discussion of the speech was not likely, because those who do regularly listen to the station are usually reluctant to broadcast the fact in public.

In several instances, Tass claimed to be speaking for the Soviet people in attacking the speech. Commenting on Mr. Reagan's positions on the Geneva negotiations on medium-range missiles, for example, Tass said "the President hopes in vain that the world public is uninformed about the real state of things."

CALCULATION BUILT ON SAND

"This calculation is particularly clearly built on sand as far as the Soviet people are concerned," the agency continued. "The latter are well informed about the contents of both Soviet and American proposals."

Tass also said that "Soviet people are fully and correctly informed about the actual circumstances in connection with the intrusion of the South Korean plane into the U.S.S.R.'s airspace." Tass added: "But the Americans have not heard a truthful statement from the President."

Tass said there has not been a "grain of truth" in Mr. Reagan's claims that he is trying to achieve progress in the Geneva talks on medium-range weapons. His only goal, Tass said, was to "insure, whatever the cost, the deployment of new American medium-range missiles in Western Europe."

NATO plans to deploy 572 new medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe, starting in December, unless the Americans and Russians can agree in Geneva.

Tass said the President had "pretentiously" called his address an "appeal to all people," and cited the secrecy surrounding the broadcast and its broad dissemination as evidence that it had been "conceived as a propaganda performance on an international scale."●

SECRETARY WATT IS THE FIRST SECRETARY OF INTERIOR TO STAND UP FOR HANDICAPPED RIGHTS

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I find it incredible that the very people who are criticizing Secretary James Watt for his unfortunate remark about the makeup of his coal commission are the same people who last year fought tooth and nail to continue to exclude the handicapped of this Nation from our beautiful 80 million acres of wilderness.

Last year, with support from the Department of the Interior and handicapped Americans, I introduced an amendment to allow motorized access by handicapped Americans into wilderness areas where roads existed. Members of the Interior Committee who evidently care little or nothing about the handicapped fought Secretary Watt's and my initiative, claiming that the amendment was not proper, and that those handicapped and aged Americans who "really wanted" to go to our wilderness areas would go despite their physical handicaps. The problem is a significant one that continues to go unaddressed, despite Secretary Watt's leadership on the issue. It seems that Secretary Watt's critics are more interested in what he says than what he does. I grew up to look at actions, not words. With that in mind, I intend to introduce in the very near future legislation which I am sure will enjoy the administration's support to make accessible this Nation's wilderness areas for all the public, not just the young and healthy. I will take names at the time, Mr. Speaker, and judge by the actions of Mr. Watt's detractors. I have learned it does little to pay attention to their words.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

A KOREAN AMERICAN VIEW OF THE KAL INCIDENT

HON. BOBBI FIEDLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, September 16, I took part in hearings conducted by the Republican study committee, to examine the causes and implications of the recent Soviet action in shooting down a civilian passenger plane, KAL flight No. 007. One of the many distinguished witnesses, Dr. Kyo Ryoon Jhin, vice chairman of the League of Korean Americans, made a very moving statement in representation of the Korean-American community in the United States. I am reproducing the statement below although the written text does little justice to his spoken words.

The longshoremen Mr. Jhin mentions in his statement are, I might say, in my district in California. Read what Mr. Jhin had to say.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee and my distinguished colleagues, on behalf of the chairman, William H. S. Lee, of the League of Korean Americans and 700,000 Korean Americans, I appreciate the opportunity to denounce the Soviet Union's Korean airline massacre of 269 innocent people on August 31, 1983. The League of Korean Americans is a nonprofit civic organization of Americans of Korean ethnic background. We had, of course, many friends aboard, and the Soviet atrocity was a cruel blow to a major means of communication between our members' native and adopted countries.

In addition to accepting for ourselves the sympathy of our friends at our losses, we wish to offer to the families and friends of Congressman Larry McDonald and 60 other Americans who were murdered by the Soviet Union, our profound feelings of sympathy and our prayers.

According to the Soviet Foreign Minister, they will do it again under similar circumstances. The Korean airline massacre was a violation of human rights of 269 people and the world. This proves once again, the Soviet system disregards the value of human lives. We cannot believe such barbaric murder took place in this civilized world. No, it did not happen in the civilized world; it happened under the uncivilized Soviet regime.

According to the Asahi newspaper in Tokyo, Japanese military sources said the following sequence of words in Russian were overheard:

Airline light is burning.
Take aim at the target.
Aim Taken.
Fire.
Fired.
The target is destroyed.

Is this peace loving? Is this for the brotherhood of mankind? This is the real evidence of the Soviet Union's policy. They are clearly not for peace loving and neither for the brotherhood of mankind. They are murderers. They are for atrocity. Peace-loving people around the world must be united to condemn the Soviet atrocity. We must do everything in our power to prevent future Soviet atrocity. We must speak out for freedom for those who are in the concentration camps in the Soviet Union and other Communist countries.

In the name of the 269 innocent people who were massacred by the Soviet Union, in the name of civilized peace-loving people everywhere in the world, who deplore the Soviet massacre, we ask our U.S. Government to do everything possible to pressure the Soviet Union to:

1. Give a full and detailed account of what happened on the Korean Airline 007 on August 31, 1983. We demand the truth on this matter.

2. To apologize and compensate for the loss of the 269 lives to the families of those killed and for the aircraft.

3. To punish those responsible for the inhumane murderous act against innocent passengers.

4. To provide access to the crash site for South Korean and international representatives for investigation.

5. To provide credible guarantees against the recurrence of such tragedy.

We call on the International Court of Justice to fully investigate this barbaric act of murder.

Until the Soviet Union carries out the above demands, we call on all men and women of good will everywhere to join us in our protest and impose an economic and trade embargo against the Soviet Union and boycott travel to the U.S.S.R.

We commend the International Federation of Airline Pilot Associations for their call for member national associations to ban all flight to Moscow for 60 days. We also applaud the Governors who have suspended the sale of Vodka in their States. We express our sincere appreciation to longshoremen in California who refused to unload the cargo from the Soviet freighter. We commend a number of governments who canceled visits by Soviet officials, suspended exchange programs with the Soviet Union, and suspended Aroflot landing rights.

We need to become "peace-loving solidarity" united against the Soviet crime. Thank you.●

THE INTERCOLLEGIATE STUDIES INSTITUTE CELEBRATES ITS 30TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, this year the Intercollegiate Studies Institute (ISI) celebrates its 30th anniversary. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate ISI for its many years of devotion to, as its motto states, "Educate for Liberty."

A leader of the conservative intellectual movement in America, ISI is dedicated to preserving those ideals that this Nation was founded upon. Since its foundation, ISI has devoted its efforts to educating college students to the political ideas of the conservative cause. We all owe a debt to ISI for promoting lively and fruitful political discourse.

As a trustee of ISI and as one who firmly believes in the purpose of this organization, I am especially proud to commend ISI for its many years of service to the youth of America. I wish the Intercollegiate Studies Institute continued success in its undertakings.●

CONGRESS SHOULD SUPPORT THE IMF LOAN INCREASE

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, after an exhaustive debate, the House recently approved legislation to increase the U.S. contribution to the International Monetary Fund—IMF. Like many Members, I have been deluged with letters and postcards from constituents asking why the United States should continue to support the IMF.

Writing in the Washington Post of September 21, Robert D. Hormats, president of the investment banking firm Goldman, Sachs, & Co., and a senior economic official to the last four administrations, makes the case for U.S. support for the IMF abundantly clear. As Mr. Hormats notes, from 1975 to 1981, U.S. export of goods and services to Third World countries increased from $40 to $100 billion, creating nearly 1.5 million new jobs in the U.S.

Because of the worldwide recession, many of the heavily indebted developing nations have had to implement austerity policies to reduce their debt. This is particularly true of Latin America. As a result of declining Latin American growth and imports, more than 300,000 U.S. jobs have been lost. Without increased IMF loans, the growth rate of Latin American and other countries will be slowed even further, resulting in the loss of still more American jobs.

Just as important is the political cost we would pay if we withheld funds from the IMF. As Mr. Hormats indicates, the United States, "the same country that spends so much to counter threats to stability in Central America, Africa, and the Middle East must see the lack of wisdom in failure to provide the relatively small sums needed to avoid the conditions that breed instability in this hemisphere and elsewhere in the world."

In sum, Mr. Speaker, the IMF bill is not only sensible foreign policy, it is a jobs bill for American workers. It will create jobs in this country. As Mr. Hormats concludes, "if we are serious about recovery in the United States and reducing unemployment, then we surely cannot fail to support programs to resolve the debt problem, for to do so would jeopardize markets in developing countries that take a larger percentage of our exports than Europe and Japan combined."

The full text of Mr. Hormats' article follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 21, 1983]

THE IMF BILL IS REALLY A JOBS BILL

(By Robert D. Hormats)

Congress has before it a particularly important jobs bill: legislation to increase the resources of the International Monetary Fund. Its fate will significantly affect that of hundreds of thousands of American workers whose jobs depend on exports to developing nations. In fact, because roughly 4 percent of U.S. GNP depends on Third World markets, this legislation, and additional support for the World Bank, must be part of any serious strategy for sustained U.S. recovery.

There is a curious paradox today in Washington. On one hand, strong concerns are raised about problems caused or made worse by high developing-country debt: political unrest abroad, particularly in South America, and large U.S. trade deficits, with the attendant loss of American jobs. On the other hand, there is strong resistance in many quarters to providing adequate resources to the very institutions responsbile for facilitating a smooth resolution of the debt problem—the IMF and World Bank.

So far developing-country debt has not led to the financial crisis many feared. Nor, however, is it close to being resolved. Most high-debt countries continue to recognize the need to reduce the gap between debt and their ability to service it and to overcome structural problems that weaken economic competitiveness. But high world interest rates, slow recovery in many industrialized countries, trade barriers and commodity subsidies that impede developing-country exports, and the cost and scarcity of new loans are placing a heavy burden on these countries.

Factories in a number of high-debt developing countries are already beginning to fall into disuse and disrepair because of the lack of funds to import necessary spare parts and raw materials. Budget restraints force cuts in health, nutrition and education programs; this hurts people already suffering from depressed economic growth and high unemployment. And investment in new productive capacity is being postponed.

These factors are generating intense social and political pressures. Most developing nations have high rates of population growth, no unemployment benefits and only recently established political systems. Long periods of economic decline, high unemployment and cuts in social programs cause severe hardship. The potential for instability is enormous. Even relatively localized dissidents, whose objectives are primarily political or parochial, can magnify their influence by playing on economic discontent. Such discontent has surely strengthened the forces that are causing the U.S. concern in Central America. It would be considerably more alarming if economic problems encouraged, and strengthened support for, extremists of the right and left in the larger countries of the hemisphere.

But the economic plight of developing countries does not affect their citizens alone. From 1975 to 1981, U.S. exports of goods and services to Third World countries increased from $40 billion to almost $100 billion—creating approximately 1.5 million new jobs in this country. Altogether in 1981 nearly 2.5 million American jobs depended on exports to developing areas.

As developing nations have pursued austerity policies to reduce debt, their imports have fallen dramatically. This is particularly true for Latin America—the largest developing-area market for U.S. products and the region with the largest debt burden. In 1982 exports to Argentina fell by roughly 40 percent, to Mexico and Chile by about 35 percent, to Brazil by 10 percent. 1983 has seen a further fall. More than 300,000 U.S. jobs have been lost as a result of declines in Latin American growth and imports. This has had a particularly adverse effect on U.S. firms that produce capital goods (e.g., tractors and machinery) and industrial supplies (e.g. metals and chemicals) and on American farmers.

Next week's annual meeting of the IMF and World Bank will need to address the debt situation with a sense of urgency. Declines in growth by causing a trade surplus, improve the ability of countries to service their debt but reduce public support for doing so. Most developing countries seem prepared to accept austerity and net outflows of capital for a limited time in order to repay at least a portion of their debt. They bear such costs in part to maintain access to foreign private and government-supported financing, in part to avoid the trade disruptions that would follow debt repudiation, and in part because they expect that after a reasonable time austerity can be eased and capital inflows will resume.

But if heavily indebted countries suffer prolonged net capital outflows, if their access to foreign markets and borrowing from commercial banks and government institutions is frustrated, and if their economies continue to decline, the debt issue will become increasingly politicized within and among them. Pressures will grow for unilateral (as opposed to negotiated) measures, including various types of moratoriums.

Healthy world recovery would, of course, considerably improve the outlook. But this cannot be counted on. And even a relatively strong recovery would not eliminate certain structrual problems. Moreover, resolution of the debt problem itself will be an important component in ensuring sustained recovery in the industrialized countries. Therefore a focused set of measures to address the debt issue specifically is needed.

The IMF and World Bank must be given increased resources if they are to help facilitate resolution of the debt problem without political instability or sharp reductions in growth. An increase in their funds is not, of course, the whole answer. But, if effectively utilized, such increases can help ease the debt burden and in so doing create the incentives to encourage: a) continuation of adjustment efforts and repayment of debt; b) prudent increases in commercial bank lending; and c) willingness to reconcile differences through negotiation between borrowers and lenders.

The most urgent requirement is passage of legislation, without inappropriate encumbrances, to provide the U.S. share of recently agreed increases in IMF quotas and in the General Arrangements to Borrow (an IMF "backup fund"). Unless the IMF has additional resources it will be unable to meet new requirements to support adjustment measures. High-debt countries unable to obtain IMF support will suffer a further sharp reduction in growth. New commercial bank lending will decline. Political stability will suffer a serious blow as will American trade.

In a very real sense, in addition to being important to avoid unrest in this hemisphere, this is a "jobs bill"—which will improve export prospects for U.S. industries still suffering from high unemployment. An increase in IMF Special Drawing Rights to bolster depleted foreign exchange reserves would also add a margin for growth and trade. And, toward these same ends, industrialized countries should agree to facilitate IMF borrowing in their markets in the event that becomes necessary to augment its liquidity.

Additional development assistance through the World Bank—and more co-financing between it and commercial banks—is needed to help high-debt countries to strengthen the productive sectors of their economies, reorient production away from import substitution, and improve opportunities for private investment. World Bank funds are also critically needed to address social and human needs.

The World Bank also should be permitted to accelerate lending for spare parts, industrial supplies and new equipment to overcome stagnation in key sectors. And it should be encouraged to develop new arrangements—perhaps even a new facility—that permits it to guarantee a portion of new commercial bank loans to supplement World Bank lending. Finally, and of greatest importance to the poorest nations, it is vital that there be a large replenishment of the International Development Association, the World Bank's soft loan window. These funds are vital to the low-income peoples of Africa and South Asia, and also free up somewhat higher cost funds for the Western Hemisphere.

While Congress and the administration must clearly make budgetary trade-offs, and the choices are particularly hard in light of pressures to cut the budget deficit—which in my judgment is the key to sustained U.S. and world recovery—it would be wrong to believe that funds could be withheld from the IMF or World Bank without a major cost to the United States. The same country that spends so much to counter threats to stability in Central America, Africa and the Middle East must see the lack of wisdom in failure to provide the relatively small sums needed to avoid the conditions that breed instability in this hemisphere and elsewhere in the world. And, if we are serious about recovery in the United States and reducing unemployment, then we surely cannot fail to support programs to resolve the debt problem, for to do so would jeopardize markets in developing countries that take a larger percentage of our exports than Europe and Japan combined.●

RATE OF POPULATION GROWTH STILL RISING

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a recent article which appeared in the Baltimore Sun concerning the problems of global overpopulation. This is a problem which we all have been alerted to through study after study. Recently, the Census Bureau announced that last year, the world experienced its largest 12-month period of population growth in recorded history.

Runaway population growth is a problem we can no longer afford to ignore. As we have witnessed in so many countries, overcrowding and the resulting competition for resources can result in poor maternal and child health, increased hunger, economic decline, overuse and destruction of natural resources, reduced purchasing power of foreign countries for American goods, political unrest and increased migration to the United States.

I firmly believe that the path to reducing the internal strife many countries are currently experiencing and the resulting international repercussions, begins with reducing their economic hardships and impoverished living conditions. Without a conscious focus on curbing the high rate of population growth, this goal cannot be obtained.

The following article was written by Werner Fornos, president of the Population Institute and the Population Action Council, the largest private grassroots organization dedicated to increasing public awareness of the world's constantly growing population and maintaining the balance of population with the Earth's resources.

[From the Baltimore Sun, Sept. 8, 1983]

TOO MANY PEOPLE

(By Werner Fornos)

WASHINGTON.—The Census Bureau released figures last week showing that through mid-June the world experienced its largest 12-month period of population growth in history—an increase of 82 million.

Even more disturbing is the insidious adjunct: of the 24 most populous countries, a dozen are projected, by the authoritative Population Reference Bureau, to double their population within 35 years.

The list included Bangladesh, Pakistan, Nigeria, Egypt, Iran and Vietnam—each expected to have twice its current number of people within 25 years or less—as well as India, Brazil, Mexico, the Philippines, Turkey and Burma. The combined population of these 12 countries is more than 1.4 billion. If the projections hold up, within 35 years their cumulative population will be nearly 3 billion—a size equal to all the people in the world in 1960.

Most of these countries already have severe problems in feeding, educating and employing their present populations. The prospect of providing even basic services to double the number of people they are presently struggling to accommodate, within the next 25 to 35 years, is a Malthusian nightmare. While there may be academic arguments as to whether or not overpopulation is the root cause of abject poverty and human misery, there can be no question that rampant population growth exacerbates these conditions.

Virtually all of these 12 countries, recognizing that their demographic growth vastly reduces, or totally eliminates, their development gains, have instituted policies and programs aimed at stabilizing the populations. But the poorer countries simply cannot succeed in this formidable task unless there is substantial assistance from external sources.

The World Fertility Survey provides convincing evidence that such assistance is wanted as well as needed by as many as 400 million couples in the developing world. Demographers have projected that if 50 percent of these couples can be provided with family planning information, education and services by 1990, world population will stabilize eventually at 8 billion rather than at 10 billion or more.

The United States has been the leader in providing population assistance and family planning services to the developing world over the past 20 years and currently budgets $211 million for this purpose. When Congress reconvenes next month, it will consider the annual foreign aid bill containing the funding for international population assistance. That figure must be substantially increased if the aspirations for a better quality of life for millions of people in the developing world—where 92 percent of the world's population growth is anticipated to occur between now and the end of the century—are to be realized.●

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I am honored today to pay tribute to one of Maryland's greatest public servants, Louis L. Goldstein.

This man has been serving Maryland with an outstanding commitment to excellence and a sincere dedication to people for 45 years. He embodies the very best that Maryland has to offer, from his warm personality to his keen mind to his incomparable native accent.

For the past 25 years, he has combined sound financial management with sensitivity to human needs in his role as State comptroller. Before that, he served for 16 years in Maryland's Legislature, including 4 years as senate majority leader and 4 years as president of the senate. He interrupted his legislative career to enlist in the Marine Corps in World War II, risking his life in the service of his country.

I could bore my colleagues with praise of Louis Goldstein's countless professional contributions. Most men would not have had time for anything else. However, Louis Goldstein has made numerous contributions to the community outside of his political career. He is a charter member of his county's Lions Club and volunteer fire department. He is an active member and board member of charitable, educational, conservationist, and veterans organizations.

Most remarkably of all, Louis Goldstein has maintained the same standard of excellence in all of his activities. This has been recognized by groups of all kinds from all corners of the State: business groups as well as labor; charitable as well as professional; educational, conservationist, veteran, and cultural groups alike.

Of course, anyone could say these things just by reading his biography. Louis' most impressive qualities can only be experienced in person. Wherever I go in my district, and I go to everything, Louis Goldstein is also there, with the same twinkle in his eye, the same sparkle in his smile, and the same fire in his heart, never fatigued and withheld from no one.●

U.S. LATIN POLICY

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, an interesting commentary in the New York Times September 1 by Mort Zuckerman presents a thoughtful analysis of U.S. policy in Central America. It describes the interrelationship of the U.S. approach toward seeking economic and social change, democratic reform, regional negotiations, and military security. The commentary gives an objective appraisal of the role of U.S. military support in the region, and I hope my colleagues will review carefully Mr. Zuckerman's comments.

ON U.S. LATIN POLICY

(By Mortimer B. Zuckerman)

Because of enormous public confusion over the United States' involvement in Central America, I recently visited the region with a delegation of Congressmen to see it first-hand. I went holding political views of El Salvador and Nicaragua shared by many liberals and centrists in our nation. I returned impressed with the effectiveness of United States policy and convinced that we need to be involved.

I had thought that in El Salvador we were engaged in wrong-headed and dangerous military action on behalf of a repressive Government, and that Washington had failed to address economic and political grievances built up after decades of injustice. I went with the impression that the guerrillas seemed to have won popular support for their efforts to revolutionize the political system. My instinct was that this was only an internal struggle, not an East-West competition, and that once again we were backing the wrong side for the wrong reason.

But I returned home with the sense that United States military support was critical for physical security in the countryside, which, in turn, is necessary to guarantee ordinary Salvadorans' ability to make free choices. I also concluded that our military support is essential if we are to persuade the Salvadoran Government to democratize the political process and implement a program of agrarian reform and economic development. The guerrillas seem to have no larger a popular base than the Government does: Both sides command support with guns.

In Nicaragua, the Sandinista revolution carried the hope for a better and freer life after the feudal tyranny of the United States-supported Somoza regime. Yet what I found was a Government busily consolidating a left-wing totalitarian state internally, and aggressively involved in attempting to overthrow its neighbors. It is the pressure of the United States-backed threat of a military confrontation that has produced the Sandinistas' first clear willingness to negotiate a genuine agreement not to destabilize their neighbors.

In El Salvador, the masses have not been angered to the point of large-scale popular uprisings like those in Nicaragua or Cuba. No popular revolt accompanied the guerrillas' "final" offensive in 1980-81, and last year's election showed that at least two-thirds of the people objected to being "liberated" by the revolutionary left. The guerrillas do not appear to have widespread popular support. In this situation, a military solution to control an insurgency is feasible.

To this end, the United States is training and equipping the Salvadoran Army for infantry and small-unit tactics and keeping the soldiers in the field to engage, harass and exhaust the guerrillas. We will have trained about 50 percent of the officers and noncommissioned officers by the end of 1983 in an effort to substitute effective combat leaders for those appointed for political loyalty. As a result, the Army has improved its morale and field performance and engaged in its most sustained and aggressive campaign. It has captured the momentum, and substantial military control in much of the eastern provinces, particularly in San Vicente and Usulután. The rebels have withdrawn to remote areas, have not counter-attacked, have limited themselves to hit-and-run attacks and appear to have increasing logistical and manpower problems.

In San Vicente, the Government has coordinated its military presence with programs in health, education, agriculture, transportation and reconstruction to retain the area's loyalty after the army leaves. This is a phase in an overall National Plan for Reconstruction. The cost of this program has been minimal by United States standards: only $65 million in military aid and $230 million in economic aid. Even the guerrilla political leader Ruben Zamora acknowledged to us that if this aid continues, the rebels can no longer hope to win the war.

The aid program also serves as leverage against the right-wing military. Only the United States can influence it to move away from a feudal political heritage of violence and vigilantism.

The left feeds off the rigidity of the right and military oppression and develops popular support by promising to redistribute the wealth. It also benefits when rightist oligarchies buckle under economic pressures. The best way to diminish popular support for a violent Communist revolution is to open up the political channels and institute agrarian and economic reform. This can take place only when there is no widespread military insurgency.

Our pressure brought about last year's Salvadoran election and this year's negotiations for drafting a new constitution leading to presidential elections in 1984. Elections may be only "one note in the song of democracy," as a Salvadoran clergyman put it, but they represent legitimization of potential civilian control over military and paramilitary forces. Both have perpetrated atrocities that, if allowed to continue will turn the masses implacably hostile. Our pressure is thus necessary on two counts: to prevent an extremist left-wing takeover while pushing the Government toward rights and democracy.

However, no amount of change will end the Salvadoran conflict if Nicaragua, which regionalized the conflict in Central America, continues to fuel it. When they took over, the Sandinistas feared and hated the United States because of its patronage of Anastasio Somoza Debayle and military invasions over the past 130 years. The Sandinista hymn is "We fight against the Yanqui, enemy of humanity." President Jimmy Carter attempted to offset this by extending economic aid and friendship, but the Sandinistas remained convinced that the revolution would be safe from our intervention only if governments similar to their own were installed elsewhere in Central America. The Sandinistas set out to implement their slogan "revolution without boundaries."

In 1980, the Sandinistas, with Cuban advisers, brought the five main guerrilla factions from El Salvador together in Managua, worked out a unity pact, set up joint command and control structures, organized training and logistical support on Nicaraguan soil and provided initial arms supplies. A Salvadoran rebel leader, Mario Aguinada, told us that support for training, logistics and command continues.

In Costa Rica, we were told that the Sandinistas are engaged there in a major propaganda campaign and are encouraging unrest, including infiltration in the northern provinces. The attempt to destabilize Costa Rica, a democracy without an army since 1948, is the clearest indication of Sandinista intentions.

Inside Nicaragua, the Sandinistas began and continued a program of totalitarian consolidation of power. The elements of the broader anti-Somoza coalition were discarded one by one—the Roman Catholic Church, other political parties, the press. The only Jewish community center and synagogue were seized and burned. The Sandinistas built the largest military force in Central America. A Cuban-style pattern, with a widespread Cuban presence, has emerged.

To contain an interventionist Nicaragua, Washington sought—unsuccessfully—negotiations four times to bring about noninterference in neighboring territory and limits on Nicaragua's military buildup and the institutionalization of democratic opposition to create internal brakes on aggression. Rebuffed diplomatically, the United States moved militarily, ordering exercises, including fleet deployment. The Central Intelligence Agency expanded its support of the "contras"—the anti-Government guerrillas that harass the countryside. We continue to train and equip the Honduran Army, which Nicaragua considers its most dangerous regional military adversary. A border shootout in May with Nicaragua brought about full mobilization of the Honduran Army, signaling its participation in any military crisis in the region.

The cumulative military pressure organized by the Reagan Administration has resulted in a major shift in Sandinista policy. In our meetings with the Sandinista leadership, we were told that Nicaragua was prepared to negotiate verifiable nonintervention in neighboring territories, especially El Salvador. This change appeared to be due exclusively to the perception that the United States had been provoked to the point that a military confrontation was possible.

The United States has long supported repressive rightist regimes, sometimes by using our troops. We must develop, an alternative to such regimes—and those of the left—by opening up Latin American political and economic proceses. Our interests are involved because what happens in Nicaragua and El Salvador can affect Mexico or the Panama Canal. Central America is on our strategic doorstep. We cannot remain above the fray.

IMF ESSENTIAL TO USA ECONOMIC WELL-BEING

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I know that some of my colleagues remain unconvinced of the necessity for strengthening the International Monetary Fund. I would recommend that they read a speech made recently to the Economic Club of New York by Anthony M. Solomon, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

Mr. Solomon, a former Under Secretary of the Treasury, emphasized that a stronger IMF is essential to the economic well-being of the United States and to the survival of stable world trading system.

Frankly, he said,

I find it baffling that there are elements in this country, and especially in our Congress, who can ignore the catastrophic effects that would result from not acting now to make resources available to the IMF quickly . . . It would injure the world trading system and seriously impair the prospects for economic growth, not only in the debtor countries but here and everywhere else.

Mr. Solomon noted that U.S. exports to the developing countries with the most serious debt problems dropped by more than $10 billion last year, costing us nearly 300,000 jobs and $1 billion in profits. "How can it be rational," he asked, "for this country to risk giant price tags like these in the future (by opposing the IMF quota increase)?"

In his speech, Mr. Solomon sought to look beyond the immediate debt crisis and to suggest longer term measures that will be needed to strengthen the developing countries' borrowing and debt management practices. He believes the IMF must assume a broader role as monitor of and advisor to these countries.

But Mr. Solomon emphasized that the most urgent need is for quick action by Congress approving our part of the IMF quota increase. "Some look at the issue entirely in narrow financial terms and conclude that the IMF can squeak by without the quota increase for the time being," he said. "That view is wrong, and it misses the central point. In the absence of clear, unequivocal support for the institution by the United States Government, including the Congress, the Fund will be permanently crippled."

Mr. Speaker, if there is no objection, I would like to have Mr. Solomon's entire speech printed in the RECORD. I commend it to anyone who wants a clear statement of the issues at stake in the IMF debate.

REMARKS BEFORE THE ECONOMIC CLUB OF NEW YORK

(By Anthony M. Solomon)

I feel certain that a great many of you here tonight—and, in fact, thoughtful people throughout the business and financial community—have been following the twists and turns of the LDC debt problem extremely close over the past year or so. The press and other media have provided extensive coverage. And there have been several excellent analyses of how the debt problems came about, both in general and for individual countries. Overall, I conclude that public understanding of the current situation is unusually good, given the enormous complexity of the issues at stake.

What I think is less familiar, and worthy of more attention, is the discussion of what the world will be like after the current emergency is behind us. We all want to feel confident that, when something closer to normal circumstances is restored, we will have built a stronger, more resilient international financial system. No one wants a recurrence of debt disturbances like those of the past year. No one wants prolonged stagnation or inadequate growth in the developing countries of Latin America and elsewhere. That would worsen our own growth prospects and inhibit world trade. And prolonged stagnation—as distinct from the temporary setbacks associated with emergency adjustment programs—would raise a greater danger of serious social and political consequences in a number of the LDCs.

Before discussing the post-emergency period, I must make clear that I'm not complacent about the immediate task of completing the necessary debt restructurings and carrying through basic economic adjustments. We have to make sure we sustain the kind of concerted effort by all the principal participants which has yielded the tentative progress that's been made so far. The borrowing countries, the commercial banks, the governments in the industrial countries, and the International Monetary Fund have all had to make tough decisions and hard compromises. In particular, I think we should respect the painful measures that have already been taken and the sacrifices that have been endured by Mexico and some other countries. Under IMF guidance, these countries have, by any reasonable standard, made impressive efforts to adjust. But more hard work and political will must be marshalled, and more new financing will be required, before anyone can afford to relax.

Obviously, this concerted effort must go forward and must succeed. But make no mistake about it. That can't happen unless the IMF can continue to play the pivotal role it has in binding together the different parts of this effort. And the Fund will be unable to play that role if it's starved of adequate financial resources and political support.

Frankly, I find it baffling that there are elements in this country, and especially in our Congress, who can ignore the catastrophic effects that would result from not acting now to make resources available to the IMF quickly. Without the IMF at the pivot, the whole debt restructuring effort would be undermined, and needed new credits would be blocked. Outright defaults could actually happen. In the longer run, the consequences could also be grave. Debtor countries could be forced into disorderly adjustments that would almost certainly include more protectionist measures, credit controls, price distortions, and severe damage to local private sectors. it would injure the world trading system and seriously impair the prospects for economic growth, not only in the debtor countries but here and everywhere else.

The direct cost to the United States alone would be enormous. Until last year, our exports to LDCs that now have debt servicing problems had been averaging $50 billion a year—almost a quarter of our total exports. Already last year, exports to these countries fell by over $10 billion (more than 20 percent), costing us nearly 300 thousand jobs and $1 billion in profits. How can it be rational for this country to risk giant price tags like these in the future and oppose the quota increase?

I know that there are those who don't see it this way. Some look at the issue entirely in narrow financial terms and conclude that the IMF can squeak by without the quota increase for the time being. That view is wrong, and it misses the central point. In the absence of clear, unequivocal support for the institution by the United States government, including the Congress, the Fund will be permanently crippled.

What's even more baffling is that, among those who would cripple the Fund, there are people who claim to be strong advocates of free markets. What they entirely fail to see is that the IMF, in its efforts to get countries to pursue market-oriented policies and to minimize the hodge-podge of distortions that undermine economic performance, is the best friend that market-oriented people have in the kind of world we live in.

My strong sense is that the misguided opposition to the IMF quota legislation, and the mischievous amendments that undercut it, will not prevail. I believe that ultimately the Congress will support the IMF and act positively to meet the international responsibilities of the United States. It is both in our own immediate and longer term interest.

Suppose that we all do what we need to do in the short term. Then it's worth raising the question of what kind of economic prospects the LDCs, especially in Latin America where the debt burden is greatest, can look forward to in a couple of years when the immediate emergency is behind, but not forgotten. Can they return to rates of economic growth that are reasonably satisfactory and broadly meet their aspirations for achieving social and political progress? I don't want to put specific numbers on this, because growth potential differs from one country to the next. But I am talking about growth rates that would not be too far below the historical experience of most of the countries before the debt problems materialized.

It seems to me that it is certainly not impossible to get that outcome. But we have to face reality. There are going to be continuing constraints that will limit the scope for expansionary policies for some time to come. We can identify ways of easing some of these constraints and softening their impact. And we can be heartened by more optimistic developments lately in the industrial economies, where the prospects for higher growth seem to be improving. But there still must be an extended period in which the heavily indebted LDC governments are going to have very little margin for error.

The most obvious constraint will be with respect to external financing. Conventional commercial bank lending will be much harder to come by. In the first instance, that would limit countries' ability to import. And lower imports, particularly of capital goods, will hamper growth.

The natural question is whether that shortfall can be replaced by greater official assistance from industrial country governments. In my view, that is not likely. While government officials have the will and resources to provide temporary support in a crisis, there really isn't much chance of legislatures going along with increases in long-term official funding in amounts large enough to significantly offset lower commercial bank lending. After all, it was partly because of the difficulty of obtaining official financing that borrowing from banks grew so much in the first place.

Another question is whether the central banks of industrial countries—in particular, the Federal Reserve—should provide large-scale infusions of liquidity so as to ease credit availability for LDCs. Certainly, in a crisis, central banks have a traditional responsibility, as lenders of last resort, to insure stability. But any assistance of that sort must be strictly temporary. Central banks simply cannot be viewed as a source of medium and longer term financing.

So what's left? By process of elimination there are really only two alternatives: Either funds will have to find their way into LDCs through channels other than commercial banks, or borrowing countries will have to run their economies in ways that make them less dependent on external financing. In fact, the LDCs will have to move on both fronts at the same time if they hope to be able to achieve the satisfactory growth rates we are talking about.

Traditionally, direct investment has been an alternative to bank financing. In calmer times, greater direct investment inflows should be an effective source of capital. To be sure, we know that the internal political opposition to direct investment has been strident from time to time in the past and certainly could resurface as soon as the debt emergency starts to fade. Yet, it seems to me that this manifestation of economic nationalism must be challenged and overcome if the LDCs are going to be serious about economic development in a period when new borrowing from commercial banks is constrained.

Improving financial management offers another important way for borrowing countries to cope with the constraints they are going to face. This should especially include efforts to diversify the currency composition of a country's debt. By choice or by necessity, too much of the debt of many LDCs was in dollars. That left them vulnerable to a period of high dollar exchange rates and high dollar interest rates. We calculate that if from 1979 to 1982 developing countries had borrowed currencies in a diversified way—that is, in proportion to their import shares—the LDCs as a group would today be over $30 billion better off. I am not saying that kind of benefit can be repeated in any particular time period in the future. But the clear lesson is that a more balanced and skillfully drawn portfolio of debt is important. Of course, that requires not only a willingness of borrowers to diversify, but equally a willingness of market participants to modify their operations and of the authorities in other industrial countries to allow it.

In addition, both borrowers and lenders have an interest in taking some potentially valuable financial instruments off the drawing board and getting them to market. To take one example, perhaps commercial banks could shift at the margin toward originating loans and then selling them off into a secondary market, where price fluctuations could give useful, early disciplinary signals to borrowers. Or, to take another example, I can visualize variable maturity obligations that offer a constant debt service flow in the face of any unexpected jump in interest rates, a kind of built-in rescheduling. There may also be a place in the market for securities with the equity-like features, on which some part of the total yield to the investor could be calibrated, for instance, to the borrowing country's real GNP or export earnings growth, or some similar measure of economic performance.

Finally, there are a number of tools and techniques that are used by corporate borrowers here but are not yet being used by borrowers in developing countries. Just to give two illustrations, these instruments range from futures contracts to hedge against commodity fluctuations to interest rate swaps that can add another way of gaining fixed rate funding. In a period of restricted access to credit, it is worthwhile developing the expertise and sophistication to take advantage of the array of novel financing tools that are now available.

Innovations like those in the private capital markets would be helpful in ameliorating the financing problem. But I wouldn't want to overstate the role that these mechanisms can play. It will not eliminate the need for major changes and reforms in general economic policies so that dependence on external financing is lastingly reduced.

The way I see it there are three broad areas where policy reform in borrowing countries is called for to reduce dependence on external financing and promote domestic savings. After all, on average, gross domestic savings finance 90 percent of LDC investment.

The first is in the balance of payments area. It seems to me that heavily indebted developing countries have to be resolute in keeping their exports competitive in world markets. First and foremost, this means following realistic exchange rate policies and not letting the domestic currency get out of line. It also means realistic interest rates to deter damaging flight of domestic capital.

The second broad area is reform of government budgeting. To begin with, though it's getting harder for an American to preach to others on the subject, excessively large structural deficits have to be reduced. In addition, LDC governments must have tighter oversight of spending agencies, closer financial monitoring of projects, better and more timely budget numbers, and improved regulatory capabilities over their own financial institutions.

The third broad area is reform of the domestic price system. Every subsidy, every credit allocation scheme, every price distortion has to be tested against the standard of what it costs, both in budgetary terms and in terms of economic efficiency. These are long-standing problems that existed well before the debt crisis. And fixing any of them inevitably pits a government against powerful vested interests at home. But in the aftermath of the debt problem, there may be no alternative to meeting the task head on, because of the huge toll distortions take in limiting productivity and growth.

The governments in the industrial countries and th IMF both have to support LDC efforts to bring about market-oriented reforms and better financial management.

The industrial countries obviously have a major role to play in sustaining growth, in lowering global interest rates by reducing their own government deficits, and in keeping markets open for LDC goods. At the same time they have to open up their financial markets further so that the LDCs can diversify their sources of credit more effectively. They must help create a healthy world environment within which the LDC efforts can pay off.

As for the IMF, its role in managing crises is well recognized and indispensable. But treatment and cure are not enough; it must work harder and more effectively at prevention. What I see as close to being essential is that its surveillance role under more normal circumstances be enhanced. This has two dimensions:

First, the IMF should be assisting countries in improving their financial management. It can help them monitor their debts. It can work with countries to develop financial strategies covering the currency and maturity mix of borrowing as well as the degree of reliance on bank debt, bond finance, direct investment, and so on.

Second, appropriate IMF surveillance should extend well beyond matters of finance. The Fund is not just a lender. It is a force for promoting sensible policies. I believe it should put its weight behind governments which are committed to a transition toward more efficient domestic price, interest rate, and exchange rate policies. And it must reject the argument that the IMF should focus only on a balance of payments target, regardless of how it's achieved.

These broader efforts by the Fund should be an integral part of its regular consultations with all members. We don't want to go back to a situation where the IMF becomes deeply involved only after serious payments disruptions have occurred. That's too late.

Instead, a more continuous relationship would have some important advantages. It would improve the Fund's detailed knowledge of the constraints that regularly confront policymakers in each individual country. And it would provide a type of involvement by the Fund that might head off some of the resentment and occasional hostility that can occur when the IMF is seen as an outsider always prescribing austerity at a time of trouble.

To encourage movement in this general direction, I would go even one step further. It would be worthwhile considering whether access to funding could be made more readily available by the IMF to countries that voluntarily participate in these financial and economic policy reviews should they have a balance of payments need later on.

In summary, we must plan for a world of tighter financial constraints and less margin for error. The approach I am recommending boils down to a combination of stronger market institutions and better market instruments developing alongside better economic policies and stronger financial controls. In my approach, there is no quick fix. There is no single scheme or gimmick that will put things right and allow everybody to go back to business as usual. To the contrary, I feel that those debt reshuffling schemes that you hear about, which look to industrial country governments to pick up existing exposure from the banking system, are fanciful. They would be unjustifiably costly to the taxpayers. And in fact, they would give just the wrong signals, convincing people at home that a government bailout will always be there and whipping up pressures abroad in developing countries to ask for bailouts.

What I am recommending is rooted instead in pragmatism. It basically seeks to build a more resilient system on the best features of what we have now.

And what we have now pivots on the IMF. That is the institution which in practical terms binds the system together and which must play a more comprehensive role in the future. Therefore, the first step toward that kind of system is for the Congress to act quickly and positively on the IMF quota legislation and put to rest doubts about the commitment of the United States to a common sense, multilateral approach to dealing with the world's financial problems.●

NATIONAL FROZEN FOOD DAY

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, in March 1984, the frozen food industry in the United States celebrated its 54th year of helping bring the abundance of American agriculture to the tables of America's consumers. This industry is a native American product, developed in the United States over the years. The farmers who supply the raw products to this industry have been honored often for their important part in feeding both the American population and the world's population. However, we have never honored those in the frozen food industry who help our farmers bring their produce from farm to table.

Today I am introducing a resolution to honor the role of the frozen food industry by declaring that March 6, 1984, be declared "Frozen Food Day." The thousands of frozen food processors, wholesalers, brokers, shippers, and consumers of the industry well deserve the recognition proposed in this resolution. In the State of California alone, there are over 1,000 frozen food processors, 500 frozen food brokers, over 750 wholesale distributors, 100 shippers, and thousands of retailers who are all an important part of the frozen food industry.

March 6, 1984, is being selected because it is the birthday of the frozen food industry. This is the day in 1930 when frozen foods were introduced to the American public. The first offering of frozen foods consisted of 18 meat items, 2 vegetables, and 3 seafood items, and were packaged in cellophane.

These items were not immediately accepted by retailers or consumers. Retail stores had no freezers to store the products and consumers had only the ice cube compartments of their iceboxes for storage. The result was that, in the early years, principal users of frozen foods were large institutional outlets which had the necessary storage facilities.

The pioneers of the frozen food industry quickly realized that for consumers to accept their products, retail grocers had to be persuaded to carry them. So, since the grocers would not buy freezers to store and dispense these new products, the frozen food manufacturers rented cabinets to retailers having faith that consumers would like their frozen products and the retailers would then make the commitment to the storage equipment necessary to bring the foods to consumers at the peak of freshness.

In getting their products into retail outlets, the fledgling frozen food industry had another problem—once their products are in the supermarkets, how could they persuade shoppers to buy more than an immediate supply? There were no homefreezers yet. In 1938, the Deep Freeze Division of Motor Products Corp., began marketing a homefreezer, a simple round container with a cover and a compressor.

At the end of 1938 the total volume of frozen foods produced for the year was 265 million pounds at a value of $68 million. Almost half the tonnage was in fruit.

World War II marked a most-dramatic growth period for the new American frozen food industry. Due to the war, there was a need for canned goods to be shipped to our troops overseas. As a result, there were fewer canned products available. Food rationing recognized this shortage and provided that consumers could obtain frozen foods with fewer ration points than canned foods. Thus, the war effort needs of troops helped to expand the domestic frozen food market. Fewer ration points for frozens meant that more people than ever before tried frozen foods—and they liked what they tasted. As the acceptability of frozen foods became greater, there was an increase in the demand for homefreezers. Department stores began to carry freezers and they were sold door to door as well. One newspaper ad at the time showed one company's homefreezer at $259.

With the end of the war, the American frozen food industry had begun to achieve consumer acceptance and retailer acceptance. Volume increased to where many formerly skeptical companies began to offer frozens as part of their regular product line.

The first complete frozen dinner was offered to consumers shortly after the war. At about the same time, the first self-serve frozen food storage cabinet appeared in retail stores. Always in the past, customers had selected frozen food items from a display case and a store clerk and filled their order from a covered cabinet. During the same period, the moisture-proof pouch was introduced and a whole range of new frozen products including fruit pies, nondairy whipped toppings, french fries and shrimp. Baked goods, frozen dinners, and fruits and vegetables also experienced far wider consumer acceptance.

We think of frozen concentrated citrus juices, orange juice in particular, as always being a part of the frozen food product line. But, the first frozen orange juice concentrate was not available to consumers until late 1949. In 1950, about 25 percent of the Florida orange crop was processed into frozen concentrate to bring to an increasing number of consumers the taste of fresh orange juice.

It was in the late 1940's that the production techniques, handling and shipping equipment began to really bring down the unit cost of frozen products. Fried chicken, bread dough, fish sticks, lemonade, ethnic specialties, lobster, and chicken were but a few of the new frozen products introduced during the period.

Some consumers viewed frozens as inconvenient because of the 30 to 45 minute defrosting time. However, in 1959 we saw the introduction of the first radarrange. The price of the first ranges were about $2,500. The widespread acceptance and use of the product has increased production and reduced prices. In 1961, the volume of frozen foods sold was $3.6 billion compared to $68 million just 21 years earlier.

During the 1960's the growth of our American frozen food industry continued with the introduction of frozen pizza and bagels as well as an ever increasing variety of items. By 1968, 1 out of 3 American homes had a full-sized freezer and the industry continued its upward mobility when Apollo 12 and Skylab crew members took along frozen foods as they orbited the Earth. The growth of the industry has continued unabated bringing to the American people an increasing variety of products all keyed to meet the needs of our changing lifestyles. There are more products packaged for one- and two-person servings. Packaging, production, warehousing, and distribution techniques and equipment have all been improved. Frozen foods today have become an important part of the American way of life.

The frozen food industry is to be congratulated for its contribution to our nutritional health and well-being. Mr. Speaker, I urge all my colleagues to join with me in supporting and cosponsoring the resolution I have introduced today. Let us join together and say thank you and happy birthday to our own frozen food industry.

The text of the resolution follows:

H.J. RES.—

Whereas the United States of America is blessed with an impressive array of agricultural products which make our Nation and its food production and distribution system the envy of the world;

Whereas throughout history one of the primary goals of human effort has been the production of food;

Whereas the farm to city migration created a great demand for food supplies in dense population centers in which such supplies could not be grown;

Whereas the international frozen food industry started in the United States with vegetables, fruit, meat, and fish being first packaged and offered to consumers in 1930;

Whereas between 1935 and 1940 frozen foods were provided to the public on a large scale, and during World War II ration point values posted in stores and carried in newspapers focused public attention on frozen foods;

Whereas frozen food became a meaningful part of the Space Age when Apollo XII astronauts took frozen meals with them and 72 frozen food items were stored on Skylab for a 500 day supply of meals for the crew;

Whereas throughout its history the American frozen food industry has worked closely with producers and has continued research and development for the purpose of seeking better ways to bring the nutrition, quality, and taste of American agricultural products to the American consumer; and

Whereas in March 1984 the frozen food industry in the United States will celebrate its 54th year of service to the American people and the people of the world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in recognition of the significant contribution which the frozen food industry in the United States has made and continues to make to the nutritional well-being of the American people by enabling them to share in the agricultural abundance of our Nation, March 6, 1984, is hereby designated as "Frozen Food Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

THE NORTH CAROLINA WILDERNESS ACT OF 1983

HON. JAMES McCLURE CLARKE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, September 22, 1983, I introduced on behalf of myself and all of my colleagues in the North Carolina House delegation H.R. 3960, the North Carolina Wilderness Act of 1983, which designates approximately 65,000 acres of national forest lands in North Carolina as additional wilderness and releases 114,000 acres for multiple use. Approximately 26,000 acres of the North Carolina national forests will become congressionally designated wilderness study areas if this legislation is adopted.

I believe that this measure is one of the most significant pieces of legislation for the people of North Carolina introduced this session. The timber industry, the conservation groups, and the U.S. Forest Service have all worked together on this effort. If enacted, the North Carolina Wilderness Act will preserve our State's public lands for the present and future enjoyment of our people.

While this legislation adds significantly to North Carolina's wilderness system, it also releases 114,000 acres for multiple use which provides for timber-cutting under Forest Service supervision.

The areas to be included as wilderness are, in the Croatan National Forest: Catfish Lake South, Pocosin, Pond Pine, and Sheep Ridge. In the Uwharrie National Forest the wilderness area is Birkhead Mountains. Wilderness designations in the Pisgah National Forest are: Linville Gorge additions, Middle Prong, and Shining Rock addition. Also to be designated as wilderness in the Nantahala National Forest are: Ellicott Rock additions, Joyce Kilmer additions, and Southern Nantahala.

The legislation also includes as congressionally designated wilderness study areas: Craggy Mountain extension, Harper Creek, and Lost Cove in the Pisgah National Forest, and the Overflow and Snowbird areas in the Nantahala National Forest.

After years of study and discussion, interested parties, groups, organizations, businesses, and individuals have reached a compromise that is reflected in this legislation. It carries out the original recommendations of the U.S. Forest Service for wilderness designation in North Carolina.

Mr. Speaker, it is important that this bill be passed in order to avoid this unnecessary expense and time involved in a RARE III study. The Forest Service has already received instructions to begin another study and preliminary planning is now underway. Eliminating another study will save a lot of taxpayers' money and enable Forest Service personnel to use their time for more productive purposes.

The North Carolina Wilderness Act is vitally important to a lot of people. The timber industry needs this bill passed so that it can be assured of an adequate timber supply for the future. Without this bill the timber industry is threatened with legal action which could interfere with future timber sales on national forest land.

It is also very important to the U.S. Forest Service that this measure be approved. It will provide the Forest Service with clear and concise instructions on management of the national forests in North Carolina. It is also important for conservation and environmental groups, not only in North Carolina but also in the Nation, that certain lands be set aside permanently for preservation. All of these various groups and interests have worked together as a team to solve this problem. I am grateful this is a joint effort.

Mr. Speaker, I look forward to early approval in the House of H.R. 3960, the North Carolina Wilderness Act of 1983.

The text of the bill follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "North Carolina wilderness Act of 1983".

SEC. 2. (a) In furtherance of the purposes of the Wilderness Act (16 U.S.C. 1131-1136), the following lands are hereby designated as wilderness and, therefore, as components of the National Wilderness Preservation System:

(1) certain lands in the Uwharrie National Forest, North Carolina, which comprise approximately four thousand seven hundred and ninety acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Birkhead Mountains Wilderness—Proposed", dated July 1983, and which shall be known as the Birkhead Mountains Wilderness;

(2) certain land in the Croatan National Forest, North Carolina, which comprise approximately seven thousand six hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Catfish Lake South Wilderness—Proposed", dated July 1983, and which shall be known as the Catfish Lake South Wilderness;

(3) certain lands in the Nantahala National Forest, North Carolina, which comprise approximately three thousand six hundred and eighty acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Ellicott Rock Wilderness Addition—Proposed", dated July 1983, and which are hereby incorporated in, and shall be deemed to be part of, the Ellicott Rock Wilderness as designated by Public Law 93-622;

(4) certain lands in the Nantahala National Forest, North Carolina, which comprise approximately three thousand three hundred and eighty acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Joyce Kilmer Wilderness Additions—Proposed", dated July 1983, and which are hereby incorporated in, and shall be deemed to be part of, the Joyce Kilmer Wilderness as designated by Public Law 93-622;

(5) certain lands in the Pisgah National Forest, North Carolina, which comprise approximately three thousand four hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Linville Gorge Wilderness Additions—Proposed", dated July 1983, and which are hereby incorporated in, and shall be deemed to be part of, the Linville Gorge Wilderness as designated by Public Law 88-577;

(6) certain lands in the Pisgah National Forest, North Carolina, which comprise approximately seven thousand nine hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Middle Prong Wildernesss—Proposed", dated July 1983, and which shall be known as the Middle Prong Wilderness;

(7) certain lands in the Croatan National Forest, North Carolina, which comprise approximately eleven thousand acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Pocosin Wilderness—Proposed", dated July 1983, and which shall be known as the Pocosin Wilderness;

(8) certain lands in the Croatan National Forest, North Carolina, which comprise approximately one thousand eight hundred and sixty acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Pond Pine Wilderness—Proposed", dated July 1983, and which shall be known as the Pond Pine Wilderness;

(9) certain lands in the Croatan National Forest, North Carolina, which comprise approximately six thousand one hundred and thirty acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Sheep Ridge Wilderness—Proposed", dated July 1983, and which shall be known as the Sheep Ridge Wilderness;

(10) certain lands in the Pisgah National Forest, North Carolina, which comprise approximately five thousand one hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Shining Rock Wilderness Addition—Proposed", dated July 1983, and which are hereby incorporated in, and shall be deemed to be part of, the Shining Rock Wilderness as designated by Public Law 88-577; and

(11) certain lands in the Nantahala National Forest, North Carolina, which comprise approximately ten thousand nine hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Southern Nantahala Wilderness—Proposed", dated July 1983, and which shall be known as the Southern Nantahala Wilderness.

SEC. 3. Subject to valid existing rights, each wilderness area designated by this Act shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with the provisions of the Wilderness Act governing areas designated by that Act as wilderness except that any reference in such provisions to the effective date of the Wilderness Act shall be deemed to be a reference to the effective date of this Act.

SEC. 4. As soon as practicable after enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall file a map and a legal description of each wilderness area designated by this Act with the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Agriculture of the United States House of Representatives and with the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry and with the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate. Each such map and description shall have the same force and effect as if included in this Act except that the Secretary of Agriculture may make correction of clerical and typographical errors in each such legal description and map. Each such legal description and map shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the Chief of the Forest Service, Department of Agriculture.

SEC. 5. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the Department of Agriculture has completed the second Roadless Area Review and Evaluation program (RARE II); and

(2) the Congress has made its own review and examination of national forest system roadless areas in the State of North Carolina and of the environmental impacts associated with alternative allocations of such areas.

(b) On the basis of such review, the Congress hereby determines and directs that—

(1) without passing on the question of the legal and factual sufficiency of the RARE II final environmental statement (dated January 1979) with respect to national forest system lands in States other than North Carolina, such statement shall not be subject to judicial review with respect to national forest system lands in the State of North Carolina;

(2) with respect to the national forest system lands in the State of North Carolina which were reviewed by the Department of Agriculture in the second Roadless Area Review and Evaluation (RARE II), except those lands designated as wilderness or for wilderness study by this Act or by previous Acts of Congress, that review and evaluation shall be deemed for the purposes of the initial land management plans required for such lands by the Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act of 1974 as amended by the National Forest Management Act of 1976 to be an adequate consideration of the suitability of such lands for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System and the Department of Agriculture shall not be required to review the wilderness option prior to the revision of the initial plans and in no case prior to the date established by law for completion of the initial planning cycle;

(3) areas in the State of North Carolina reviewed in such final environmental statement and not designated as wilderness or for wilderness study by this Act or by previous Acts of Congress, need not be managed for the purpose of protecting their suitability for wilderness designation pending revision of the initial plans; and

(4) unless expressly authorized by Congress the Department of Agriculture shall not conduct any further statewide roadless area review and evaluation of national forest system lands in the State of North Carolina for the purpose of determining their suitability for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System.

SEC. 6. (a) In furtherance of the purposes of the Wilderness Act, the following lands shall be reviewed by the Secretary of Agriculture as to their suitability for preservation as wilderness—

(1) certain lands in the Pisgah National Forest which comprise approximately seven thousand one hundred and thirty-eight acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Harper Creek Wilderness Study Area", dated July 1983, and which shall be known as the Harper Creek Wilderness Study Area;

(2) certain lands in the Pisgah National Forest which comprise approximately five thousand seven hundred and eight acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Lost Cove Wilderness Study Area", dated July 1983, and which shall be known as the Lost Cove Wilderness Study Area;

(3) certain lands in the Nantahala National Forest which comprise approximately three thousand two hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Overflow Wilderness Study Area", dated July 1983, and which shall be known as the Overflow Wilderness Study Area;

(4) certain lands in the Nantahala National Forest which comprise approximately five thousand four hundred and ninety acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Snowbird Wilderness Study Area", dated July 1983, and which shall be known as the Snowbird Wilderness Study Area; and

(5) certain lands in the Pisgah National Forest which comprise approximately one thousand two hundred and eighty acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Craggy Mountain Wilderness Study Area Extension", dated July 1983, and which are hereby incorporated in the Craggy Mountain Wilderness Study Area as designated by Public Law 93-622.

The entire Craggy Mountain Wilderness Study Area, including the study area designated by Public Law 93-622 shall be administered in accordance with subsection (b) until the Congress determines otherwise. The Secretary shall submit a report and findings to the President regarding the review under this section, and the President shall submit his recommendations regarding the areas specified in paragraphs (1) through (5) to the Congress of the United States no later than three years after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) Subject to valid existing rights, the wilderness study areas designated by this section shall, until Congress determines otherwise, be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture so as to maintain their presently existing wilderness character and potential for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System.●

ADDRESS TO THE CENTRAL COALITION ON AGING

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, last week, I had the priviledge of convening a field hearing of the House Select Committee on Aging in Jefferson City and in Clinton. The topic of the hearing was "The Economic of Aging: A Need for Pre-Retirement Planning." It was most appropriate for this congressional committee to meet in Missouri because our State has one of the largest percentages of senior citizens in the United States. We rank fifth nationally. And in our particular area of Missouri, we find a population that is both elderly and low-income—28 percent of our population is elderly and a total of 70 percent of the population earns less than $4,860 per year according to the pre-1980 Missouri census statistics.

The purpose of the hearing was to learn how we as a nation can become better prepared for old age by planning for changes in our personal finances, housing, nutritional and medical needs, employment, and personal relationships. We were fortunate to hear from five experts on aging who are familiar with the hard facts and figures, and from eight Missouri senior citizens who told us about their own experiences with the expenses of growing older.

I felt the hearing was a great success. Through the thoughtful testimony of our witnesses, we were able to to get a comprehensive picture of the financial problems of those who are living on a fixed income, who are often limited in their physical capabilites, and who in many cases cannot count on help from an extended family.

It was the general conclusion that there has been an overall tendency to underestimate the financial resources necessary to maintain a given lifestyle during retirement years. Many older people have found their housing costs to be a greater percent of their gross income than the national average—which already stands at 38 percent.

Health care costs increase with age. Presently, a couple on social security with medicare deductions and supplemental tie-in insurance will pay about $100 per month. This cost will increase as long as health care costs continue to be the fastest growing component of the Consumer Price Index. They are also threatened by the administration's proposals to shift more of the costs of medicare to the elderly.

Adequate nutrition is a vital part of maintaining health, and food prices are expected to increase as a result of our poor harvests this year.

Transportation is essential for senior citizens, yet ownership and maintenance of an automobile have more than doubled in the last decade. Public transportation is often inconvenient or not available.

And heating their homes may be the most important expense for our seniors to budget for, but rising energy costs make this impossible for many. Soon, the same may be true of telephone rates.

Because of the uncertainty of being able to meet mandatory expenses, older Americans often forgo spending money on clothing, entertainment, and miscellaneous items that could improve their quality of life and mental attitude. Sadly, depression remains a major health risk for the elderly.

After defining the specifics of the economics of aging, what solutions were we able to find? There were several.

First. Education. We tend to think of ourselves as forever young. While it is desirable to maintain a youthful attitude, we must not allow future generations to forget that aging is a daily process that brings with it certain predictable changes in our physical capabilities, employment, family, housing, transportation, and medical needs. We must challenge our children to ask themselves not just "What am I going to do when I grow up?" but also, "How am I going to provide for myself when I grow older?" We should consider offering retirement planning courses in our schools and colleges and encourage the public media to promote this concept as well.

Second. Financial planning. Social security was designed to be one leg of three-legged stool of retirement income. Private pensions and savings or other accumulated assets comprise the other legs. Unfortunately, most people forget to plan for these. Today, 66 percent of senior citizens count on social security for their main source of income. Many employers offer financial planning assistance, but more often than not these programs are aimed at upper- and middle-class groups.

Unfortunately, this leaves a large number of the low-income and poverty levels without education and counseling help. It is these people who need the most help in money management. This is an area where already established public service agencies should pick up the slack. As Mr. Art Terrel, a witness of our hearing, stated:

> It is in reason to calculate that well designed and properly implemented retirement planning programs in pre-retirement can be less costly in prevention than the cure obtained through community charities and government agencies. This is to say nothing about loss of independence, self respect and dignity for those who find themselves needing help.

Third. Improved efficiency of our Nation's retirement income programs, A vast array of social programs, along with billions of dollars in tax credits and income transfers exist for the sole purpose of providing an adequate retirement income. Social security, supplemental security income, medicare, medicaid, the Employees Retirement Income Security Act, the Older Americans Act, the tax credit for the elderly, the tax treatment of pension contributions, individual retirement accounts, the Keogh plan, and the State homestead exemption laws constitute only some of the vehicles through which Federal and State efforts attempt to protect the income security of older Americans.

In all too many instances, however, these efforts work at cross-purposes with one another: Older workers are given incentives to remain on the job under one program, but they are penalized for working under another. Incentives for asset accumulation under tax laws are subverted by overly stringent resource tests in many income assistance programs. In short, many of the programs designed to foster economic independence among the elderly harshly penalize participants for thrift, productivity, responsible budgeting, and receiving assistance from other family members.

No. 4—We must remove obstacles to continued part-time employment past age 65. This will involve changes of attitude in the workplace just as much as changes in Government policy.

And, No. 5—We must encourage diversification of health care services. Public policy should support substitutes to costly hospitalization, including nursing home care, hospice, home care, and adult day care. Additionally, we should develop tax incentives for families which provide care for elderly parents at home.

Because Americans are growing older as a group, the problem of how to provide an adequate income for older Americans will become more difficult to solve with the passage of time. Today, there are about 26 million people over the age of 65 in the Nation; this figure is expected to double by the year 2030. In Missouri, the 65-and-over population grew 15.6 percent during the past decade, while the total population grew only 5.1 percent. Over the next 40 years, Missouri's 65-plus population is expected to increase by another 40 percent. we have no choice but to address the problems of the economics of aging and to approach them with creative solutions for preretirement planning.●

BILINGUAL EDUCATION: MYTHS AND FACTS

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, periodically, editorials are printed in major newspapers condemning bilingual education. Most often, as was the case with the recent New York Times editorial, they are fraught with errors, if not downright lies.

Raul Yzaguirre of the National Council of La Raza has brilliantly responded to the Times article outlining the facts which the Times chose to ignore. I recommend the letter to my colleagues.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF LA RAZA,
Washington, D.C., September 15, 1983.

Mr. MAX FRANKEL,
The New York Times,
New York, N.Y.

DEAR MR. FRANKEL: It was with much astonishment that I read the editorial "Si Quiere Promover English" on September 23, 1983. The editorial is so full of misinformation that it hardly fits into the New York Times tradition of being news that is "fit to print."

The editorial contains many serious factual errors about bilingual education, the current federal bilingual education legislation, the Administration's proposals to amend the Bilingual Act, and the Twentieth Century Fund's recommendations on bilingual education. At best, the editorial staff did not check the facts; at worst, the editorial is a deliberate public slander of bilingual education.

I do not understand why the Times has interpreted bilingual to mean monolingual. For clarification, bilingual programs are those in which two languages, one of which is English, are used for instructional purposes. The only programs funded by the federal government according to the current statute are those which are transitional and have English language components. The majority of these programs rely heavily on English; 64% of bilingual teachers report using English as a language of instruction for 75% or more of the time. English is being strongly promoted under the current legislation. The Reagan Administration's proposals would not help promote English as the Times alleges. Rather these proposals, which are budget cuts thinly cloaked in public policy, would deny desperately needed language services thousands of children. The overwhelming majority of children of limited English proficiency in this country receive absolutely no special instructional help—not bilingual education, not English as a Second Language, not anything. The Reagan proposals would simply add more children to those who receive no help—hardly a way to help children learn English.

It is ironic that while the Times editorial page is advocating that limited English proficient children receive monolingual English Instruction, its Education Section is busily singing the praises of Spanish/English bilingual programs for majority children. It seems that the Times feels that majority children should enjoy the academic and economic benefits of being bilingual, but language minority children should be content with monolingual education—a strategy that has failed Hispanic children for generations.

I am submitting the attached article for publication in the Times as a guest editorial or an opinion piece. The article lists the editorial's most serious errors, and provides factual information which any investigation should have uncovered. Not only does the Times owe its readers an apology for printing a piece of creative fiction in the guise of a carefully and intelligently prepared editorial, its editorial board also has the responsibility to set the record straight. Printing the attached article will help in this endeavor. The information should also help Times' editorial staff prepare a better informed analysis of federal bilingual education policy and the Reagan Administration's initiatives. I will look forward to seeing a retraction of this error-ridden editorial.

Sincerely,

RAUL YZAGUIRRE, President.

"SI QUIERE PROMOVER ENGLISH": A FACTUAL RESPONSE TO THE NEW YORK TIMES

The trouble with editorials on bilingual education is that they tend to more closely resemble creative fiction than carefully prepared, fact-based analyses. The New York Times unfortunately became a part of this tradition with the September 13, 1983 publication of "Si Quiere Promover English." As the title of the editorial suggests, the majority of children enrolled in bilingual education programs are Hispanic—the nation's most undereducated group of children. Bilingual education programs are strongly supported by the Hispanic community as a means of ensuring that Hispanic children become fully literate in English, and master other subjects taught in the schools.

Bilingual education programs are also supported by non-Hispanics; a recent Columbia University survey found that almost two-thirds of non-Hispanics surveyed favored bilingual education programs in the public schools. These people apparently understand something that Times editorial writers do not, namely that bilingual programs use two languages—one of which is English—and that they exist because monolingual programs have failed to educate generations of Hispanic children.

The Times editorial is so full of errors and misleading statements about bilingual education that it demands a factual response. Eleven of the most glaring misstatements are addressed below.

Times Statement: "The trouble with much 'bilingual' education is that it isn't bilingual. Too often it's a program to teach children math, social studies and science in their native language without any genuine effort to help them function in English as soon as possible."

Fact: Research does not support the notion that bilingual programs are actually monolingual in the native language. In fact, the reverse is often true. In most bilingual programs, the preponderance of instruction is in English. The most recent national study of services delivered to limited English proficient children, the 1978 Children's English and Services Study, found that many students in bilingual programs actually receive more hours of structured English instruction that do students in English-only programs. In fact, 64% of all bilingual teachers reported using English as a language of instruction at least 75% of the time.

Times Statement: "That moving children into English instruction is desirable should be beyond debate." (emphasis added)

Fact: This is a moot issue. In fact, it is beyond debate, and has been federal policy for quite some time. This provision is part of the federal Bilingual Education Act (Title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, as amended in 1978) and, according to the law, the only programs eligible to compete for funds are those in which: there is instruction given in, and study of, English, and to the extent necessary to allow a child to achieve competence in the English language, the native language of the children of limited English proficiency. (Sec. 703(a)(4)(A)(i) of Public Law 95-561)

Furthermore, the statute states that the "objective of the program shall be to assist children of limited English proficiency to improve their English language skills." (Sec. 703(a)(4)(B) There is nothing new here; everyone is in agreement that children be fully proficient in English and able to take full advantage of educational opportunities. The Times' implication that advocates of bilingual education disagree misleads the general public.

Times Statement: The "bill the Reagan Administration has submitted to Congress . . . would let local school systems decide how to best achieve the goal. But it would stop requiring that youngsters be taught in their native tongue."

Fact: The editorial writers seem to have confused Title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act—a competitive, categorial funding program—with the Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which requires districts to implement programs to meet the unique educational needs of language minority children. Title VII does not require school districts to do anything. The legislation simply defines what sorts of programs are to be implemented by districts that choose to apply for the funds. Not surprisingly, the Bilingual Education Act was created to fund bilingual education programs. Schools are not forced to apply for Title VII money; however, if they choose to compete for funds to implement a bilingual education program, they are expected to comply with the legislation and implement programs using both English and the child's native language. The exact use of each language is left up to the local school districts. This is no different from asking districts that apply for Headstart funds to implement Headstart programs. The Times badly misrepresented the Title VII legislation.

Times Statement: ". . . the proposed law would stop denying Federal aid to districts that choose to immerse them in mostly English studies."

Fact: "Federal aid" is not denied to districts for choosing to immerse students in mostly English studies." First of all, many types of federal aid are given to school districts; Title VII is not only, or anywhere near the largest, source of federal funds for school districts. Funds from Chapter 1 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981 are available for language assistance programs for limited English proficient (LEP) children, and serve far more LEP children than do Title VII funds. Secondly, schools choosing to develop "mostly" English programs are eligible to compete for Title VII funds. The law specifies only that English and the native language be used—it does not specify how much instructional time must be spent in the native language. The only school districts which are ineligible to compete for Title VII funds are those which refuse to use any amount of the children's native language for instruction.

Times Statement: "Flexibility in approach was the clear intent of Congress 15 years ago when it passed the Bilingual Education Act to support any new and imaginative program for non-English speaking students."

Fact: The Times omitted to state that these new and imaginative programs were always to use the child's native language and English. Over the years the Title VII statute has been modified to place greater emphasis on one language—English. The 1974 amendments to Title VII limited the use of the children's native language by specifying that native language was to be used only "to the extent necessary to allow a child to progress effectively through the educational system." The statute was further narrowed in 1978, when use of the native language was to be used only "to the extent necessary to allow a child to achieve competence in the English language." The next three sentences in this paragraph of the Times editorial, presumably examples of changes in Title VII, are actually actions by the Office of Civil Rights and the Supreme Court pursuant to Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964—not Title VII.

Times Statement: The Supreme Court ". . . directed schools to create special programs in foreign languages."

Fact: The Supreme Court, in Lau v. Nichols stated: "No specific remedy is urged upon us. Teaching English to the students of Chinese ancestry who do not speak the language is one choice. Giving instructions to this group in Chinese is another. There may be others. Petitioners ask only that the Board of Education be directed to apply its expertise to the problem and rectify the situation." (414 U.S. at 564-65.)

Times Statement: "In 1975, the civil rights office directed that districts had to develop "bilingual" programs; an all-English program no longer qualified for support.

Fact: In 1975, in the aftermath of the Lau decision, the then Department of Health, Education and Welfare's Office of Civil Rights (OCR) issued guidelines for school districts. These guidelines were for the purpose of helping districts comply with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act and had nothing to do with eligibility for Title VII funding. The guidelines required that districts demonstrate that they were taking affirmative steps to make their educational programs effective in ensuring equal educational opportunity for limited English proficient students. These remedies did not mandate bilingual education—English as a Second Language (ESL) was endorsed as one of five acceptable options at the intermediate and high school level. Although the guidelines did reject reliance solely on English as a Second Language program at the elementary level, they did not require bilingual education. Districts were free to propose and implement other approaches, and the Office of Civil Rights did approve some all-English compliance plans.

Times Statement: "Some teachers in the [bilingual] programs are themselves inadequate in English."

Fact: As many of the recent reports and commissions have stated, some teachers in all sorts of programs are inadequately prepared—hence the move toward teacher competency testing, improved teacher training programs and increased pay to attract better qualified candidates. With respect to federally supported bilingual education programs, the statute defines eligible programs as those using the most qualified available personnel, including only those personnel who are proficient in the language of instruction and in English. Although funded districts promise to comply with this provision, teachers are hired and paid by the local school districts, which vary in their teacher selection and evaluation methods and standards. Far more districts have employed monolingual English speakers as bilingual classroom teachers than have employed limited English proficient teachers. Most often limited English proficient individuals are hired as aides, or as team-teachers responsible only for native language instruction. The hiring of non-bilingual individuals (both English monolinguals and limited English proficient persons) is primarily the result of the shortage of trained bilingual teachers. Teacher training funds were included in Title VI in 1974, in recognition of the need to increase the pool of trained teachers. Research indicates that the majority of teachers using a non-English language for instruction are native English speakers. The 1980-81 Teachers' Language Skills Survey reported that teachers in Title VII programs comprise about 40% of all teachers using a non-English language in instruction. Teachers in Title VII programs are about twice as likely as the total group of teachers using a non-English language to have had formal training in teaching English as a Second Language and teaching content through the non-English language.

Times Statement: "The foreign-language teachers and bilingual managers have developed a vested interest in preserving their enrollments."

Fact: First of all, in current educational jargon, "foreign-language" teachers are those who teach a second language to fluent English speakers. These individuals are usually found in secondary schools teaching French, German, Spanish, Latin, etc. Bilingual teachers have no more vested interest in preserving their enrollments than does a chemistry or Latin teacher. However, unlike the Latin teacher, bilingual teachers are in less danger of losing their jobs if enrollments drop. Certification requirements in most states are such that most elementary school bilingual teachers are fully qualified to teach in non-bilingual classrooms. Furthermore, there is a tremendous nationwide shortage of bilingual teachers, with some districts (such as Houston, Texas) giving salary bonuses for bilingual certification, so jobs in other districts are not hard to find for this group of teachers. Finally, in Title VII projects, the money is not awarded on a per-child, entitlement basis as in Chapter 1. The project is funded for a specific period of time and the district does not lose funds when a child is "mainstreamed."

Times Statement: "A study for the Twentieth Century Fund this year went so far to urge the Federal Government to stop supporting bilingual education. It argued for 'immersion' in English language study and special help in other subjects when needed."

Fact: In fact, the Twentieth Century Fund did not recommend "immersion" programs. The recommendation on bilingual education stated that: the Task Force recommends that federal funds now going to bilingual programs be used to teach non-English-speaking children how to speak, read, and write English." This recommendation reflects a misunderstanding about federal bilingual education programs whose primary purpose is to help limited English proficient children achieve competency in English (Section 703(a)(4)(A) of the Bilingual Education Act). In fact, Task Force member Dr. Carlos Hortas of Hunter College in New York City dissented from the recommendation, saying: "It is unquestionable that all students must learn to speak, read, and write English in order to function in our society. Nonetheless, bilingual programs in which children are taught in English and in their native language are essential if we are to provide a healthy learning environment for children of limited English ability."

Dr. Hortas further stated that "no bilingual program in the United States promotes another language as a substitute for English. In fact, intensive English instruction is a part of every bilingual program." Furthermore, the Chairman of the Task Force, Dr. Robert Wood, this week sent a clarifying message to hearings on bilingual education conducted by the House of Representatives stating that the Task Force did not advocate "immersion" over bilingual education, and in fact reiterated the value of bilingual education program. Public comments lauding "immersion" have indeed been made by Task Force member Dr. Diane Ratvich, but Dr. Ratvich does not speak for the Task Force, and her recommendations were not stated in the report.

Times Statement: "Far from eliminating bilingual programs, as its critics charge, the [Administration's] bill would make proficiency in English a primary requirement for bilingual teachers, refine the requirements for evaluating bilingual programs, and let school districts decide whether their non-English speakers are best served by "immersion" courses or transitional training in native languages.

Fact: What the Reagan Administration's bill actually proposes is a $43.5 million reduction in funding for a program that is already so underfunded that each year it funds only about half of the applications submitted. The bill also proposes that separate funding for the highly successful bilingual vocational training programs be eliminated. On top of these funding cuts, the Administration would then allow monolingual approaches to compete for the scarce remaining money available for bilingual education. While the bill does not technically eliminate federal assistance for bilingual education, it maims the program by diluting the resoruces. The bill also contains a feature common to other Administration measures; it cosmetically reduces the need by redefining the "truly needy." In this case, the Administration proposes to serve only a small subset of those children who are limited in English proficiency. In addition to failing to note the bill's major provisions, the Times' three claims about the bill's benefits are also misleading:

Proficiency in English is already a primary requirement for bilingual teachers;

The Administration's legislation contains no requirements for evaluating bilingual programs; and Districts can already decide what approach is best for their students. Only those districts which choose to design bilingual programs and compete for Title VII funds are bound by the requirements that their programs utilize English and the native language.

It is inconceivable that the Times would label this bill as the wisest course for those who hope to promote learning English. It is a wise course only if one if interested in reducing the meager educational opportunities available to limited English proficient children and slashing the resources available to districts which have chosen to implement dual-language programs.●

THE SIMPSON/MAZZOLI IMMIGRATION AND REFORM ACT OF 1983

HON. JULIAN C. DIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, an issue of particualr concern in Los Angeles is the Simpson/Mazzoli Immigration and Reform Act of 1983.

Although it is agreed that immigration reform is needed, and that Senator SIMPSON and Representative MAZZOLI have done a commendable job in trying to develop a workable solution, the legislation pending before the House will not accomplish fair and compassionate reform.

I would like to share with my colleagues a statement supported by several religious leaders and organizations under the auspices of the Episcopal Diocese of Los Angeles. Although I do not necessarily embrace all of its recommendations, it properly highlights many of the criticisms voiced by my constituents. These are legitimate concerns which must be considered if the House takes up the Simpson/Mazzoli legislation.

The text of statement follows:

September 16, 1983.

STATEMENT

We, the undersigned religious leaders in the Los Angeles area, convened by Cannon Oliver Garver of the Episcopal Diocese of Los Angeles, are deeply opposed to the possible enactment of the Simpson/Mazzoli Immigration and Reform Act of 1983.

We have a special interest in the outcome of this legislation, since Los Angeles has the largest population of immigrants and refugees, both documented and undocumented, of any city in the United States.

We do not believe that this important legislation has been properly presented for public debate, particularly within the impacted minority communities. While Congressional hearings have been held, representatives of the immigrant and minority groups which will be most affected by this legislation have not been adequately heard.

We believe that immigration reform legislation is needed. However, we are of the view that the Simpson-Mazzoli legislation would be a major step away from achieving this goal. In our judgment, immigration reform must address the following: a broad and humane amnesty proposal under which undocumented immigrants presently living in the United States can qualify; elimination of the massive visa backlogs; humanization of the treatment of undocumented immigrants and applicants for political asylum (including access to essential social services); preservation and expansion of the family reunification programs; and, elimination of the temporary worker programs.

Instead of accomplishing these objectives, we believe that the Simpson/Mazzoli legislation would cause:

1. Massive increases in the importation and inevitable exploitation of temporary workers;

2. Significant increases in the existing back-logs of visa applications;

3. Cut-backs in the already minimal, but essential, due process rights in proceedings before the Immigration and Naturalization Service;

4. An ineffective "amnesty" program which will deny legalization to the great majority of undocumented workers, while creating a massive pool of exploitable "temporary resident" workers, and threatening thousands of immigrant families with mass deportations;

5. Reduction of lawful immigration for family reunification purposes, while increasing lawful immigration opportunities for those of wealth (in our opinion this will simply increase the number of immigrants entering the United States without documents); and

6. Discrimination against minorities and unnecessary hardships for U.S. employers, labor unions and employees, through implementation of the employer sanctions program.

For all of the above reasons, we urge that further Congressional consideration of a comprehensive overhaul of the Immigration and Nationality Act be deferred in this Congress.

We urge your opposition to the Simpson/Mazzoli legislation, and hope that a more humane and comprehensive bill can be prepared for and considered in the next Congress.

Sincerely Yours,

Most Reverend Juan Arzube, Roman Catholic Archdiocese, Los Angeles; Bishop Stanley E. Olson, Pacific Southwest Synod, Lutheran Church in America; Reverend Eugene C. Boutilier, Executive Director, So. California Ecumenical Council; Mark Ridley-Thomas, Exec. Director, Southern Christian Leadership Conference/Los Angeles; Dr. Charles A. Malotte, Executive Pastor, Southern California Region, Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); The Rev. Canon Morris Samuel, Cathedral Congregation, Episcopal Diocese of Los Angeles; Dr. Ignacio Castuera, Los Angeles District Superintendent, United Methodist Church; The Reverend Bryan Jones, Co-Rector, Epiphany Parish, Episcopal Diocese of Los Angeles; Father John D. Noble, Hispanic Commission, Episcopal Diocese of Los Angeles; The Rev. Canon Oliver B. Garver, Jr., Assistant to the Bishop, Episcopal Diocese of Los Angeles; The Rev. Dr. Thomas Kilgore, Jr., Pastor, Second Baptist Church of Los Angeles; President, The Black Agenda; Dr. George Cole, Assoc. Executive, Synod of Southern California & Hawaii, Presbyterian Church, U.S.A.; Dr. Elias Galvan, Executive, Council of Ministries, Pacific Southwest Conference, United Methodist Church; Mardy Olivas, American Bible Society; Dr. Fred P. Register, Conference Minister, Southern California Conference, United Church of Christ; Reverend Norman S. Johnson, Pastor, Greater Faith Baptist Church; and Reverends Philip Zwerling and John Marsh, First Unitarian Church of Los Angeles.●

HON. LARRY J. HOPKINS

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I was not present in the House today, Tuesday, September 27, during consideration and final passage of (H.R. 1010), the Coal Slurry Pipeline Act of 1983. I was attending the funeral of my father-in-law, Lawrence Pennebaker, in Paducah, Ky. Had I been present, I would have voted in favor of this bill.

I am supporting this legislation for several basic reasons. First, and foremost, this bill offers the battered electric consumer real hope for lower utility bills. In some cases the cost of transportation represents as much as 75 percent of the delivered price of a shipment of coal to a utility company. This cost is passed along to the utility's customers in their monthly electric bills. If the coal slurry pipeline can reduce those transportation costs, then I believe Congress has the responsibility to make sure such pipelines can be built.

Nothing speaks plainer than the facts and we have already witnessed the potential of a coal slurry pipeline to reduce transportation costs. Just recently two railroads and a coal slurry pipeline bid on a long-term contract to supply coal to Arkansas Power and Light Co. In announcing its decision to sign a 20 year contract with one of the railroads, Arkansas Power calculated a direct savings of $16.5 billion to its customers as a result of very favorable contract terms. The president of the utility stated that the mere possibility of competition from a slurry pipeline—even one which has not been built yet—was a significant factor in getting the railroads to offer such favorable terms. That is the type of competition which benefits the consumer and that is what is important to me.

Congress has repeatedly declared that reduction of our dangerous dependence on foreign supplies of energy by increasing our production and use of American coal, is a national priority. The coal slurry pipeline is this Congress' opportunity to prove it believes in that priority. A strong and competitive transportation system, consisting of railroads and slurry pipelines, will help the United States develop its coal reserves more quickly and increase this country's energy self-sufficiency.

I think it is important to note that this bill simply gives coal slurry pipelines a chance to compete. It does not place on the taxpayers the burden of paying for the multimillion dollar construction costs of a pipeline. Those companies choosing to build a pipeline will have to find their own capital to finance construction. In this country, competition and private initiative are the very foundation on which we have grown and prospered for the last 200 years. If Congress still believes in these principles we should allow everyone to have the opportunity to compete. This legislation simply gives coal slurry pipelines a chance to prove themselves in the marketplace.

Allegations have been made that the construction of coal slurry pipelines will cause a significant loss of jobs in the railroad industry because the pipelines will take away a large portion of the railroads' profitable coal hauling business. Nothing could be further from the truth and the Arkansas Power and Light deal proves the point once again. A railroad won that contract, not a pipeline. The railroads proved they do not have to lose business to pipelines, just that they will not longer be able to take that business for granted.

Further, coal production is expected to increase substantially over the next several years. According to the Department of Energy, even if all of the proposed coal slurry pipelines were to be built and were to operate at maximum capacity, they still could not transport all of the increase in coal production let alone take away some percentage of the market that railroads already have. In other words, there is room in the coal transportation market for both railroads and slurry pipelines and both ought to have the opportunity to compete.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, coal slurry pipelines are an idea whose time has come. The marketplace will ultimately decide whether they are competitive and whether they will survive but the Congress, today, will decide whether they even have a chance to try. Again, had it not been for the extraordinary circumstances of my father-in-law's death, I would have cast my vote in favor of H.R. 1010.●

UNIVERSITY HELPS SAVE A FACTORY FROM DOOM

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, in years past, ports and portages provided outlets for the commercial development from which this country prospered. Trade, transportation, finance, and manufacturing all started in or around such openings to the world. Today, with the advent of advanced modern technology and the realization that information is a country's ultimate power source, it is becoming apparant that our universities and colleges are the ports and conduits of future commercial development. Brain power, not river power, is fast rendering our traditional assumptions about commerce obsolete.

In a world that too often forgets the educational roots from which our prosperity is derived, we are sometimes awakened by the sleeping giant of academia. Recent instances have shown that higher education, that bastion of erudite esoterics, has climbed down from its ivory tower of anonymity with an entrepreneurial vengence worthy of any venture capitalist.

Accordingly, I commend to the attention of my colleagues a recent article in the New York Times which outlines just how the University of Alabama has joined in the descent from the tower.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 26, 1983]

UNIVERSITY HELPS SAVE A FACTORY FROM DOOM

(By William E. Schmidt)

TUSCALOOSA, ALA. Sept. 20.—Last fall, the betting among the 200 workers employed at the Rochester Products carburetor plant here was that they would be out of work before Christmas.

The General Motors Corporation said the small factory, which has made replacement carburetors for G.M. cars for 20 years, was no longer profitable. Even after carrying out $1.5 million worth of cost-cutting measures, G.M. said it would have to trim yet another $500,000 a year from the operating budget of the Rochester Products plant to keep it open.

That is when officials of G.M. and the United Automobile Workers joined community leaders in asking the University of Alabama, the community's largest employer and its dominant institution for help.

The university agreed in January to an experimental program in which it would send its students and faculty into the plant over three years to find ways to streamline operations, cut costs and make the factory more competitive.

In a joint announcement involving the company and the union, the university reported this month that it had already identified $470,000 in annual cost savings that the automobile maker had promised to carry out. In addition, the university said it had projects under review that had the potential of shaving $175,000 more in annual costs.

"What this all means is that this factory is going to stay open," said Tom Gilligan, the plant manager. "It means we're going to be here for a long time."

In fact, company officials said the experiment had been so successful that the company would explore ways to move a new product line to Tuscaloosa.

The proposed savings involve a variety of innovations devised by students and faculty members, ranging from a plan to cut energy costs by recycling ground water through the factory's cooling system to a new electronic surveillance system to reduce security costs.

The plan also involves efforts to use the university and its facilities to involve employees in developing new cost-cutting technology. In one program, Kennedy Jones, a graduate engineering student at the university, is working with plant employees on building and designing an automated packaging system.

In addition, the university has begun offering basic computer courses to plant employees.

Some of the university's projects have been financed by General Motors, which has guaranteed the school $250,000 a year in grants and scholarships to continue its research.

The agreement earlier this year came at a time when unemployment statewide was nearly 16 percent, the highest in the nation.

"In the beginning, a lot of the employees were afraid the whole program was going to cost us some jobs," said Grady Cook, a union official at the factory. "But these students have worked out just fine. The main thing is, the plant is going to stay open."

None of the measures proposed so far will force any reduction in the existing work force.

Since January 75 students and several dozen faculty members, mostly from the College of Engineering and the College of Commerce and Business Administration, have been working at the plant. Many of the students work 20 hours a week and are paid the minimum wage.

Mr. Gilligan says General Motors originally sought the involvement of university officials as part of a larger experiment in how to make small, remote plants more efficient and competitive.

"Quite candidly, the plant was going to be closed anyhow," said Mr. Gilligan. "So here was the perfect opportunity to experiment. And it worked."

When the agreement was announced in January, the plant was described by G.M. as an "applied research facility" and an experimental model for the "factory of the future."

University officials are also delighted with results of the program, which affords students operating experience in an industrial setting.

In one instance, students from the university's home economics department have been using the factory to test the durability of fabrics worn by workers. Meanwhile, student nurses are helping to staff the plant's medical stations.

The program was not without risk for the university. Under the agreement, the university pledged to pay General Motors $500,000 a year for access to the plant. Then any cost savings that the university found would be deducted from the rent.

"If we had failed, at the end of three years we would have ended up owing $1.5 million in rent and the plant would close down anyhow," said Dr. Joab Thomas, the president of the University of Alabama, "not to mention the fact that there would have been an active search committee here at the university looking for my successor."

SUCCESS TO BRING PAYOFF

The early success of the plan will also mean that plant employees each will get back nearly $1,500 that workers had allowed to be deducted from paychecks since Jan. 1 to help pay the costs.

Dr. Thomas said he saw the opportunity to participate in the industrial experiment as one way to put into practice his personal philosophy that higher education can do more to contribute to the economic development of a region.

"In the next five years, I think you'll see an explosion of this kind of activity, and the development a new coalition involving business and universities," said Dr. Thomas, adding that the university had already been approached by other industries.

Local civic officials also raised $75,000 to help get the project off the ground.

"Here was an opportunity for the university to come down from its ivory tower and do something besides write erudite articles that nobody reads," said Dr. J. Barry Mason, a professor in the university's business school and head of the overall cost-savings task force. "What we've set up here can help attract industry and get the area moving again."●

YOU BE PRESIDENT: AFRICA'S PROBLEMS TRANSCEND LEADERS

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, this is the last in a series of six recently published articles on sub-Saharan Africa written by Nicholas D. Kristof, a Rhodes scholar from Yamhill, Oreg.

The article follows:

[From the Oregonian, May 28, 1982]

AFRICA'S PROBLEMS TRANSCEND LEADERS

(By Nicholas D. Kristof)

ACCRA, GHANA.—Suppose for a moment you were president of Ghana. This country, once called the Gold Coast, is rich in natural resources—gold, timber, bauxite and fertile land—yet the economy is stagnant and the people are getting poorer. Your task is to reverse the country's decline. If you fail, you may be deposed and shot.

That is the position in which many leaders of African countries find themselves. Everybody knows the economic and political mire in which these nations are stuck. But the problems all too often are glibly attributed to government incompetence and corruption. The stereotype is of a dictator whose own stupidity, if not that of his countrymen, is responsible for the mess.

What the stereotypes and glib talk fail to portray, however, is the depth of the problem these countries face in modernizing. So consider for a moment what you would do to extricate your country from the mess.

First, a bit of information about your country, Ghana. It is slightly smaller than Oregon and is situated in the bulge of West Africa. Like Oregon, it has beautiful beaches and a population renowned for friendliness.

That is where the similarities cease. The population of Ghana is 12 million, roughly five times that of Oregon. The life expentency is 49 years (compared with 74 in the United States), there are almost 10,000 people for every doctor (570 in the United States) and people consume an average of only 1,980 calories per day (3,580 in the United States). Beggers are everywhere, disease is rampant, and the children with bloated stomachs play naked in the dirt streets.

Shocked by the poverty and suffering, you try to take action. You need more doctors, but you can't afford them. Sending a student abroad for medical training would be far too costly, and no student can afford it on his own. Even opening a medical school in your own country is unfeasible. One study in 1965 found that in the United States the cost to produce one medical school graduate was $19,630; in Senegal the cost was $84,000.

So you forget about the doctors. Latrines would help enormously in the villages, for many diseases are carried in human feces. But latrines are expensive, the villagers are not used to them, and you have no reliable local government to maintain the latrines.

What you really need, you decide, is money so you can afford latrines and doctors and other nice things. But where do you get money? Ghana has gold, bauxite and other minerals, but your interior minister explains that the country doesn't have the proper equipment and technology for exploration and mining. Moreover, the infrastructure is an obstacle: The roads and railroads are poor, so it is difficult to get ore to ports.

Perhaps a foreign investor would supply the capital, you suggest, but you say it timidly because you know how it grates on people to see rich foreigners carry off the country's resources. But the minister of commerce explains icily that no foreign investor would touch Ghana—a succession of coups, the infrastructure problem, the rampant corruption and a hundred other hardships mean you would have to offer so many incentives to a foreign investor that you would get nothing or practically nothing out of the deal.

But agriculture—surely agriculture offers a way out. Ghana once was the world's leading producer of cocoa, and cocoa still provides about 60 percent of export earnings. Cocoa production has fallen steadily for 15 years, the plantations are in terrible shape and the world cocoa price has fallen in recent years.

You sternly call in your agriculture minister and ask why cocoa production has fallen. "It's very simple," he says "The former governments paid farmers a low price for the cocoa, and then the government sold the cocoa for a high price on the world market and kept the difference. The farmers weren't paid enough and so they have switched to other crops or haven't taken care of their cocoa trees."

"Well, pay them more for cocoa, so the incentive will be restored," you order petulantly, proud of your economic insight. The agriculture minister shakes his head and sighs: "We did raise the price, but now we can't afford to pay them. We have been giving them IOUs this spring, and they're getting desperate for money."

You sink lower in your chair and put your head in your hands for a moment. You ring for your budget officer, who explains that government spending is resulting in enormous deficits and inflation of about 130 percent per year. But where do you cut? Health, education and social spending are already getting minimal amounts. Even defense expenditures amount to only 0.8 percent of the gross national product (the proportion in the United States is 3.1 percent). The problem simply is that you have little money to start with: Taxation doesn't bring in much revenue when the people are poor, and there is little industry.

Finally, consider the other constraints on what you can do. First of all, the country is new and an artificial creation of colonialism, with people split into half a dozen tribes that speak different languages. If you are president, you probably never went to more than a few years of school, and so you are baffled and resentful when sophisticated foreign advisers drop by with their suggestions.

Western governments don't give you much aid, so you turn to the Arab countries, and especially Libya. You know that Col. Moammar Khadafy may be involved in assassination plots abroad, but so was the CIA, and at least Khadafy seems to care for the developing countries. Sure enough, he comes through and sends you 500,000 barrels of oil, free, along with a few military advisers.

Bang! You have just been shot by an ambitious army officer who is staging a coup. You are dead. But thanks for playing this little game.

The problems can seem overwhelming, enough to take your breath away. If governing Oregon is a challenge, then tackling the grinding poverty and stagnant economies of developing countries is far more difficult.

There can still be progress, if not panacea, with time, care and help from industrialized countries. But it is easier to understand why the African countries are doing so poorly when one considers their difficulties. When one is out of the armchair and in the driver's seat, the problems seem greater and the options fewer.●

SOVIET UNION DEFECTOR SAYS SOVIET DESTRUCTION OF KOREAN AIRLINER WAS NO ACCIDENT

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, as people from around the world continue their outrage at the Soviet Union's shooting down of an unarmed civilian airliner, I would like to share with my colleagues an article by Arkady Shevchenko, the highest ranking Soviet diplomat to defect to the United States, which appeared in the September 19 edition of Newsweek on the Korean Air Lines incident.

IT WAS NO ACCIDENT—A DEFECTOR SAYS MOSCOW'S LEADERS ARE CONVINCED THAT THE WEST'S CLAMOR WILL SUBSIDE

(In 1978, with the help of the CIA, Arkady Shevchenko became the highest-ranking Soviet diplomat to defect to the United States. A protégé of Andrei Gromyko, he had served as under secretary-general at the United Nations and had an insider's view of Soviet policymaking. Shevchenko's thoughts on the 007 affair:)

One of the most sinister aspects of this tragedy is that it was not an accident; it was a natural product of the standard functioning of the Soviet system. But there is more significance to that slaughter in the sky than Moscow's habitual disregard for human life or its obsession with security. It reflects Kremlin certitude that Soviet leaders can emerge relatively unscathed from whatever outrageous behavior they might be contemplating. It recalls to me the boast I heard on so many occasions: that they would "get out of the water dry."

CONSISTENT

They have good reason for their confidence. The recent uproars over Afghanistan, Poland and human-rights violations have subsided rather quickly, and business has resumed almost as usual. While the West wavers, the Soviets are nothing if not consistent. Their arrogance, their tendency to stonewall, to repeat lies and denials is reinforced by their experience, which has taught them that the clamor will cease.

The Soviet air defense is an independent branch of the armed forces headed by a deputy minister of defense. In this particular instance, I assume that the local commander cleared the matter with the main staff of antiaircraft defense in Moscow. It is quite possible that someone there got in touch with political leaders, perhaps even Yuri Andropov. I cannot imagine Andropov overruling the military's desire to end the intrusion. Were he to do so, his position would be seen as fatal weakness.

The Soviets have an almost fanatical preoccupation with loss of face. Furthermore, in the Soviet system bureaucratic information often comes out garbled or just plain wrong so Andropov might have been improperly apprised of the identity of the plane, if he was told beforehand. There is no doubt that there was not enough time to convene a Politburo meeting to review the situation before choosing a course of action. But there is only one body that could approve standing orders under which the tragedy could have occurred: the Politburo.

Soviet response in the KAL incident throws into sharp focus some other important and far-reaching issues pertinent to the nuclear age. Could the Kremlin be as reckless with its nuclear arsenal as it has been in its willingness to use its conventional forces? Is there a conflict of interest between the Soviet political and military leadership? If so, is the military getting the upper hand and turning the Kremlin toward a kind of Bonapartism, as some observers have suggested?

I want to stress that their is no disagreement among the Soviet leaders—either political or military—as far as the Kremlin's ultimate goals. They believe in the inevitable—if eventual—victory of Soviet-style socialism. But I have never heard anyone in the Soviet leadership speculate even privately among trusted comrades about achieving aims through nuclear war.

At present I do not see how military or security men could usurp the party. It is true that the leading troika (Prime Minister Nikolai Tikhonov, Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko and Defense Minister Dmitry Ustinov) consists of bureaucrats or technocrats, and that their coachman, Andropov, is somewhere between a party functionary and a bureaucrat. The only "true" party man in the leadership, Konstantin Chernenko, is apparently in poor health.

Today's situation in the Kremlin is unique in Soviet history. Traditionally, professional party apparatchiki have been the predominant force. However, the new composition of the top leadership does not constitute a trend, but is merely incidental, the aftereffect of the death or disgrace of other senior party leaders. The party elite, the true ruling class of the U.S.S.R., will not permit this state of affairs to continue for long: any Bonapartist tendency would immediately recall to those high in party ranks the cases of Marshal Georgi Zhukov and Lavrenty Beria, who attempted to put the Army or the security apparatus above the party. Indeed, the party bosses have already begun to rectify the anomaly.

DIALOGUE

Should the United States and the West try to deal with a government with so brutal a mentality? Those who advocate severing all contacts should not forget that the U.S.S.R.'s nuclear and general military potential is equal to or in some respects superior to that of the United States. The Soviet Union and the United States have unprecedented power to exterminate or to save humanity. If we are to avoid cataclysm, it is imperative to maintain a dialogue with the Kremlin. This dreadful affair should not be the spark by which we burn our bridges in Soviet-American relations.

Exchanges between Washington and Moscow must continue, but there is an old and still true lesson in such exchanges that the West must not forget: what the men in the Kremlin understand best is military might, energetic political determination and strength of will. If the West cannot meet the Soviet stance with equal determination, the Kremlin will continue to bully it.●

A LATIN AMERICAN STATESMAN SPEAKS TO THE UNITED STATES

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, the September 3 Miami Herald carried an article by Julio Cesar Turbay Ayala, who was President of Colombia from 1978 to 1982. In his article, President Turbay advances the intriguing idea that the United States, Western Europe, Latin America, and Japan should set up a special multinational aid fund to create the conditions of social peace in Central America. He also suggests that among the conditions that the donors could establish that the proposed recipients would have to meet would be arms reductions, the withdrawal of foreign advisers, and free elections.

I think the idea of making available large-scale economic aid, but only on the condition that the recipients take real steps toward peace, would create a powerful impetus for both peace and development in Central America. As a senior counselor to the Kissinger Commission on Central America, I hope not only my colleagues in the Congress, but also the Commissioners, will give careful consideration to this idea.

The article follows:

SEND AID, NOT WORDS TO CENTRAL AMERICA

(By J. C. Turbay Ayala)

BOGOTA.—More than advice, what Central America needs now is aid—milions of dollars are needed to push through reforms and create real conditions of special peace in Central America and the Caribbean. The United States, together with Latin America, Europe, and Japan, could set up a multinational aid fund aimed at the democratization and well-being of the region.

Faced with the ineptitude and foot-dragging of institutions such as the United Nations and the organization of American States, the benefactors could set the conditions for those nations hoping to benefit from the Multinational Fund. The Fund could, for instance, demand they disarm to the bare limit needed for national defense. It could also require the withdrawal of foreign military advisers and officials, and it should be able to set down the prerequisites for real elections.

Those beneficiaries who comply in good faith with the Funds's conditions would then receive aid in money, technical assistance, and trade facilities to obtain the maximum benefit for their nations.

The Central American crisis dates back several centuries, with colonels in some of the countries replacing each other and, in other countries, generals perpetuating their power. The miserable social conditions prevailing in the region have always been dangerous: the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few and abuse by large foreign companies have fueled the flames of a revolution long in the making. Its manifestation should have surprised no one.

Clearly, such a situation has been craftily and maliciously exploited by enemies of the United States, which is blamed for aiding de facto governments. The fact remains that democracy—with the exception of Costa Rica—has not flourished in the region. And the economies of Central America have been steadily worsening and today are in serious crisis.

Despite such a dramatic situation, Central American nations spend a sizeable chunk of their meager earnings on costly arms purchases to try to reestablish the military balance Nicaragua upset with its foreign military aid.

The crisis has now gone beyond the capacity of the Central American nations, who could well become participants in an armed confrontation.

The peace initiative of the Contadora Group—Colombia, Venezuela, Mexico, and Panama—is a praiseworthy and majestic effort of good offices. The Group leaders deserve Latin America's gratitude for their persistent efforts to achieve the kind of peace that eludes their best intentions.

The Multinational Fund is another way out. It would surely bring better results than armed confrontation or maintaining the status quo.

Under such a scheme, an executive committee of the donor countries would play a watchdog role by supervising proper management of the funds. Those nations that did not accept the Fund's conditions would thus—by their own choice—be excluded from the development process and therefore show that they are tied to other forces and nations to obtain ends contrary to peace and democracy.

The lot of the recipient nations meanwhile would visibly improve, while they strengthen their defenses and representative institutions.

I do not believe in temporary remedies, although they can be effective to an extent. Our main concern should be the causes—not the symptoms—of the problems of Central America and the Caribbean. What is needed is a policy of broad outlook and long-range goals.

That is why I envisage a long, intense, and determined struggle against misery, hoarding of capital, illegal seizure of power, and arms buildups.

It would be a serious mistake to carry out such a plan without United States participation. Equally wrong would be to let the Americans go it alone. For a number of reasons, the problem is one that calls for the participation of all democracies.

It is less costly to defend a system than to restore it, so urgency is of the essence. The Central American and Caribbean nations need timely aid and not advice to overcome the engulfing dangers.

These observations and proposals are not guided by self interest. They are not a government's official proposal, but the free opinion of a democrat.

Now that President Reagan has appointed a high-ranking commission to examine the situation in Central America, it is timely to put forth ideas whose force lies in acceptance by the contributing nations and the agreement of the Central Americans.●

THE PRESIDENT AT THE UNITED NATIONS

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the President for the tone and frankness of his recent speech before the U.N. General Assembly. I appreciate the spirit in which the President challenged the United Nations as well as the Soviet Union.

President Reagan made it clear that he believes that the United Nations has drifted away from the original role envisioned by its founders. That organization was designed to be a body which condemned violence, stood for certain values, and spoke with the voice of moral authority. Having once served as a member of America's U.N. delegation, I appreciate the President's suggestion that the United Nations should return to the true values of the U.N. Charter. Only by reaffirming these values can that international forum truly serve the cause of peace in this troubled world.

The President also challenged the Soviet Union to match America's flexibility in the international arms reduction area. He took the initiative in the deadlocked intermediate nuclear forces negotiations by unveiling a new U.S. proposal. He offered the Soviets an advantage in European-based medium-range nuclear weapons in exchange for equal global limits on such warheads. Let us hope that the Kremlin will ultimately be more receptive than a Soviet delegate at the United Nations who referred to the new proposal as a "sugar-coated ploy."

I, too, have asked if the downing of the unarmed Korean airliner might reflect the Soviets' concept of truth and international cooperation. How would such an attitude toward international accords affect Soviet compliance with present and future agreements?

I was gratified to learn that international reaction to the positive tone of the President's address was so encouraging. Only by facing the facts and using truth as our guide can the community of nations ever hope to work for our common goal—peace in the world.

With these thoughts in mind, I want to strongly recommend the President's speech to all Members of Congress. It is a message of hope for all of us.

TEXT OF REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT TO THE 38TH SESSION OF THE U.N. GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Thank you for granting me the honor of speaking today, on this first day of general debate in the 38th Session of the General Assembly. Once again I come before this body preoccupied with peace. Last year I stood in this chamber to address the Special Session on Disarmament. I have come today to renew my Nation's commitment to peace. I have come to discuss how we can keep faith with the dreams that created this organization.

The United Nations was founded in the aftermath of World War II to protect future generations from the scourge of war, to promote political self-determination and global prosperity, and to strengthen the bonds of civility among nations. The founders sought to replace a world at war with a world of civilized order. They hoped that a world of relentless conflict would give way to a new era, one where freedom from violence prevailed.

Whatever challenges the world was bound to face, the founders intended this body to stand for certain values, even if they could not be enforced, and to condemn violence, even if it could not be stopped. This body was to speak with the voice of moral authority. That was to be its greatest power.

But the awful truth is that the use of violence for political gain has become more, not less, widespread in the last decade. Events of recent weeks have presented new, unwelcome evidence of brutal disregard for life and truth. They have offered unwanted testimony on how divided and dangerous our world is, how quick the recourse to violence.

What has happened to the dreams of the U.N.'s founders?

What has happened to the spirit which created the U.N.?

The answer is clear: Governments got in the way of the dreams of the people. Dreams became issues of East versus West. Hope became political rhetoric. Progress became a search for power and domination. Somewhere, the truth was lost that people don't make war, governments do.

And today in Asia, Africa, Latin America, the Middle East, and the North Pacific, the weapons of war shatter the security of the peoples who live there, endanger the peace of neighbors, and are ever more arenas of confrontation between the great powers. During the past year alone, violent conflicts have occurred in the hills around Beirut, the deserts of Chad and the Western Sahara, in the mountains of El Salvador, the streets of Suriname, the cities and countryside of Afghanistan, the borders of Kampuchea, and the battlefields of Iran and Iraq.

We cannot count on the instinct for survival to protect us against war, despite all the wasted lives and hopes that war produces, it has remained a regular, if horribly costly, means by which nations have sought to settle their disputes or advance their goals.

And the progress in weapons technology has far outstripped the progress toward peace. In modern times, a new, more terrifying element has entered into the calculations—nuclear weapons. A nuclear war cannot be won and must never be fought. I believe that if governments are determined to deter and prevent war, there will not be war. Nothing is more in keeping with the spirit of the U.N. Charter than arms control.

When I spoke before the Second Special Session on Disarmament, I affirmed the United States Government's commitment, and my personal commitment, to reduce nuclear arms, and to negotiate in good faith toward that end.

Today, I reaffirm those commitments. The United States has already reduced the number of its nuclear weapons worldwide and, while replacement of older weapons is unavoidable, we wish to negotiate arms reductions, and to achieve significant, equitable, verifiable arms control agreements. And let me add, we must ensure that world security is not undermined by the further spread of nuclear weapons. Nuclear non-proliferation must not be the forgotten element of the world's arms control agenda.

At the time of my last visit here, I expressed hope that a whole class of weapons systems—the longer-range INF missiles—could be banned from the face of the earth. I believe that to relieve the deep concern of peoples in both Europe and Asia, the time was ripe, for the first time in history, to resolve a security threat exclusively through arms control. I still believe the elimination of these weapons—the zero option—is the best, fairest, most practical solution to this problem. Unfortunately, the Soviet Union declined to accept the total elimination of this class of weapons.

When I was here last, I hoped that the critical Strategic Arms Reduction Talks would focus, and urgently so, on those systems that carry the greatest risk of nuclear war—the fast-flying, accurate intercontinental ballistic missiles which pose a first strike potential. I also hoped the negotiations could reduce by one-half the number of strategic missiles on each side and reduce their warheads by one-third. Again, I was disappointed when the Soviets declined to consider such deep cuts, and refused as well to concentrate on these most dangerous destabilizing weapons.

Despite the rebuffs, the United States has not abandoned and will not abandon the search for meaningful arms control agreements. Last June, I proposed a new approach toward the START negotiations. We did not alter our objective of substantial reductions, but we recognized that there are a variety of ways to achieve this end. During the last round of Geneva talks, we presented a draft treaty which responded to a number of concerns raised by the Soviet Union. We will continue to build upon this initiative.

Similarly, in our negotiations on intermediate-range nuclear forces, when the Soviet leaders adamantly refused to consider the total elimination of these weapons, the United States made a new offer. We proposed, as an interim solution, some equal number on both sides between zero and 572. We recommended the lowest possible level.

Once again, the Soviets refused an equitable solution and proposed instead what might be called a "half zero option"—zero for us, and many hundreds of warheads for them. That is where things stand today, but I still have not given up hope that the Soviet Union will enter into serious negotiations.

We are determined to spare no effort to achieve a sound, equitable and verifiable agreement. For this reason I have given new instructions to Ambassador Nitze in Geneva, telling him to put forward a package of steps designed to advance the negotiations as rapidly as possible. Those initiatives build on the interim framework the United States advanced last March and address concerns that the Soviets have raised at the bargaining table in the past. Specifically:

First, the United States proposes a new initiative on global limits. If the Soviet Union agrees to reductions and limits on a global basis, the United States for its part, will not offset the entire Soviet global missile deployment through U.S. deployments in Europe. We would, of course, retain the right to deploy missiles elsewhere.

Second, the United States is prepared to be more flexible on the content of the current talks. The United States will consider mutually acceptable ways to address the Soviet desire that an agreement should limit aircraft as well as missiles.

Third, the United States will address the mix of missiles that would result from reductions. In the context of reductions to equal levels, we are prepared to reduce the number of Pershing II ballistic missiles as well as ground-launched cruise missiles.

I have decided to put forward these important initiatives after full and extensive consultations with our allies, including personal correspondence I have had with the leaders of the NATO governments and Japan and frequent meetings of the NATO Special Consultative Group. I have also stayed in close touch with other concerned friends and allies. The door to an agreement is open. It is time for the Soviet Union to walk through it.

I want to make an unequivocal pledge to those gathered today in this world arena. The United States seeks and will accept any equitable, verifiable agreement that stabilizes forces at lower levels than currently exist. We are ready to be flexible in our approach, indeed, willing to compromise. We cannot, however, especially in light of recent events, compromise on the necessity of effective verification.

Reactions to the Korean airliner tragedy are a timely reminder of just how different the Soviets' concept of truth and international cooperation is from that of the rest of the world. Evidence abounds that we cannot simply assume that agreements negotiated with the Soviet Union will be fulfilled. We negotiated the Helsinki Final Act, but the promised freedoms have not been provided, and those in the Soviet Union who sought to monitor their fulfillment languish in prison. We negotiated a Biological Weapons Convention, but deadly yellow rain and other toxic agents fall on Hmong villages and Afghan encampments. We have negotiated arms agreements, but the high level of Soviet encoding hides the information needed for their verification. A newly-discovered radar facility and a new ICBM raise serious concerns about Soviet compliance with agreements already negotiated.

Peace cannot be served by pseudo arms control. We need reliable, reciprocal reductions. I call upon the Soviet Union today to reduce the tensions it has heaped on the world in the past few weeks, and to show a firm commitment to peace by coming to the bargaining table with a new understanding of its obligations. I urge it to match our flexibility. If the Soviets sit down at the bargaining table seeking genuine arms reductions, there will be arms reductions. The governments of the West and their people will not be diverted by misinformation and threats. The time has come for the Soviet Union to show proof that it wants arms control in reality, not just in rhetoric.

Meaningful arms control agreements between the U.S. and the Soviet Union would make our world less dangerous; so would a number of confidence-building steps we have already proposed to the Soviet Union.

Arms control requires a spirit beyond narrow national interests. This spirit is a basic pillar on which the U.N. was founded. We seek a return to this spirit. A fundamental step would be a true non-alignment of the United Nations. This would signal a return to the true values of the Charter, including the principle of universality. The members of the United Nations must be aligned on the side of justice rather than injustice, peace rather than aggression, human dignity rather than subjugation. Any other alignment is beneath the purpose of this great body and destructive of the harmony it seeks. What harms the Charter harms peace.

The founders of the U.N. expected that member nations would behave and vote as individuals, after they had weighed the merits of an issue—rather like a great, global town meeting. The emergence of blocs and the polarization of the U.N. undermine all that this organization initially valued.

We must remember that the non-aligned movement was founded to counter the development of blocs and to promote detente between them. Its founders spoke of the right of smaller countries not to become involved in others' disagreements. Since then, membership in the non-aligned movement has grown dramatically, but not all the new members have shared the founders' commitment to genuine non-alignment. Indeed, client governments of the Soviet Union, who have long since lost their independence, have flocked into the non-aligned movement, and once inside have worked against its true purpose. Pseudo non-alignment is no better than pseudo arms control.

The United States rejects as false and misleading the view of the world as divided between the empires of the East and West. We reject it on factual grounds. The United States does not head any bloc of subservient nations, nor do we desire to. What is called the West is a free alliance of governments, most of whom are democratic and all of whom greatly value their independence. What is called the East is an empire directed from the center which is Moscow.

The United States, today, as in the past, is a champion of freedom and self-determination for all people. We welcome diversity; we support the right of all nations to define and pursue their national goals. We respect their decisions and their sovereignty, asking only that they respect the decisions and sovereignty of others. Just look at the world over the last 30 years, and then decide for yourself whether the United States or the Soviet Union has pursued an expansionist policy.

Today, the United States contributes to peace by supporting collective efforts by the international community. We give our unwavering support to the peacekeeping efforts of this body, as well as other multilateral peacekeeping efforts around the world. The U.N. has a proud history of promoting conciliation and helping keep the peace. Today, U.N. peacekeeping forces or observers are present in Cyprus and Kashmir, on the Golan Heights and in Lebanon.

In addition to our encouragement of international diplomacy, the United States recognizes its responsibilities to use its own influence for peace. From the days when Theodore Roosevelt mediated the Russo-Japanese War in 1905, we have a long and honorable tradition of mediating or dampening conflicts and promoting peaceful solutions. In Lebanon, we, along with France, Italy and the United Kingdom, have worked for a ceasefire, for the withdrawal of all external forces, and for restoration of Lebanon's sovereignty and territorial integrity. In Chad, we have joined others in supporting the recognized government in the face of external aggression. In Central America, as in southern Africa, we are seeking to discourage reliance upon force and to construct a framework for peaceful negotiations. We support a policy to disengage the major powers from Third World conflict.

The U.N. Charter gives an important role to regional organizations in the search for peace. The U.S. efforts in the cause of peace are only one expression of a spirit that also animates others in the world community. The Organization of American States was a pioneer in regional security efforts. In Central America, the members of the Contadora group are striving to lay a foundation for peaceful resolution of that region's problems. In East Asia, the Asian countries have built a framework for peaceful political and economic cooperation that has greatly strengthened the prospects for lasting peace in their region. In Africa, organizations such as the Economic Community of West African States are being forced to provide practical structure in the struggle to realize Africa's potential.

From the beginning, our hope for the United Nations has been that it would reflect the international community at its best. The U.N. at its best can help us transcend fear and violence and can act as an enormous force for peace and prosperity. Working together, we can combat international lawlessness and promote human dignity.

If the governments represented in this chamber want peace as genuinely as their peoples do, we shall find it. We can do so by reasserting the moral authority of the United Nations. In recent weeks, the moral outrage of the world seems to have reawakened.

Out of the billions of people who inhabit this planet, why, some might ask, should the death of several hundred shake the world so profoundly? Why should the death of a mother flying toward a reunion with her family or the death of a scholar heading toward new pursuits of knowledge matter so deeply? Why are nations who lost no citizens in the tragedy so angry?

The reason rests on our assumptions about civilized life and the search for peace. The confidence that allows a mother or a scholar to travel to Asia or Africa or Europe or anywhere else on this planet may be only a small victory in humanity's struggle for peace. Yet what is peace if not the sum of such small victories?

Each stride for peace and every small victory are important for the journey toward a lasting, a larger peace. We have made progress. We have avoided another world war. We have seen an end to the traditional colonial era and the birth of 100 newly-sovereign nations. Even though development remains a formidable challenge, we have witnessed remarkable economic growth among industrialized and developing nations. The U.N. and its affiliates have made important contributions to the quality of life on this planet, such as directly saving countless lives through its refugee and emergency relief programs. These broad achievements, however, have been overshadowed by the problems that weigh so heavily upon us. The problems are old, but it is not too late to commit ourselves to a new beginning, a beginning fresh with the ideals of the U.N. Charter.

Today, at the beginning of this 38th Session, I solemnly pledge my Nation to upholding the original ideals of the United Nations. Our goals are those that guide this very body. Our ends are the same as those of the U.N.'s founders, who sought to replace a world at war with one where the rule of law would prevail, where human rights were honored, where development would blossom, where conflict would give way to freedom from violence.

In 1956, President Dwight Eisenhower made an observation on weaponry and deterrence in a letter to a publisher. He wrote: "When we get to the point, as we one day will, that both aides know that in any outbreak of general hostilities, regardless of the element of surprise, destruction will be both reciprocal and complete, possibly we will have sense enough to meet at the conference table with the understanding that the era of amendments has ended and the human race must conform its actions to this truth or die." He went on to say, ". . . we have already come to the point where safety cannot be assumed by arms alone . . . their usefulness becomes concentrated more and more in their characteristics as deterrents than in instruments with which to obtain victory . . ."

Distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, as we persevere in the search for a more secure world, we must do everything we can to let diplomacy triumph. Deplomacy, the most honorable of professions, can bring the most blessed of gifts, the gift of peace. If we succeed, the world will find an excitement and accomplishment in peace beyond that which could ever be imagined through violence and war.

I want to leave you today with a message I have often spoken about to the citizens of my own country, especially in times when I have felt they were discouraged and unsure. I say it to you with as much hope and heart as I have said it to my own people. You have the right to dream great dreams. You have the right to seek a better world for your people. And all of us have the responsibility to work for that better world. And, as caring, peaceful peoples, think what a powerful force for good we could be. Distinguished delegates, let us regain the dream the United Nations once dreamed.●

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS STUDY SHOWS JAPANESE CORPORATE TAX MUCH HIGHER THAN U.S. CORPORATE RATE; DISPELS ARGUMENT THAT U.S. CORPORATE TAX RATES ARE TOO HIGH

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, the Library of Congress is issuing a new report that blows out of the water one of the most harped on themes of supply siders and those who would totally abolish the corporate income tax. This theme, repeated in numerous studies and articles, is that the U.S. corporate tax rate is higher than it is in some other, economically more successful countries—such as Japan—and that therefore we need to reduce, reduce, reduce U.S. corporate taxes.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the Library's report states that when you add together national and subnational taxes, the effective tax rate on manufacturing in Japan is 50.5 percent compared to America's 27.7 percent!

In short, Japan's tax on corporations is about twice the U.S. rate.

Thus bites the dust another reason given for many American companies' failure to compete well with the Japanese.

In a recent book on tax reform, "Inequity and Decline," the authors made the point in passing that Japan's tax code was more or less copied from ours, "before the onset of 'loophole mania' among America's political and business leaders." I asked the Congressional Research Service whether this assertion was accurate, and Jane Gravelle, specialist in industry analysis and finance, economics division, replied that Japanese depreciation practices and other subsidies appear to be similar to the U.S. tax practice of the fifties.

The Library's study, by Ms. Gravelle, adds more proof to the argument that the best thing we could do to improve our economy is get rid of the insane distortions created by President Reagan's 1981 tax bill. We should also get American corporate officers to stop spending so much time trying to create tax loopholes and spend more time making a quality product that can compete with the Japanese.

The Library's study also makes the point that most of these studies on different nations' tax rates tell us little or nothing about why one country grows and another lags. As the study says, "Differential growth rates are, in any case, not related to differential tax levels according to standard growth theories."

Mr. Speaker, I just want to warn future witnesses before the Ways and Means Committee who say Japan has a low tax rate and that we should copy it, that they are in for a load of hard questioning from me.

Copies of the report, "Comparative Corporate Tax Burdens in the United States and Japan and Implications for Relative Economic Growth," September 6, 1983 (Report No. 83-177E), are available from the Library.●

SOBRO SPURS PROGRESS IN THE SOUTH BRONX

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a continuing success story in the on-going rehabilitation of the South Bronx. The South Bronx Overall Economic Development Corp. (SOBRO), headed by President John T. Patterson, Jr., has made impressive progress toward reversing the tide of economic disinvestment that has plagued this area for many years. SOBRO plays an important role in redeveloping the South Bronx and is a worthy model for other urban areas facing similar challenges.

After a decade of progress, SOBRO President Patterson and Chairman J. Bruce Llewellyn deserve our congratulations. I am including in the RECORD an article which appeared in the most recent edition of Metropolis. The article reports on the many successes of SOBRO and its plans for the near future.

SOBRO SPURS PROGRESS IN THE REDEVELOPMENT OF SOUTH BRONX

SOBRO, newest acronym in New York City's geography, is the nickname for the South Bronx Overall Economic Development Corporation. With a nod to SOHO (South of Houston Street), SBOEDC this spring became SOBRO.

When SOBRO observed its tenth anniversary last December, J. Bruce Llewellyn, its chairman in addition to being chairman of Fedco Foods Corp., noted that the work of the corporation had resulted in $40 million in capital being brought into the South Bronx, the creation of 10,000 new jobs and the retention of another 13,000 jobs in companies that considered moving away but were persuaded to stay.

In addition to manpower training and placement, SOBRO concentrates primarily in three other areas:

Industrial development, including site locations, loan packaging and technical assistance; Commercial revitalization; Community development, which includes technical assistance to community-based organizations.

An example of industrial development activity SOBRO president John T. Patterson, Jr. likes to cite is Cummins-Metropower Inc., a unit of Cummins Engine Co. When the corporation heard that Cummins-Metropower was considering leaving the South Bronx, it contacted Chemical Bank's local managers. Working with them, SOBRO arranged for Cummins-Metropower to buy four acres of in-rem property (land taken by the city for non-payment of taxes) on which was then built a plant large enough to absorb the company's New Jersey operations as well. The result: 40 jobs saved and 150 added.

President Patterson says that these are examples of the role the city's banks have played from the outset. Early funding support came from Bankers Trust, Chemical, Citibank, Manufacturers Hanover and Morgan Guaranty; later Marine Midland became involved. Michael Gill, then a vice president of Bankers Trust, served as the corporation's first chairman, and his bank provided office space free in a branch office located in a building SOBRO subsequently bought. SOBRO's Manpower Training Center on East 148th Street, which has trained more than 5,000 persons to date, is housed in quarters donated by Chemical.

SOBRO's first major commercial revitalization project was the building on Third Avenue formerly occupied by the Hearns department store. Since the store had been an anchor of the South Bronx for decades, SOBRO's leadership was concerned about the vacuum that would be created, mindful of the S. Klein store which has stood empty on Manhattan's 14th Street for many years.

SOBRO, working with Chemical Bank, assisted a group of entrepreneurs that purchased the building and rehabilitated the ground floor to accommodate 18 small store units. The diverse shops now operating employ more people than Hearns did, and SOBRO is working on leasing the upper floors for back office operations of banks or securities firms. Patterson thinks the South Bronx is ideal for back office operations, since it affords low-rental space and accessibility to many modes of transportation within the city and from Westchester and New Jersey.

In October, a second major structure given a new life by SOBRO will open.

The Phillips-Jones Building is a 120,000 square-foot building which was taken by the city for non-payment of taxes, had been vacant since 1976 and was once scheduled for demolition. With $2.5 million in grants from the Federal Economic Development Administration and the Department of Energy, SOBRO bought the building and has converted it into an energy-efficient industrial structure suitable for sub-leasing to light manufacturing firms.

The structure will provide affordable space for business, ac . 350 jobs to the area, put a significant property back on the tax rolls and provide SOBRO with income for other projects and programs. In the words of John Patterson: "It's a whole package of pluses for the city."

SOBRO calls its Commercial Revitalization Program "Shopstreets." Currently, it is helping to rehabilitate five commercial areas that have been losing customers in recent years by providing design and planning services, financial support and technical assistance. Among them are Yankee Village, a $1.4 million reconstruction of East 161st Street near Yankee Stadium; McKinley Square restoration, and a $4.5 million reconstruction program in the shopping area along Third Avenue between 147th and 156th Streets.●

TRIBUTE TO MASARU TSUGAWA

HON. DANIEL K. AKAKA

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty today to have to rise in memory of a dear friend of mine, Masaru Tsugawa, or Masa, who passed away recently. He was a young 73 when he died on September 9, 1983.

Masa was an outstanding engineer whose illustrious career epitomized the best in his profession and spanned a period of 50 years, all but a very short period in Hawaii. One of his major positions was that of chief of the planning and construction division of the building department, city and county of Honolulu. In that capacity, he planned, designed and constructed our Neal Blaisdell Center, a cultural center of our fair city. It is one of the finest centers in our country and consists of a sports arena, an exhibition hall, and a concert hall whose acoustics are second to none.

He was also responsible for the planning and construction of schools statewide and for all other public facilities in the city and county of Honolulu. After retiring from government service in 1971, Masa continued to serve with distinction as an engineering consultant to a major engineering firm in Honolulu.

Throughout his long and distinguished career in Hawaii, Masa served us well and we shall all miss him dearly. I join his wife and family in grieving at his passing and extend to them my heartfelt condolences and hope that they find solace in the fact that Masa's contributions to our community lives on.●

AMERICA PROVIDES POPULAR RADIO VOICE IN EASTERN EUROPE

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, the President's speech at the Voice of America on Saturday, which was broadcast live to the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, was an important step toward peaceful collaboration with the progressive forces within the Soviet bloc. It was also an attempt to create trust between the peoples of East and West, based on the free flow of information, that weakens the will toward war. In the nuclear age, any gesture in this direction is the height of intelligence global strategy, and I commend the President for this important initiative.

The following article, written by Mort Rosenblum of the Associated Press, demonstrates just how important our international broadcasts have become. I commend this article to my colleagues, and urge them to continue their strong support for these vital national security programs.

The article follows:

[From the Buffalo (N.Y.) News, Sept. 23, 1983]

AMERICA PROVIDES POPULAR RADIO VOICE IN EASTERN EUROPE

(By Mort Rosenblum)

WARSAW, POLAND.—Poles refer wryly to their five radio stations. Four are the government's. The fifth, assailed and jammed but probably heard by half of adult Poland, is Radio Free Europe.

The network, along with sister operation Radio Liberty, broadcasts in 21 languages to Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, raining down local news, dissident reports and biting commentary.

It is a major U.S. foreign policy tool, and the changes made over the years have given the network a more energetic and less ideological character, senior U.S. officials said in Washington.

Polish authorities take it so seriously that they sentenced to death in absentia Zdzislaw Najder, director of Radio Free Europe's Polish service. They charged he was a CIA spy because he contributed secretly to the radio network while still in Warsaw.

Czechoslovak law specifically defines collabortion with the network as high treason. Poland, Czechoslovakia and East Germany jam it, and the Soviet Union jams Radio Liberty. Other Soviet bloc countries vilify the two operations.

The stations, based in Munich, West Germany, have broadcast one million hours since they were established in 1951 as thinly disguised CIA operations.

After a congressional outcry in 1971, all CIA links were ordered severed. Now the non-profit Board of International Broadcasting oversees the stations. James L. Buckley, former U.S. senator from New York and undersecretary of state, is Radio Free Europe-Radio Liberty president. The budget, $90 million in 1983, is paid by Congress.

"People associate us with the CIA because it used to be true," remarked an executive of the broadcasting board in Washington, asking anonymity. "Now it is not."

If not everyone in the Soviet bloc is convicted, audiences are large and faithful, frequently including government officials who listen in private.

"There is a lot of U.S. propaganda, but I listen whenever I can," said a Czechoslovak railway executive in Prague. "We had a big train crash near Bratislava and I only heard about it on REE."

A Polish office worker said, "I never miss it. It always seemed a little headline to me, but now, how else do we know what is going on?"

Other Western stations, such as the British Broadcasting Corp., the Voice of America and West Germany's Deutsche Welle, cover the same geography, but Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty emphasize local items.

Programs include readings of works banned by government censors, underground communiques and emigre gossip. Polish dissidents acknowledge that the station is important to their activities.

Listenership is highest in Poland, where network officials estimate 62 percent of the adult population tunes in at least once a week. The figure is near 50 percent in other East European countries. Altogether the estimated weekly audience is 25.3 million.

Radio Liberty, which broadcasts to the Soviet Union and is jammed heavily, is followed by only 7 percent of the adult population, according to the stations' estimates.

"You can never jam completely, and strange patterns emerge," said Anatole Shub, program director in Washington. "When Andrei Sakharov won the Nobel Peace Prize (in 1975) and couldn't go, he followed the ceremony on Radio Liberty from a Moscow apartment."

The management of the two operations merged in 1976. Besides broadcasting, they provide extensive research to scholars and journalists. Makeshift headquarters near Munich's English Garden are crammed with 100,000 volumes in 52 languages. The Czechoslovak service alone receives 170 daily papers and periodicals, along with news agency wires, government bulletins and samizdat (underground) publications.

Each of the national language services prepares its own scripts from the central news desk and separate research sections. Staff correspondents include Monika Lovienescu in Paris, whose literary criticism many emigre writers regard as vital to their success.

Supervisors check scripts before broadcast and then send a summary which station managers might scan afterward.

"There is almost no prior vetting by the seven U.S. staff members here," said network Deputy Director Robert L. Hutchings. "There are very few direct controls. It is more a meeting of minds."

He said editors sought to establish credibility and a detached view. Over a period of time, he said, listeners want to hear constructive comment rather than simple attacks on their systems.

Some bitterness still lingers among Hungarians who feel the network encouraged a hopeless rebellion in 1956, suggesting that U.S help was on its way.●

BOYS TOWN OF ITALY

HON. LYLE WILLIAMS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. WILLIAMS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, October 10, 1983, a very noteworthy event will be taking place in my district that I believe merits special attention.

A benefit dinner for the Boys Town of Italy, a home located in Italy for orphaned children from around the world, will be held by Mr. Ray Travaglini and Mr. Sandy Petruso at their VIP entertainment complex in Niles, Ohio. All proceeds from this annual dinner will be donated to the Boys Town which is run entirely on volunteered funds. Last year, the $25,000 raised by Ray and Sandy was third only to amounts raised in New York City and San Francisco. Certainly, the amount handed to Msgr. Carroll Abbing, director of the Boys Town, during this year's dinner program will equal or more likely surpass previous totals.

Regardless of the tough economic times facing the residents of my congressional district, they have made a special effort to give of themselves to this very worthy cause. Their generosity truly transcends this time of financial hardship. With their dollars and moral support, these citizens are spreading American goodwill abroad. I find this action to be extremely admirable and in the best tradition of voluntarism.

On behalf of the residents of the Mahoning Valley, I take this opportunity to applaud Ray Travaglini and Sandy Petruso for their tireless devotion to the noble cause of giving to others less fortunate. These two gentlemen have approached this charitable task with characteristic dedication and unfailing perserverance. Because of their efforts, the Boys Town of Italy will be able to provide the loving care that the orphaned children of the world so sorely need. Ray and Sandy, I salute you.●

SPORT FISHING AND ACID RAIN

HON. GERRY SIKORSKI
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. SIKORSKI. Mr. Speaker, today I am inserting in the RECORD an informative article by Paul Hansen on acid rain, which appeared in the September issue of Fishing Facts. As the author states, acid rain poses a serious threat to the future of fishing.

I encourage my colleagues to read this article and to join me in sponsoring H.R. 3400, the National Acid Deposition Control Act of 1983. The time to pass acid rain control legislation is now—before it is too late.

DEATH FROM THE SKIES

(By Paul Hansen)

According to the prestigious National Academy of Sciences, the evidence is in. If we do not stop the rain of acids on our streams and lakes, much of our freshwater fishing heritage in sensitive regions will be eliminated forever. It would be a useless and unnecessary loss because we can stop acid rain, and we can do it for a very acceptable cost.

From 1958 to 1975 the emissions of sulfur and nitrogen oxides that cause acid rain doubled. Emissions of these pollutants from power plants in the Eastern United States have tripled.

This increase in pollution from power plants has been compounded by the building of taller and taller smokestacks, which push emissions higher into the atmosphere, completing their transformation into acidic compounds. Some of the stacks built in the last decade are as tall as the Empire State Building. Now, the pollution from power plants and industry is often transported hundreds of miles before being brought to earth as acid rain or snow, sleet, fog, or as dry particles, with devastating consequences to downwind neighbors.

The startling effects of acid rain are appearing throughout the United States and Canada. The loss of fish from thousands of lakes and streams is the most obvious effect, but it is also leaching nutrients from forest soils while releasing toxic metals into soils and groundwater. Buildings and monuments are being eroded, and public health may be endangered. The National Academy of Sciences estimates that $5 billion or more in damage is done every year by acid rain in the Eastern United States where there are extensive areas susceptible to acid rain.

As acidification gets worse it affects fish in the following ways:

By attacking their reproductive systems and by killing or deforming fry (which are even more vulnerable than eggs).

By interfering with food chains. The process can start at the very bottom of the food chain with the destruction of the tiny life forms on which minnows and other small freshwater food organisms feed before they themselves are eaten by larger fish.

By decalcifying and weakening of the bones of fish. When this happens, as it may in cases of extreme acidification, the bodies of the fish become twisted and in some cases fish lose the ability to swim.

By metal poisoning Investigators studying rivers and lakes subjected to acid rain have found fish kills in waters where pH levels seem to be still safe. Research has shown why: the lower pH dissolves aluminum, and other metals allowing them to mix into the water. Even in small concentrations these metals can harm and even kill fish. Certain forms of aluminum clog gills, causing fish to suffocate.

Thousands of lakes and streams across the United States and Canada have been acidified to the point where this is happening. Tens of thousands more are threatened. The U.S. National Academy of Sciences warned us in 1981 that unless acid rain is controlled, the number of affected lakes would double by 1990.

Fish in 212 Adirondack lakes have already been lost. The non-partisan congressional Office of Technology Assessment (OTA) estimates that more than 9,000 lakes and 60,000 miles of streams in the Eastern United States are threatened by acid rain or are now being damaged.

In Ontario, Canada, 1,400 lakes and ponds have already succumbed to acid rain and 48,000 are threatened with extinction.

In Minnesota, 2,600 lakes are now at the critical stage.

In Wisconsin, lakes are reported to be declining at a measurable rate.

In Pennsylvania, the Fish Commission reports that unless emission patterns change dramatically, it is likely that most of the important fish species from that state's upland waters will be lost.

In Michigan, scientists recently identified the first acidified lakes in the Midwest.

The new map of surface water sensitivity to acid rain shows that vast regions of South and Southeastern surface waters share these same critical characteristics of chemical sensitivity to acid rain as the lakes and streams in Sweden, Norway, Canada, and New England where fisheries are lost. The acidity of rainfall in these regions is already past the threshold at which fish die. Some fisheries' damage and the first signs of acidification are already reported in the South and one EPA (Environmental Protection Agency) scientist, who asked not to be identified, believes we would find more damage if we only looked.

In the West, there are new concerns for many high altitude areas which are among the most extremely sensitive areas in the U.S. Once the limited buffering capacities of the mountain areas have been exhausted, damage done thereafter will be irreversible. Compounding the vulnerability of these areas is the fact that a disproportionately large portion of total precipitation, and hense total acid deposition, occurs on high altitude areas. The spring "surge," when months of acid rain deposition stored in the snowpack are released, is especially tough on fish fry and other emergent organisms which are in very sensitive stages in the spring.

In the West, South, and the East, the effects of acid rain on forests could be far more extensive and irreversible than the damage to lakes and streams.

Forests in the Eastern United States, Canada, and Europe are suffering from stunted growth and "die-back." Most of the usual cases such as disease, insects, population cycles, and climate have been ruled out. Evidence that acid rain is causing forest damge is accumulating at a rapid rate.

In West Germany, extensive forest damage from acid rain recently prompted the government to issue proposed rules to reduce sufur dioxide emissions by 50% from existing utility and industrial boilers.

Independent analyses have demonstrated that a 40% reduction in Eastern sulfur oxide emissions would cost $2.4 billion per year and would result in an average electricity rate increase of 2%. To put these figures in perspective, this is substantially less than Americans spend playing video arcade games evey year. Damage from acid rain is estimated at $5 billion per year.

New technologies coming into use in Germany, such as LIMB (Limestone Injection Multistage-Burner) are a fraction as costly as conventional scrubbers and could reduce control costs even further. Unfortunately, EPA's research office has repeatedly blocked an EPA staff proposal for a full scale joint EPA-industry funded LIMB demonstration project. Congressmen in the House, who believe a full-scale LIMB demonstration is essential to spur commercialization of LIMB and decrease acid rain control costs in pending legislation, voted in June to insist on funds for this project.

The electric utilities have projected greatly exaggerated costs and impacts on utility rates for an acid rain control program by adopting unrealistic assumptions. The Congressional Research Service found these claims to be completely unjustifiable scientifically. Some industry officials have circulated some pretty wild claims about the economic impacts of acid rain control cost. However, EPA analysis shows Eastern coal production will increase 40 million tons per year by the year 2000 even if a 40% reduction in emissions is required. Utility rates would increase by an average 2%, and no more than 7% in any region.

The list of prestigious scientists and independent organizations calling for control of acid rain would choke a tall stack. Simply put, they believe our nation remains strong enough to enjoy both a healthy economy and a productive fishery. They are tired of the utilities' scare tactics and claims that we cannot do what other countries are doing to stop acid rain. In June, both the President's Scientific Review Panel and the National Academy of Sciences announced that we need to control acid rain now.

Inaction will be costly. It takes 10-20 years to enact an acid rain reduction program and actually to start reducing the pollution. Many lakes are therefore already doomed even if we start controlling acid deposition today. Further delays will cost us untold amounts in loss of fishing habitats and opportunities, not to mention millions of dollars in fishing and tourism revenue.

We know the causes and cures for acid rain. Now we need the action from Congress to stop it. Their decision will depend largely on the response of the American fishing public in the next few months.

ACID AND FISH: SOME AVERAGE LEVELS AND IMPACTS

	Impact
Increasing acidity:
pH 6 to pH 5.5	Rainbow trout, smallmouth bass, walleye and burbot fail to reproduce.
pH 6.5 to 4.6	Growth of brook trout slowed.
pH 5.8 to 5.2	Lake trout, perch fail to reproduce.
pH 5.5 to 4.5	Brown trout fail to reproduce. Adult deaths of lake trout begin.
pH 5.2 to 4.7	Northern pike, brown bullhead, white sucker fail to reproduce; Pumpkinseed fail to reproduce.
pH 5.0	Atlantic salmon fail to reproduce.
pH 5.0 to 4.5	Brook trout fail to reproduce.
pH 4.7 to 4.5	Lake herring, yellow perch, lake chub, rock bass fail to reproduce.
pH 4.5	Adult deaths of Atlantic salmon begin.
pH 4.5 to 3.5	Adult deaths of brook trout.

REVLON DEDICATES NEW RESEARCH CENTER

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it is a great honor for me to bring to the attention of my colleagues the many achievements of Revlon, a leading manufacturer in the Sixth Congressional District that will next week dedicate a new research center at its Edison, N.J., plant.

Revlon has been a major employer and important industry in the Northeast for a long time, providing much-needed jobs in our area.

This most recent expansion illustrates the confidence shared by leading industrialists and policymakers alike, in the great economic potential of the Northeast. It is a fact that we in the Northeast have long known and seen proven time and time again by the successes of pioneering industries such as Revlon which has played a major role in our area's growth and prosperity.

This new research center marks a milestone for Revlon in a long, distinguished, and fruitful career in New Jersey and beyond. We welcome it warmly both as a source of new initiatives and opportunities and as a signal of Revlon's foresight and continued advancement.●

CARL "YAZ" YASTRZEMSKI

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, some call politicians frustrated actors; others know them as frustrated hometown athletes. Every politician hopes that each speech will have the same effect on a crowd as a home run in the ballpark, and every ballplayer plays to a special constituency of fans.

The scene at Boston's Fenway Park as the Red Sox battles the rival Minnesota Twins does not belie this proposition. The year is 1967. The normally tranquil autumn in New England is replaced by a fever as red as the maples on the hillsides. It is October 1, and the Sox are in a neck in neck three way battle for the American League pennant.

In the stands are many of our Nation's leaders—Republican and Democrat. On the field and in the dugout are some of the league's greats—Harmon Killebrew, Rico Petrocelli, and Jim Lonborg. But, one man stands taller than the rest—Carl "Yaz" Yastrzemski. This Saturday, we Red Sox fans will try to relive the magic of that shining season as we watch Yaz pick up the bat one final time.

I would like to submit the following article, "Delirium at Fenway—HHH is only No. 2, but Yaz is No. 1," from the October 1, 1967, Boston Globe to help my colleagues capture the spirit of 1967 and the man who made it happen.

DELIRIUM AT FENWAY

(By Bud Collins)

At nine minutes to five Saturday afternoon 32,909 baseball patrons at Fenway Park became prime candidates for the state hospital at Bridgewater. They went as mad as King Lear himself, deliriously and noisily mad, as Carl Yastrzemski struck his 44th home run to win Part I of Our Old Town Team's Last Stand.

Part II goes on this afternoon at 2, the splendid madness continuing in the same asylum with its mint-green walls and nut-filled seats.

Make that 32,908 people who went cuckoo at Fenway Saturday. A man from Minnesota named Hubert H. Humphrey did not blow his mind when Yastrzemski's three-run homer vanished into the Twins' bullpen in the seventh inning. Hubert, who seems to cheer harder because he is No. 2, was suddenly silent.

There was a look on his face reminiscent of the day he lost the 1960 West Virginia primary to a local boy named Kennedy. Flanking him, screaming and giving Humphrey the needle, were two men who had helped beat him in West Virginia—Sen. Ted Kennedy and former presidential assistant in charge of batting averages, Dave Powers.

"I need protection from these Red Sox fans," Humphrey, said, looking warily at Kennedy and Powers. "Eddie Stanky told me these people were crazy here."

The Vice President came into Boston with a 7-1 record for the eight Twins' games he has observed this season. "I wished Jim Kaat luck before this game," he said. He should wish Ho Chi Minh luck. Kaat's elbow broke down in the third inning and his successor, right hander Jim Perry, was pinched for two runs in the fifth inning as the Red Sox began to roll up their 6-4 victory.

Yastrzemski's home run, which made the score 6-2, brought forth the grandest emotional display of the handkerchief-waving since the Harvard-Yale football game. The jubilant nuts were flapping their "Go-Red-Sox" banners, their Yastrzemski pennants, their hats as well as their hankies, they screamed insanely for 45 seconds, reducing the volume slightly when the game resumed with Elston Howard batting. Ulysses Dunbar, brother of the late columnist, took care not to drag his "Freak-Out-Red-Sox" banner on the grimy concrete. "This sheet has to go back on the bed tonight," he said.

Mrs. Mary Tracy of Revere was spinning her "lucky" Red Sox parasol, made from a white tablecloth and covered with inspirational messages in red. "We have another tablecloth," she said. "I don't need to take this umbrella apart every time we eat."

Everybody wanted to hold Yastrzemski's hand after he had done his daily good deed. The usual exhibitionists, four in all, did. They leaped onto the field to congratulate Carl, then were removed by the cops. Ted Kennedy and Hubert Humphrey looked jealous. Shaking hands is their business, and what a spot for a pol to shake hands; out there all alone with the TV cameras clutching the hand of Yastrzemski, the most valuable of players. Ted and Hubert restrained themselves and did not run onto the field.

Another pol named Brooke also showed up. Brooke did an extraordinary thing. It seems he bought Tickets because the Red Sox management didn't know he was there, he was neither a guest at luncheon or in a front row box. Sen. Ed Brooke sat in right field, unnoticed, with his good looking teenage daughters, Remi and Edwina. "I'm with Ted Kennedy on this issue," Brooke said. "We're going to win."

Humphrey, according to Dave Powers, has become L. Baines Johnson's "official representative at wakes and baseball games." The vice president had some of each Saturday. The wake was in the Twins' dressing room which he dutifully visited. "I'm still with you guys," Hubert told them.

Vice presidential support is nice to have, but Humphrey is only No. 2. The opposition party has No. 1: going for it; Carl Yastrzemski.●

HAPPY 50TH BIRTHDAY DR. NORMAN MOSKOWITZ

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to pay tribute today to Dr. Norman Moskowitz of Hollywood, Fla., on the occasion of his 50th birthday.

Dr. Moskowitz, an alumni of Duke University, is a respected member of the south Florida community and has been recognized as an outstanding orthopedic surgeon of the elderly. His professional achievements are many—he is the past chief of orthopedic surgery at the Biscayne Hospital, past chairman of the surgical department, and affiliated with Doctors' and Memorial Hospitals.

His dedication to medicine and his patients is unsurpassed. Norman Moskowitz has not been one to seek the limelight and public attention, but rather one who, without acclaim, gets the job done. He is a conscientious and dedicated citizen contributing his talents to the benefit of a multitude of organizations, children's medical clinics, and individuals. His leadership and hard work has served the south Florida community well.

Norman Moskowitz has been a dear friend of mine for many years, and while I have long been aware of his outstanding abilities in his field, Mr. Speaker, I wished to acknowledge his achievements and dedication on behalf of the community. I sincerely wish Norman my heartfelt, best wishes for a very happy birthday celebration with his wife Bernice, and children Neil and Larry.●

LOUIS ARMSTRONG MIDDLE SCHOOL HONORED FOR EXCELLENCE

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the great honor that has been bestowed on the Louis Armstrong Middle School of East Elmhurst, N.Y. In a year in which numerous criticisms—many of them justified—have been leveled against the American public school system, it is refreshing to hear about a school that has been cited by the Department of Education for academic excellence and educational creativity. The Louis Armstrong Middle School has been so honored. Its quality is indicative of the giant strides being made by public institutions in teaching the future leaders of this Nation.

This recognition could not have been achieved without the tireless dedication of the school's faculty and the ceaseless commitment of the students and their parents. The classroom as well as the proper home enviornment are both prerequisites for an atmosphere conducive to thoughful inquiry and the pursuit of knowledge. The Louis Armstrong School is blessed with both. Under the able guidance of its principal, Alfred D. Herman, the school has embarked on a mission to develop the vast resources that exist within the minds of the young people East Elmhurst. And the Parents Teachers Association, under the leadership of Louisa Nenno and Leon Payne, has provided the support necessary for the success of the school's varied programs, and to help parents become involved in their children's academic progress.

In addition, it is important to note that the Louis Armstrong School was established as a joint effort by the board of education and Queens College of the City University of New York. This dual sponsorship enables the children to utilize the vast teaching and other educational resources of Queens College, and enhances the school experience. This type of project is unique to the educational process, and the enriched education it provides is evidence by the recognition that the Louis Armstrong School has received. Queens College has helped develop the school's innovative curriculum. Queens College's student teachers help instruct Louis Armstrong's pupils. The college has also been instrumental in funding special educational projects that the Louis Armstrong School has used. Much credit for the innovation and quality of the education belongs to Saul Cohen, president of Queens College; Sidney Trubowitz, director of the Queens College Center for Improvement of Education in the middle Grades; and John Lidstone, dean of the Queens College Department of Education. This joint effort started out as merely an experiment. I hope that it not only become a permanent component of the education of the children of East Elmhurst, but also serves as an incentive and model for other schools to embark on similiar ventures.

Mr. Speaker, in this year more than any other year in the past, it is important to note the achievements of exemplary educational institutions, so that other schools may emulate them. The Louis Armstrong Middle School is one such institution. I know that all my colleagues join me in congratulating the Louis Armstrong Middle School on its achievements, and wish it continued success as it explores new avenues of educational innovation.●

TRIBUTE TO CONGRESSMAN JAMES C. CORMAN

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Congressman James C. Corman, who served with great distinction as a Member of this body from 1961 to 1981. As the Congressman from the San Fernando Valley area of Los Angeles, which I am now privileged to represent, Congressman Corman has contributed much of the growth and development of San Fernando Valley. Jim Corman also became one of the leading Members of Congress during his tenure, serving as a member of the House Ways and Means Committee and as chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation. He has been a strong supporter of progressive tax reform, and has led the effort to make health care more affordable to all Americans.

Congressman Corman has long been dedicated to the preservation and advancement of civil rights. He played a significant role in the passage of the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964. He has been a strong defender of the freedoms guaranteed to each and every citizen of this country with his support of important Government programs to grant equal rights, protect consumers, and permit freedom of choice, and as an opponent to the proposed school prayer amendment.

During his 20 years of service as a Member of this distinguished institution, Congressman Corman has also contributed his efforts and considerable talents to the House Committee on Small Business, of which he was a member, and the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, to which he was appointed in 1967 by President Johnson. In addition, Congressman Corman was so well respected by his Democratic colleagues that he was chosen to serve as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in 1976.

Jim Corman is best described as a determined, dedicated leader, who, during his many years of public service, set the ideal for those who were to follow. He is a gentle, caring, compassionate man who always has the needs of the people and the community foremost in his mind. Personally speaking, I would describe Jim Corman as a good friend.

Mr. Speaker, on this Friday, September 30, 1983, Congressman James C. Corman will be honored at a dinner celebrating the formal presentation of the records of his 20 years of congressional service to the Urban Archives Center, on the campus of the California State University, Northridge. The Urban Archives Center was established in 1978 to preserve the archival records of groups and individuals associated with public growth in Metropolitan Los Angeles. The center already has collected over 250,000 separate items, and makes these available to the public for research. I share Jim Corman's hope that the Urban Archives Center will grow and prosper as it continues to preserve the history of our community.

I would like to take this opportunity to personally congratulate Congressman Corman on his two decades of service to this body, and on his continuing efforts today to serve the people of the San Fernando Valley and Los Angeles.●

CENTENNIAL OF PASADENA LODGE NO. 272, F. & A.M. 100 YEARS OF MASONRY IN THE SAN GABRIEL VALLEY

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, on October 21, the Pasadena Lodge No. 272 F. & A.M. will celebrate and commemorate a landmark date—its 100th birthday in the San Gabriel Valley.

As a centenarian, this venerable institution is older than many of the cities in the valley, including Pasadena.

For 10 decades, the members of the Pasadena Lodge have been leaders and movers in the community and the State.

For 100 years, the members of the Masonic temple have donated their time, talents, and considerable resources to projects and charities that have benefitted countless individuals.

For five score years, this organization has made many tangible and intangible contributions toward a stronger, better society by molding stronger and better men within its ranks.

Mr. Speaker to help commemorate the 100th anniversary of a grand and patriotic group, I would like to proclaim before my colleagues in the House of Representatives, October 21 as the centennial of Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A.M., 100 years of Masonry in the San Gabriel Valley.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. JAMES McCLURE CLARKE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, on September 13 and 14, 1983, I was necessarily absent for three votes. I would like to make clear my position on those measures considered in the House.

On the motion to recommit H.R. 3520, the Rehabilitation Act amendments, rollcall No. 332, I would have voted "nay."

On the final passage of H.R. 3520, the Rehabilitation Act amendments, rollcall No. 333, I would have voted "yea."

On the final passage of H.R. 5, the Ocean and Coastal Resources Management Act, rollcall No. 334, I would have voted "yea."

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having this opportunity to make my position known for the record.●

KOREAN AIR LINES FLIGHT 007

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, the shooting down of Korean Air Lines flight 007, an unarmed, civilian jetliner, by the Soviet Union was a barbaric act of cold-blooded murder. The world will never forget the tragic series of events that led to the demise of KAL flight 007 on the evening of September 1, 1983; it will never forget the pictures of grieved loved ones tossing flowers into the Sea of Japan in a final expression of love for the 269 parents, children, and friends who died; it will never forget the voice of a Soviet pilot, chillingly devoid of human compassion reporting to his commanders that "the target is destroyed."

My prayers of sympathy go out to the families of the 269 victims, especially to the families the two Connecticut citizens aboard, Mark McGetrick of Danbury and Rebecca Scruton of Meriden, and to those of my colleague, Representative Larry McDonald of Georgia.

I applaud the action taken by President Reagan in this crisis. He has shown temperance at a time when emotions demand a harsher response. Perhaps this evil act by the Soviets will convince the world of the true, twisted logic of the Soviet military bureaucracy, and how it, at least in peacetime, responds not to human reason, but a paranoid quest for security.

The President's actions have hurt the Soviets where they are most vulnerable—their image. The downing of the Korean airliner has boldly removed the carefully crafted image of peace lover which the Soviets labor so hard to convey to the world. Their actions have shown their true colors. Afghanistan and Poland stirred world opinion about the Soviet's lack of concern for human rights. The destruction of KAL flight 007 has moved the world to express open revulsion toward the Soviet callous disregard of innocent human lives.

More information about the fate of flight 007 is still being obtained. We know now that the Soviet fighter did indeed fire tracer bullets at the Korean 747. But did the pilot of the Soviet plane make sure he got his message across? Clearly not. Even if he had, did this then justify the Soviet decision to destroy an unarmed passenger jet? Certainly not. As more facts are uncoverd, we must not let ourselves be distracted from the harsh reality of this event: The Soviet Union willingly, knowingly, shot down an unarmed passenger airliner, killing all 269 passengers and crew aboard.

The Soviet Union could do a great deal to demonstrate to the world that they possess some semblance of humanity: They could allow Japanese and American ships to participate in the search for wreckage and bodies; they could issue a full and complete apology to the families of the passengers and crew aboard flight 007, and offer to pay compensation; they could issue a full apology to the Government of Korea and to Korean Air Lines; and they could give assurances to the world civil aviation community that steps will be taken to prevent such a heartless act from ever being repeated. They have not done so. They have not even said they are sorry.

The lives of the 269 people aboard flight 007, I fear, ended in terror. They did not, however, end in vain. Our Government will continue to take a leadership role in demanding that the Soviet Union not be allowed to let the passage of time erase what they have done to 269 innocent people. Some may say more should be done to make the Soviet's pay for their actions. I believe we should never let them forget—it is a price I think the Soviets will find difficult to pay.●

A TRIBUTE TO RICHARD AND LUCILLE SNYDER

HON. JULIAN C. DIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself and Congressman MEL LEVINE, I would like to pay tribute to Richard and Lucille Snyder, who, on October 5, 1983 will celebrate their 50th wedding anniversary. The Snyders moved to Santa Monica from New York over 30 years ago and have been active members of the community since that time. Richard recently retired from Occidental Insurance Co., after 40 years in the insurance field.

Both Richard and Lucille are accomplished musicians. Lucille is a former Julliard teacher and now teaches piano and organ in Santa Monica. Richard is also an avid keyboard player and plays the piano and organ regularly for the Elks Club.

Richard and Lucille have two sons, Peter and Richard, Jr., and eight grandchildren. Peter is a cellist with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra and Richard, Jr., is an electronics engineer and heads an electronics firm in New Jersey.

The Snyders are active and vital people, loved by their family and friends and respected in their community. I firmly believe that you get out of life what you put in. Judging from the contribution the Snyders have made to society this is a time for them to rejoice and enjoy the fruits of their labor. I would like to congratulate them on their 50 years of marriage and wish them all the best that life has to offer.●

JAPAN'S LEAD IN ROBOTICS INCREASES

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, the country that leads the world in the technologies of robotics and automated manufacturing will lead the world in manufacturing. I want that country to be the United States, and I am sure that other Members do, too.

Paul Aron, vice chairman of the board of Daiwa Securities, makes the study of the Japanese and American robotics industries his profession. His most recent report, "The Robot Scene in Japan: An Update," shows clearly that the United States, despite progress in the robotics industry, is falling farther behind Japan in this area, as a result of Japan's existing lead and greater rate of growth.

I am inserting selected excerpts from this report in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to alert Members to the challenge we face from Japan in robotics and automated manufacturing.

To advance the technologies and counter the challenge, I intend to introduce a set of three bills to promote automated manufacturing and robotics in the near future.

Excerpts from Mr. Aron's report follow:

Analysis of the detailed data on Japanese robot production and sales in 1982, recently released by the Japan Industrial Robot Association (JIRA), indicates several important trends.

Japanese production of robots in 1982 increased 51.6% on a value basis to $471 million and 82.6% on a unit basis to 14,937. In comparison estimated American production in 1982 was $195 million in value, an increase of 25.8%, and 1,601 in units, a growth of 26.2%. Despite this expansion, America continues to lose ground vis-a-vis Japan—in 1980 and 1981 U.S. production value equalled 49.3% and 49.8% respectively on a comparable basis while in 1982 American output reached 41.4% of Japan's robot production. On a unit basis American robot production has dropped to 10.7% of Japan's compared to 15.5% in 1981.

The growth rate in value of robots in Japan has averaged 73.9% for the past five years and the annual rate has never fallen below 51.4 percent. As a consequence of this growth, the gap in installed operating robots between the U.S. and Japan is not being closed. At the end of 1982 total of installed operating robots in Japan reached at least 31,900 and possibly 33,961 compared to 6,301 in the U.S. Thus the U.S. has between 18.6 percent and 19.8 percent of Japanese robots compared to 21.7 percent in 1981 and 24.1 percent in 1980.

Assembly robots play a major role in Japan representing 19.1 percent of installations compared to the miniscule 1.2 percent in the U.S.

Exports represented 14.2 percent of total value of Japanese robots in 1982 compared to 5.7 percent in 1981, 2.6 percent in 1980 and 1.9 percent in 1979.

The number of Japanese robot manufacturers has risen almost steadily from 10 in 1968 to 50 in 1970, 120 in 1976, 140 in 1979, 150 in 1980, and 190 in 1981. There is no sign of a shakeout yet.

MITI, having identified robot production as a major strategic industry for Japan's future, undertook several measures to popularize their utilization. MITI permitted a company that installed a robot to allocate 13 percent of its initial purchase price in the first year as extra depreciation in addition to ordinary depreciation. With MITI encouragement, at least, if not direction, a robot leasing company, Japan Robot Lease, (JAROL) was founded. MITI has also arranged for direct government low interest loans to small and medium scale manufacturers to encourage robot installation, for processes deemed to be dangerous for human labor.

Like most governments in Western Europe and the U.S., MITI is subsidizing R&D robot projects although the actual amounts are quite small. It has depended largely on the private companies not only to develop the direction and scale of production, but also the undertake R&D.

What distinguishes MITI has been its effectiveness in creating projects in which a large number of competitive robot manufacturers and companies in related fields cooperate and contribute researchers to study common problems. Thus, Japanese robot manufacturers maintain simultaneously intensely competitive and highly cooperative relationships without fear of prosecution under the Anti-Monopoly Law.

As the Spokesman for the Long Term Credit Bank of Japan confidently put it: "It is only a matter of time before the industrial robot becomes one more piece of merchandise which symbolizes Japan."●

HOMER POST: 1888–1983

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, Homer died last week.

To hundreds of former students of Lincoln High School in Tacoma, Wash., that was not too surprising because he was, after all, 95 years old. But it was sad because he had done so much for so many of us.

Homer was what we all called him, those of us fortunate enough to pass his journalism class and become a part of the staff of the Lincoln News. He was, formally, Homer Post; former INS reporter, English department faculty member and adviser to the school paper. What he seemed to be was an archetypical city editor—even though his circulation was only a large high school and his domain was a World War II portable called "the shack."

What Homer really was, was a magnificent teacher. He knew his stuff—so he taught us how to do it right. What made him special to all of us was his enthusiasm. For him, the Lincoln News was vitally important. That made it important to us. And that made working on the paper very special. In our adolescent search for independent and adult responsibility, it was something real. It counted.

Our successes met with praise.

Failures crashed around our ears. Homer expected you to do it right when everyone else seemed to assume you were not ready yet. What a sense of pride grew from his confidence in you. And when sometimes you did not measure up, that is when you knew for sure he took you seriously, because he treated you like an adult: you have never been chewed out until you have been worked over by Homer.

The end result was a high school newspaper that won national awards—the very top ones—consistently for over 20 years. But that was more Homer's reward. He really valued being No. 1 in the Nation year after year. Our reward was to have him entrust to us the responsibility for keeping that previous string of successes going.

We, his former students, are spread all over. He was forced by an arbitrary "out at 65" rule to retire in 1953, so even the youngest of us who worked on his staff (how different than thinking of it as "taking his class")—even the youngest of us are pushing 50.

Homer was alert and active right to the last. That is reason for joy. My wife (another staffer) and I had a long visit with him and his wife, Laura, last year when he was 94. We read parts of a personal history he had started writing.

What Homer's passing brings to mind more than sadness is gratitude: thanks that I could be a part of his "staff"—that gangling group of acned adolescents that traipsed through nearly 30 years of his life—learning immensely about the world and then moving on out into it. Most us use something we learned from Homer everyday. That is a kind of immortality not many of us will achieve. And it is a cause for celebration.

Goodbye, Homer. And thank you.●

AMERICA'S CUP RACES

HON. FERNAND J. ST GERMAIN

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, as a lifelong resident of Rhode Island who has always believed that Newport and the America's Cup races fit together like hand in glove, I cannot help but feel a twinge of sorrow at this year's break in tradition—the first time the United States lost the America's Cup to the Australians.

I am sure that many people will stop and reflect today at the news of Australia II taking the coveted trophy away from Liberty. It is a milestone, a change in tradition. But, a disappointment? The result of unfair tactics? An undeserving win? Not on your life. Our Australian friends have been joining us in this good natured competition for years. In fact, their first try at the Cup was in 1962. That year the American entry was the Weatherly and the Australian entry was the Gretel. President Kennedy and I along with many others viewed the race from the deck of the Navy destroyer, the Joseph P. Kennedy. Even then, the "Aussies" gave us a run for our money—they won the second race by 47 seconds, marking the first time in almost 30 years that the United States lost a race—and good naturedly congratulated us when we won the series.

The Australians have shown great tenacity over the years. And when we won the cup, time and time again, they showed great sportmanship and diplomacy—time and time again.

Indeed, it is too bad that Liberty was unable to defend the cup against Australia II. But, if we had to lose, I, along with a host of Americans, am glad it was to our deserving Australian friends. After all these years of hard work, they have earned the right to take the cup home with them. I am sure my colleagues join me in extending the warmest congratulations to both skippers—John Bertrand of Australia, and Dennis Connor of the New York Yacht Club—and to both crews. All parties involved should be commended for showing outstanding seamanship.●

ANNA F. SULLIVAN, PIONEER IN THE LABOR MOVEMENT AND WESTERN MASSACHUSETTS' FIRST LADY OF LABOR

HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, the working people of Massachusetts and many of the State's present and former public officials have lost a great supporter with the death last week of Anna F. Sullivan of Holyoke, former manager of the Holyoke Joint Board of the Textile Workers Union of America.

Once described at a testimonial dinner as Western Massachusetts' First Lady of Labor, Anna Sullivan went to work in the Holyoke silk mills of William Skinner & Sons at age 14 after the turn of the century. She was an early pioneer in the labor movement in Massachusetts, getting her start as a member of the weavers union in 1932. Later she helped to form the Textile Workers Union at the Skinner Silk Mill and in 1936 she was elected secretary of the local.

She was manager of the Holyoke Joint Board of the Textile Workers Union, which included Greater Springfield, from 1944 to 1966. She was manager of the Berkshire Joint Board in Pittsfield from 1958 until 1966. She also helped to form the first Congress of Industrial Organization Union in western Massachusetts, and later was an organizer for the national staff of the CIO.

Anna Sullivan was a representative for the Springfield office of the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination from 1966 until her retirement in October 1972. She was an active member of the political committee of the Springfield-Chicopee-Westfield Labor Council and political director on the board of directors of the Springfield Chapter of the American Red Cross. She was a member of the War Manpower Commission from 1941 to 1945, the Western Massachusetts Office of Price Administration from 1941 to 1945 and the rent control board from 1946 to 1952.

Anna Sullivan was the Democratic nominee for the First Congressional District in 1950, and was a close personal friend of President John Fitzgerald Kennedy.

She was an active member and director of the Springfield Orchestra Association, the Holyoke Community Chest and the Visiting Nurses Association of Holyoke.

Mr. Speaker, Anna Sullivan was a great and gracious lady and a close personal friend of mine for many years. I want to extend on behalf of the Massachusetts congressional delegation our profound sympathy to the members of her family.

I also ask permission to have included with my remarks an editorial on Anna Sullivan printed in the Springfield Sunday Republican on September 25:

The article follows:

ANNA SULLIVAN LABOR PIONEER

When Anna F. (Burns) Sullivan went to work in a Holyoke mill at the age of 14, the 20th Century was also still in its teens.

When she became actively interested in the labor movement in 1932, the nation found itself in the depths of the Great Depression.

When she helped to organize the Textile Workers Union at Holyoke's William Skinner & Son mill in 1936 and became its secretary, she was firmly established in the labor movement.

When she died in Holyoke Thursday at the age of 79, she left behind an impressive record in the movement as well as in the community at large.

In recent decades of her long and productive life Mrs. Sullivan was referred to as "Western Massachusetts' first lady of labor," an unofficial title of respect and admiration that she had earned by her dedicated service to the movement.

She helped to form the first Congress of Industrial Organizations union in Western Massachusetts, and later became an organizer for the national staff of the CIO.

From 1944 to 1966 she was manager of the Holyoke Joint Board of Textile Workers, for a region that included Greater Springfield, and she was manager of the Berkshire Joint Board in Pittsfield from 1958 until its end in 1966.

Among her other labor affiliations, she was a member of the political committee of the Springfield-Chicopee-Westfield Labor Council.

Her legendary stamina and energy was also directed to the War Manpower Commission from 1941 to 1945, the Western Massachusetts Office of Price Administration from 1941 to 1945 and the Rent Control Board from 1946 to 1952. In 1950 she was an unsuccessful candidate for Congress.

She was a representative for the Springfield Office of the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination from 1966 until her retirement in 1972. She was a director of the Springfield Orchestra Association, the Holyoke Community Chest and the Visiting Nurses Association of Holyoke.

Mrs. Sullivan grew up with the labor movement in Western Massachusetts, and was a major influence in labor's hard-won struggle.

The 1950s-era photo published along with her obituary in The Morning Union carries a union "bug"—a logo identifying the photographic print as the product of a union worker. Of course.●

TRIBUTE TO SPECIAL AGENT RAUL G. SALINAS

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. ORTIZ. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to bring to the attention of this body a special agent of the FBI who recently received the Attorney General's Certificate of Award during the Department of Justice's Hispanic Heritage Week. Raul G. Salinas was recognized for devoting the past 8 years of his life in carrying out the mission of his Department and for his special contributions in furthering the goals of the Department's Hispanic employment program.

Special Agent Salinas of Alice, Tex., is currently the host of the FBI's "Platicando Con El FBI," Spanish radio program. This program is broadcast by 65 Spanish radio stations throughout the United States. Not only has he discussed and featured topics about the duties and responsibilities of the Bureau, but he has also been a leading voice on the airwaves regarding the dangers of drugs to the Hispanic community.

Another project that has consumed the time and energy of Mr. Salinas has been his leadership of the Hispanic recruitment program for the FBI. Due to his untiring efforts, our Nation now boasts having approximately 300 Hispanic FBI agents among its 7,800 members. In fact, the Texas Legislature passed a resolution in May honoring Special Agent Salinas' dedication in doubling the number of Hispanic agents since 1978.

Raul Salinas has certainly left an important imprint on our national conscience. His work in promoting the advancement of Hispanics through law enforcement and active involvement in our democratic process serves as an inspiration to us all. He continues to instill pride in the heritage of the Hispanic and personifies the valuable role of Hispanics in American life.●

SHULTZ-KELLEY PHOTOGRAPH

HON. GUY V. MOLINARI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, a number of my colleagues have recently asked me to explain the details of what happened last week regarding the Associated Press photograph of Secretary of State George Shultz and Marine Corps Commandant, Gen. P. X. Kelley, testifying before the Foreign Affairs Committee, that ran in many newspapers across the country.

My intention now is to let my colleagues know just what happened.

Like many other Americans, I saw the picture of Secretary Shultz covering his eyes as Commandant Kelley spoke next to him. The caption under the picture indicated that Shultz was reacting to Commandant Kelly's reference to troops who were sent to "Vietnam a year ago." Kelley quickly corrected himself to say "into Lebanon." The impression given was that the Secretary was reacting in disbelief to the general's statement.

I discussed the photo with one of my staff members that morning. He stated that he had seen a videotape of the incident on a morning news show and that he did not believe that the Secretary's motions with his hands were related to the Kelley remark. I called on a colleague on the Foreign Affairs Committee who was present at the hearing and he gave me the same impression.

I spoke on the House floor soon thereafter, pointing out the incorrect description given the picture.

I called the Associated Press bureau in Washington. They told me that they stood by the photograph.

A member of my staff contacted CBS-TV News in New York and in Washington in an attempt to obtain a copy of the videotape. He explained that I believed the photo caption was in error.

We then arranged to view the tape of the hearing at the C-Span studio. At the relevant point in the hearing, the camera was only on General Kelley so it could not be determined when the Secretary raised his hands. There was, however, no audible reactions to the Kelley misstatement.

On Thursday, the CBS Evening News ran a story on the photo, showing a videotape of the incident and strongly implying that the photo caption was misleading. At 2:17 Friday morning, Associated Press transmitted a corrective story to all its member newspapers stating that the photo carried a misleading caption and asked them to run a story saying so. The Associated Press stated:

> The tape showed Shultz rubbing his eyes in what might have been a gesture of weariness rather than the reaction to Kelley implied in the caption.

I commend the Associated Press for running a corrective bulletin. The two newspapers I initially saw the photo in, the New York Times and the Washington Post, ran corrective stories. The Times also stated that it had contacted Associated Press on Wednesday to verify the validity of the photo.

Today, I hope there is no misunderstanding of this photograph. The original photo caption did a major disservice to Commandant Kelley and millions of newspaper readers. Now the error has been corrected as best as possible. Unfortunately, the best effort to correct the mistake cannot erase the impressions that were created by the original photo caption.

I would hope that responsible people in the media will take all possible precautions to prevent an incident of this type from happening again. While I believe that most reporters do present the news in a fair manner, this incident shows the difference a few seconds can make regarding the interpretation of a news photograph.●

ZILDJIAN DAY

HON. GERRY E. STUDDS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Speaker, it is rare that I have the pleasure of celebrating the 360th anniversary of anything, let alone a family-owned business in my congressional district, so I am particularly happy to congratulate the Avedis Zildjian Co., the world's foremost cymbal manufacturer and the second oldest company continuously owned by the same family. While the company now makes its home in Norwell, Mass., I am afraid I cannot claim it as a native industry. The Zildjian Co. had its start in Constantinople in 1623, when an alchemist named Avedis first discovered the still-secret formula used to make the famous Zildjian cymbals.

I congratulate the Zildjian Co. not simply on its longevity, but also on the quality of its work. Zildjian is not just the sole American cymbal-maker, but it is the chosen cymbal of the world's most famous percussionists. Zildjian's combination of modern technology and age-old tradition is unique, and through this combination the company has remained in the forefront of percussion music. I congratulate the Zildjian family on the 360th anniversary of the founding of this special company.●

SEC'S LICENSE TO STEAL

HON. DONALD J. PEASE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, another blow has been struck in the name of deregulation by the administration. The Securities and Exchange Commission last week repealed a rule that had required corporate executives to disclose to their stockholders how and how much executives were being compensated with nonsalary perquisites. While executives may have previously felt some compunction to report their chauffeured transportation, exclusive country club memberships, or other company-paid executive fringe compensation, the SEC, in the interest of saving money, has done away with the rule and replaced it with a ceiling on perks. Executives can now receive no more than 10 percent of their salary in perks, or $25,000, whichever is less.

It is wonderful how deregulation always saves money. It just matters whose money you are saving. Is the $25,000 a ceiling? Or is it more likely a new floor for executive perks?

Mr. Speaker, adoption of this new rule is another example of the anti-consumer attitude of this President and his appointees. I find it pathetic that a stockholder will not even be entitled to know precisely how executives are compensated in the company whose stock he holds.

And given the President's frequent admonition that the public themselves should be allowed to decide a given issue, I am distressed that the SEC could not have simply changed the rule to allow a company's stockholders the right to vote on whether or not they felt it necessary to have the disclosure. Killing disclosure entirely and replacing it with a floor will probably turn out to be entirely counter-productive to the SEC's professed intentions.

If my colleagues have not already read the Washington Post's financial section Monday morning column by Jerry Knight, I am inserting it for their information. The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 26, 1983]

SEC Deregulation Gives Top Brass a License To Steal

(By Jerry Knight)

In the name of deregulation, the Securities and Exchange Commission last Thursday gave corporate executives a license to steal.

You can pad your paycheck with perquisites and you don't have to tell the stockholders, unless the freebies add up to more than 10 percent of your pay, the SEC decided.

Country club dues, a corporate hideaway, a company car or any little fringe benefit you can finagle can be yours and the folks who invested in the company will never know, the commission told Wall Street. Disclosure rules in effect since 1978 were canceled, effective immediately.

We're not doing this to save executives the embarrassment of having their off-the-books benefits disclosed to the stockholders, the five SEC members chorused unanimously. We're doing this to save money for the company and to save time for investors.

Think of how much money businesses have wasted telling stockholders about the extracurricular benefits paid to executives. All the wear and tear on adding machines to total up the club dues, the chauffeur's salary, the monthly Mercedes payments. To say nothing of the outrageous cost of shrinking those numbers into flea-size type and hiding them amongst the footnotes in reports to stockholders. Think of how much time stockholders wasted reading those footnotes.

By the logic of the SEC, the untold hundreds of dollars saved by not disclosing details of executive compensation will no doubt be invested in capital equipment, new factories and new research that eventually will trickle down into jobs for unemployed. (If you believe that, I've got a supply-side tax cut to sell you.)

The sad reality is that any piddling savings from weakening the reporting requirements will be more than offset by the new perquisites that are likely to be paid as the result of the new policy.

Anyone who understands the workings of regulations knows what happens when the government establishes a threshold for the enforcement of any rule—all the action tends to take place right outside the door.

By requiring companies to report executive fringe benefits that amount to more than 10 percent of cash compensation (or $25,000 a year, which ever is less), the SEC has created a free fire zone. Anything up to 10 percent is unreported, unregulated and usually untaxed.

Back in the days when perks had to be reported to the stockholders, many executives hesitated to ask for them. Board members and top management understand that a lot of stockholders resent imperial executives.

It doesn't look good to give an interest-free mortgage to a $100,000-a-year vice president, to subsidize country club dues for people who can afford to pay their own greens fees or to lease a Lincoln for the boss.

As even the five SEC members must understand, any disincentive for digression was destroyed by the 10 percent threshold. The threshold becomes a ceiling for unreported income. The first 10 percent is free. You can drive a mighty long gravy train through that loophole.

Executives of the old Auto-Train Corp. got away with giving themselves a private railroad car as a perk back in the days before the Carter administration demanded disclosure of freebies.

Perks weren't what derailed Auto-Train, but they certainly were a symptom of its problems. Investors began to lose faith in the management of the railroad when someone leaked information about the private car, the Mercedes and the Jaguar provided the president and the condominium in Florida shared by the top brass. The people who wound up holding worthless Auto-Train stock might not have invested in the company if they'd known how high on the hog the executives were eating.

The Auto-Train affair ought to show the SEC members they are wrong if they think that allowing executives to hide their fringe benefits is going to help avoid scandals. If anything, it will create more petty backbiting about the propriety of particular prerequisites. Dirty little leaks will replace routine disclosure. The corporate gadflies will feast on the droppings.

Disclosure of compensation keeps executives honest. It discourages dubious expenditures, holds down costs and increases profits. It provides investors with valuable information about a company's management. What better arguments could there be for continuing to require disclosure?

Surely the cost of reporting compensation cannot outweigh these benefits.

Disregarding the deterrent effect of disclosure, the SEC action ignores the principle that stockholders should be given as much information as possible so they can make intelligent investment decisions. So as democracy depends on an informed electorate, Wall Street depends on informed investors.

The SEC decision to let companies hide perks from their shareholders is a telling commentary on the Reagan administration's regard for the public's right to know.●

THE RESIDENTIAL RENTAL UNIT CONVERSION MORATORIUM AND TENANTS ASSISTANCE ACT

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced an important piece of legislation which will have a significant impact on stabilizing the multiunit housing market, the Residential Rental Unit Conversion Moratorium and Tenants Assistance Act. Each year for the past decade thousands of families have been displaced because of the rampant conversion of rental housing to private ownership. While conversion in and of itself is not innately harmful, the effects that the uncontrolled conversion has on many of our citizens are.

In a housing market where interest rates and the purchase costs are prohibitively high, a middle-income wage earner has little hope of homeownership. The only alternative is to rent. However, runaway conversions of rental units to private ownership drastically cuts into the rental market. This has two detrimental effects. First, the supply of rental units become extremely scarce. This is pointed out by the surprising low vacancy rates in our urban centers. For example, New York City has a vacancy rate of only 2.1 percent and Los Angeles has a rate of merely 1.6 percent. The second effect is that the rental scarcity artificially drives up the cost of housing and prices middle to low income wage earners out of the market. I believe that it is about time for the Federal Government to intervene on behalf of these displaced citizens and assist them, through the localities, to find proper housing.

The legislation which I have introduced today has three provisions. First, the bill would impose a 3-year moratorium on the conversion of residential rental units to residential units offered for sale. Second, it would authorize the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to establish a commission to investigate and make recommendations pertaining to the problems inherent in conversions. And third, the bill would also call for the authorization of $10 million to fund a grant program adminstered by the Secretary of HUD. This would enable municipalities to assist individuals in locating appropriate housing, and to develop local strategies in dealing with low vacancy rates where there is high demand.

Mr. Speaker, I welcome any comments or suggestions that any of my colleagues may have regarding to this legislation, and I welcome their support of it.●

MARIA TERRY

HON. JULIAN C. DIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, while Members of Congress are often praised or lauded for their work in this Chamber, the truth remains that this institution would grind to a halt without the behind the scenes work of those individuals who work for the U.S. House of Representatives.

I make this observation, because this week my Executive Secretary, who has been very special to my work in Congress is leaving my staff to return to California. Maria Terry has, in fact, worked for me some 11 years, dating back to my days as a member of the California State Assembly. She has been a loyal and trusted employee and a friend whose presence will be greatly missed.

Maria's trademark has always been her good cheer and positive spirit, and she has made many warm friendships during almost 5 years here in Washington, D.C. From constituents to Capitol Hill Police Officers, Maria made the Dixon office a friendlier place. So often, people in Los Angeles have remarked on how helpful our office was in making their visit special, and almost always Maria's name would be mentioned.

I am also grateful to Maria for her ability to somehow organize the chaos of Congress, even on those days when both subcommittees met simultaneously, an important bill was on the floor, the phones were ringing off the hook, and a high school group was waiting in my office; Maria's spirits never dampened.

Mr. Speaker, I have been fortunate to have had the opportunity to work with Maria for more than a decade, and in behalf of her many friends I extend our best wishes for her future success as she begins a new chapter in San Diego, Calif.●

A TRIBUTE TO JAZZ GREAT JOHNNY HARTMAN

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay homage to the life and contributions of a truly great American musician, Johnny Hartman.

One rarely takes the liberty of going to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to laud the contributions of an entertainer, but I take this occasion, Mr. Speaker, because the life of Johnny Hartman was not just one of an entertainer. It was more the life of one who was an ambassador.

His music was felt in the hearts of so many people in America, Japan, England, Australia, and Germany. He brought them not only his great talents, but also the beauty of many great artists such as Earl Hines, Dizzy Gillespie, John Coltrane, and Billy Taylor. His voice was one instrument in the symphony of jazz, which is no longer just an American art, but a universal one.

Johnny Hartman's talents have been recognized by the most prestigious music honorariums, including the Grammy nomination for the best jazz vocal performer in 1981, and the best male vocalist at the New York Jazz Awards in 1980. Although he was born in Louisiana and raised in Chicago, we in New York have taken him as our own because he chose to reside among us in the "music capital of the world." Indeed, he chose to reside in my congressional district in Harlem, which we like to believe is the "soul capital of America."

It would be enough to mourn his death in terms of how music has lost one of its greats, and also in terms of what his loss means to his beloved wife Theodora and his children. But it is strange how everyone who knew him—and those who did not—feel that more than anything else, we have lost a good friend of the community. And so, Mr. Speaker, I want his family to know that while he is missed at home, in Harlem, and in New York City, we in Congress and the Nation as a whole will miss the contributions that Johnny Hartman continuously made.

Fortunately for us, his memory and the songs will continue to be with us.●

TO COMMEND THE COMMUNITY SERVICES DEPARTMENT OF SAN BERNARDINO

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I am sure my colleagues remember the Colorado flooding disaster which seriously afflicted my district in California as well as the six surrounding States. I would like to take this opportunity to commend a most effective emergency relief team, the Community Services Department of San Bernardino County, for their efforts regarding the Colorado River emergency relief program.

It is indeed comforting to know that in the event of a disaster, such as the Colorado River flood crisis, that there are such competent and efficient people to take charge of an emergency situation. The management and staff of the Community Services Department of San Bernardino County should be recognized for their tireless hours of participation in the Colorado River emergency relief program. Mr. Speaker, I take great pride in commending to my colleagues the individuals who were a part of this important project and they are: Rodolfo H. Castro, Patricia L. Nickols, Sandra Brown, Kethy A. Kivley, Marvel Killins, Pauline Duncanson, Maria Juarez, Joan Hunsaker, Susan Campos, Charles Adams, Jr., Ed Castillo, Maxine Hickman, Bobbie Thompson, Zenaida V. Ortega, Jenny Alvarado, and Mary Dominguez.

I am also inserting in the RECORD a copy of a letter that discusses CSD's role in providing emergency services during the Colorado River flood crisis. I know their efforts and service were a tremendous help to the victims in the Colorado River area.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA GOVERNORS'S OFFICE, OFFICE OF ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY, Sacramento, Calif., July 5, 1983.

RODOLFO CASTRO,

Executive Director, Community Services Development of San Bernardino County, San Bernardino, Calif.

DEAR MR. CASTRO: The State Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) wishes to express it's gratitude to your agency for your quick response and staff participation in it's Colorado River Emergency Relief Program.

As a result of the meeting held here in the OEO Southern Region Office, on July 1, 1983, we will be able to provide possible flood victims in the Colorado River area with emergency assistance in the immediate future.

Thank you for your cooperation. We look forward to working with you on this joint project.

Sincerely,

RICHARD M. TAFOYA,

Southern Region Manager.●

FEDERAL COURT SYSTEM REFORM

HON. DON SUNDQUIST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 27, 1983

● Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, after reviewing the results of my recent questionnaire I learned that the residents of my district overwhelmingly prefer tougher crime measures and support a review of Federal judges after a 10- or 15-year tenure. For this reason, I am introducing two pieces of legislation today, aimed at reforming our Federal court system.

The first bill amends the Constitution of the United States relative to the appointment and tenure of Federal judges below the level of the Supreme Court. Currently, Federal judges are appointed to life terms contingent only on good behavior. This practice makes it almost impossible to remove judges from the bench. When the Constitution was written, it was intended that such procedures would allow judges to remain impartial and insulated from political pressure. In recent years, however, the judiciary has begun to vastly expand its role in policymaking. The current system of judicial tenure has made it almost impossible to terminate the judgeship of poor appointees or those who overstep the bounds of their intended role.

The ultimate goal of this and all similar proposals is to achieve balance between the principles of judicial independence and the accountability of public officials. The Constitution bases our Government on a system of checks and balances. However, it is impossible to enforce this idea in a judicial system with life tenure. This bill proposes to achieve a reasonable balance by providing fixed terms for Federal judges with provisions for reappointment. It is hoped that this will allow the judiciary to maintain its independence while introducing a reasonable and appropriate degree of accountability into the system.

An important effect of this legislation will be to make Federal judges accountable for their attempts at judicial activism. At the present time, they are the only public officials who are not accountable to any constituency. This is especially dangerous now that the judiciary has begun to try to expand their role to include policymaking. This was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution and several judges have flagrantly overstepped the bounds of their authority in this area. An examination of specific cases shows the detrimental effects of this situation:

In 1981, an 8th Circuit Court of Appeals Judge reversed the decision of a jury which unanimously convicted a man of robbery and assault in 1973. The assailant, five years after his trial and conviction, objected to the composition of the jury during his trial. Because witnesses could not be assembled so many years after the crime, the man was not retried and was set free.

In 1975 a man committed and was convicted of three counts of robbery with a deadly weapon. Two years later, he appealed his conviction claiming ineffective counsel. Both the lower state court and the Missouri Supreme Court ruled against his motion. But in 1980, the criminal filed a writ of habeas corpus in federal district court. After a full evidentiary hearing the Judge dismissed the petition. However, the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals accepted the appeal and contrary to the lower state and federal courts, decided the man was denied effective counsel and released him.

It is clear from these facts and many other examples that we must provide some mechanism in our judicial system that will make judges accountable for actions such as these.

This legislation will also lead to judicial accountability in sentencing. At the present time, a great amount of disparity in sentencing exists. Two persons convicted of the same crime can receive greatly varying sentences. In a study involving 50 Federal judges and 20 actual cases, the extent to which disparity exists was revealed. In one case involving extortion and income tax violations, sentences ranged from 20 years and $65,000 fine to only 3 years in prison. Disparities such as these are often the result of the gross leniency practiced by some of our Federal judges.

This proposal will make judges accountable for their actions by limiting their tenure. This would facilitate their removal from office if necessary. The House of Representatives has voted the Articles of Impeachment for only nine Federal judges, the most recent being Halstead L. Ritter in 1936. Clearly, this indicates that judges in recent history have not been held accountable for their decisions. In light of the new judicial activism, it is a cause of great concern to others like myself who believe that no public official should have such freedom to make decisions without some mechanism for accountability. Limited tenure will help to insure that judges do not overstep the bounds of their constitutionally prescribed powers.

Although this proposal may seem radical, and examination of relevant facts shows that this is not the case. During a 1972 hearing on a similar bill, Senator BYRD presented evidence, which is still current for 1983, showing that only 3 of the 50 States provide no fixed term for State judges; the other 47 have limited tenure. It was also noted that most of these 47 States had made changes to the present arrangement based on prior unsatisfactory experience with life tenure. At the present time, 2 of the 3 States that have no fixed term, Massachusetts and New Hampshire, have a retirement age of 70. Only Rhode Island has life tenure for its State judges. They can, however, be removed from office by a vote of the State legislature. These statistics would seem to indicate that the proposed legislation is not as radical as it first appears and that it is in keeping with current widespread trends in America.

If we in the legislature want to preserve the credibility of our Federal court system, we must act now to make the necessary changes. My proposal to provide set terms for Federal judges with provisions for reappointment insures a degree of accountability. It guarantees that we can review the performance of our judges to see if their decisions follow societal norms. We will no longer be forced to suffer the dictates of a judge who oversteps the bounds of judicial authority. The basis of our system of justice will once again be founded in the people and not in the whims of an uncontrolled Federal judge.

Along with this legislation, I am also introducing a bill to establish sentencing guidelines in the Federal courts. This is one of a number of measures proposed to eliminate sentencing disparities throughout the Federal court system.

As I have already mentioned, judges today are given a great deal of latitude when sentencing convicts. This latitude has resulted in widely varying sentences for persons convicted of similar crimes. When the current laws were written, the broad sentencing guidelines were intended to allow judges to choose a sentence which fit the individual circumstances of each case. The result has been that judges use this latitude to shape sentences to their own personal definition of justice.

The goal of this measure is to eliminate inconsistencies that occur from court to court and to promote justice and certainty in sentencing. This is to be achieved through a system of guidelines that prescribe sentences dependent upon the history of the defendant and the nature of the crime. The guidelines would be submitted periodically by a Committee on Sentencing established within the Judicial Conference of the United States. After submission, the Congress would have 180 days to act before the guidelines took effect.

These guidelines would be in keeping with current trends in America. Many States now have mandatory sentencing in a number of forms. Forty-three have laws providing mandatory sentences for persons convicted of violent crimes—murder, rape, and so forth. Mandatory sentences for narcotics and firearm offenses are also common. Thirty-seven States have mandatory prison terms for certain violations of gun laws and 29 have them for certain drug offenders. In addition, mandatory prison terms exist in 30 States for career or habitual offenders. As these figures indicate, a move toward "fixed" or "determinate" sentencing is occurring across the country.

Similar guidelines have recently been instituted in the State of Maryland. This was done with the near-unanimous support of judges at the annual meeting of the State's Judicial Conference. The current use of guidelines throughout the State is the culmination of a 2-year pilot project in selected areas. The most important point to note is that the program was initiated by the judges themselves. The Maryland State judges like many others around the country have recognized the need to correct the inequities in sentencing that exist in our criminal justice system.

An important impact of this legislation would be the clarification of our sentencing goals. A lack of goal clarification is the cause of many sentencing disparities. In effect, criminal justice is administered by men not by an act encompassing norms.

The goals of sentencing take several diverse forms. Rehabilitation—reforming offenders through treatment and corrective measures aimed at making them productive citizens—usually brings more lenient sentences. However, the effectiveness of rehabilitation has been questioned. A survey of over 200 studies on this subject showed little reason to believe that rehabilitation programs reduce the number of repeat offenders. The more utilitarian goals tend to carry harsher sentences with them. Such goals would be general deterrence imposing penalties that are severe enough to discourage others from committing similar crimes; special deterrence—imposing penalties severe enough to discourage the offender from committing any more crimes; and incapacitation—removing an offender from society so that he cannot commit additional crimes. By clarifying the goals of our criminal justice system, sentencing guidelines that meet their needs can be instituted rather than forcing the disparate minds of the Federal judiciary to make personal value judgments on which goals and sentences are appropriate.

This legislation also deals with the question of the Parole Commission. At the present time, parole boards have a great deal of influence over the length of time a criminal spends in prison. Prisoners can appeal their sentences to the Parole Commission to have them shortened. Critics, however, point to the fact that parole boards are even further removed from the crime than the judge which could impair their ability to weigh the facts of the case. In addition, the ability of a parole board to predict the future behavior of prisoners is called into question. In a study on parole decisions in New York State over a typical 5-year period, half of all those let out on parole either commit a crime or violate parole rules. After considering these facts, it seems clear that our Federal judges could do a better job of handling the problems that arise with a prisoner's sentence than the Parole Commission.

This bill provides greater certainty in sentencing which will lead to greater deterrence of crime. Although this is not the ultimate solution to the crime problem, it is certainly a step in the right direction.

I invite my colleagues to support these bills in an effort to begin to eliminate the inconsistencies and upgrade the quality of our Federal court system.●

SENATE—Wednesday, September 28, 1983

(Legislative day of Monday, September 26, 1983)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable ROGER W. JEPSEN, a Senator from the State of Iowa.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Every kingdom divided against itself is laid waste, and no city or house divided against itself will stand.—Matthew 12: 25.

Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!—Psalm 133: 1.

Gracious Father in heaven, as the Senate faces the heavy responsibility of decision concerning a very critical and potentially divisive matter, we invoke Thy presence, Thy wisdom, Thy love, and Thy power upon this House and in the heart of each Member. Strong and eloquent words have been spoken out of deep conviction. Grant dear God, when the vote is taken and the decision finalized, that the outcome will not weaken our unity as a government and as a people. We pray this in the name of Him whose mission was to unite all things. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., September 28, 1983.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable ROGER W. JEPSEN, a Senator from the State of Iowa, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. JEPSEN thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the majority leader is recognized for not to exceed 2 minutes.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the reason for the abbreviated leader time this morning is so we can get a running start on the war powers resolution debate. I will take that 2 minutes only to outline the situation as I see it.

Senate Joint Resolution 159 is pending. I hope that we can finish that resolution today, but I doubt it. The statutory time, according to the interpretation of the Parliamentarian, will expire at 2 p.m. on Thursday, tomorrow.

Mr. President, time is under the control of the two leaders or their designees and shall be equally divided by the provisions of the statute.

Mr. President, I am afraid I cannot give any further report than that. Let me remind Senators, however, those who are listening in their offices and otherwise, that this week still is a doozy. The Official Reporters and the Public Printer may have difficulty with that word, and I leave it to them to define the spelling.

But, Mr. President, the business that must follow on after the war powers resolution is extraordinary. We have a continuing resolution to deal with before midnight on Friday, the beginning of the new fiscal year. I am advised that the House will send us the CR sometime today, probably late today; too late for us to take it up during this session day.

We must also do the unemployment benefits extension bill. It would be the intention of the leadership on this side to try very hard to get a short time limitation on that measure and to do it in advance of the CR, since it, too, expires at midnight on Friday. We simply must do that. I believe it is available.

Mr. President, in addition to that, if we receive a conference report on revenue sharing on the extension of the revenue-sharing program—and there is a good hope that we may—it would be the intention of the leadership to ask the Senate to turn to the consideration of that conference report, because the authority for revenue sharing, which affects virtually every city and county in the country, expires at midnight on Friday.

So it is going to be a busy time, Mr. President. Before we convened, my friend and colleague, the minority leader, asked if I thought we were going to be in on Saturday, which is a question of great importance, especially on Wednesday when people have begun to make their final plans. And my reply, unfortunately, was, "I don't know." I do not know how we are going to avoid it because what I have just outlined is potentially very time consuming.

But, Mr. President, let me say this. If we can finish these items, clearly we will not be in on Saturday. But, in order to finish them, we are going to have to deal with the CR, the continuing resolution, very promptly, and that means we are going to have to do so without yielding to temptation to amend it in any significant degree.

CR's have traditionally been Christmas trees lately. We cannot do that and expect to be out of here on Friday. I hope that we could get a CR out of here very promptly with a minimum of amendments, maybe no amendments at all. This holds true, of course, as to the other two items, as well.

I am asking staff on this side of the aisle to confer with their counterparts on the other side of the aisle, if the minority leader will consent to that, to explore the possibility of time agreements on all or any part of these measures. Then I will have a further report to make on the probability of a Saturday session.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

THE CONTINUING RESOLUTION

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, let me ask the majority leader a couple of questions. Does he have any idea as to what extension date will be in the continuing resolution when it comes over from the House?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do not know with any degree of certainty; however, I do know this. I met yesterday with Congressman MICHEL, the minority leader of the House, and with the ranking minority member of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. CONTE. The impression I had is that the continuing resolution would extend maybe until November 17.

There is some problem with that in the minds of some of our people, and I fully understand it because if we go out on the 18th, which is, I understand, the wish of the Speaker, that means we are going to be right up against it again with only 24 hours to deal with a new CR, if there must be a new CR.

Senator HATFIELD, the chairman of our committee, hopes—and I think realistically—that we can for the first time in a long time do all 13 appropriations bills and not have a CR.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if the continuing resolution comes over from the House with a November 17 date on it and if it is their wish that we adjourn on the 18th, I think that puts the Senate in a corner. I think, if that is the case, we ought to attempt to amend that continuing resolution, that date, so that they cannot put the Senate in a corner.

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President, they do that so very well.

Mr. BAKER. And I agree with that. I have not yet communicated that concern to the House, but I agree with the minority leader. I will consult with Senator HATFIELD, the chairman of the committee, and we will try to do what we can do about that.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I think it is important that we have that extension and that the House understand it, because I think that whether or not we have amendments on the continuing resolution at this point will largely depend upon that date. Because we see ourselves with only 24 hours in which to offer amendments, I think it is unfair for us to be put in that position. Senators would only have the choice then of offering their amendments to this continuing resolution.

It might be that we could avoid some amendments on this continuing resolution if Senators realize they are going to have more than 1 day to offer amendments to the resolution.

Mr. BAKER. If I may do so, may I ask the minority leader if he would be willing to consult with the Speaker and the chairman of the Appropriations Committee in the House on that subject and I will do the same with their counterparts on this side?

Mr. BYRD. I will be happy to do that.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BYRD. I will have my staff work with the majority leader's staff and see if there are any chances of getting agreements on the continuing resolution and on the unemployment insurance bill. But a lot is going to depend on the date we have been discussing.

I think the Senate ought to assert itself and not let ourselves, as we have been for years, just be put into a box by the House. They send over something at the last minute and then they leave. They can do that again. I do not say they do that with malice aforethought because I am not allowed to say that under the rules. But I hope I have stirred up enough interest now in having that date moved up.

I will call the Speaker and confer with him.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I have no more time, but I see the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin on the floor. The time for morning business has already expired.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will advise that under the previous order there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business with statements therein limited to 1 minute each, not to extend beyond 9:40 a.m.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for routine morning business be extended for 3 minutes, if the minority leader does not object.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CIVILIZATION IN SRI LANKA

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, recently, after years of reform and progress, Sri Lanka suddenly fell backwards, tripping into a state of war. They are not at war with some other nation but with themselves. This small country, where respect for human rights seemed to be growing, was the site of a most appalling action: Its majority murderously vented its frustration on a minority.

Reports have called what the Buddhist Sinhalese majority did to the Hindu Tamil minority "the worst ethnic violence since the country's independence in 1948." The antagonism between the two groups is centuries old. The Tamils, who number 3.5 million, have never gotten along all that well with the 12 million Sinhalese majority. But in recent years, a growing sense of tolerance has prevented major outbreaks of violence.

The United Nations hoped to encourage this sense of tolerance when, with enthusiastic U.S. involvement, it drafted the Genocide Convention in 1948. It then seemed reasonable to hope that the diverse nations of the world could agree that the mass slaughter of racial, ethnic, national, or religious groups should be made illegal. But for the current administration, this proposition was reasonable to every President, every Secretary of State, and every Attorney General. Opposition was found only in the Senate.

Mr. President, the ethnic violence in Sri Lanka, as horrible as it is, has brought out the best in some people. Dr. Ahangamage Ariyaratne operates two refugee camps in the Colombo area, which now shelter about 70,000 Tamils. Dr. Ariyaratne laments that: "We have seen a total breakdown of human values * * * I've never seen human suffering on such a scale, despite all of the pains of our history." The glimmer of hope in this situation is that Dr. Ariyaratne, who is risking his life by supporting the camps, is Sinhalese. So are most of the people working in the camps. Their decency, in the midst of horror, is exemplary.

Let us follow their example. I urge my colleagues to reaffirm, our decency and to vote for a treaty which outlaws genocide.

WEAPONS AS BARGAINING CHIPS: THE WRONG WAY TO CHOOSE OUR WEAPONS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, one of the most frequent and effective ploys the Defense Department uses to secure a weapon system for which the military argument is weak is to argue for it as a bargaining chip in arms control. Two of the most flagrant examples of this were the MX missile and binary nerve gas. In both cases the military case was weak. The MX missile is a poor addition to our nuclear deterrent because it is both highly vulnerable and primarily useful as a first-strike weapon. And for this purpose its strongest advocates have consistently denied that we would ever unleash it for that purpose. We have been told repeatedly that we would never institute a first strike against the Soviet Union from our long-range intercontinental missiles. True, we have to date not forsworn the first use of tactical nuclear weapons in Europe such as the neutron bomb in the event the Russians with their vastly superior conventional forces should make a successful blitzkrieg attack on Western Europe, and we might in extremes first employ intermediate range cruise and Pershing missiles, but not the MX which would be located in western United States.

This means the MX would be held in reserve as a deterrent to discourage the Soviets from launching a preemptive first strike against this country. How ridiculous. The Air Force has told the Congress that the Soviets would be able to knock out 99 percent of four land-based missiles with a preemptive first strike. That means the MX would disappear in a preemptive Russian strike. So when we build the MX we will have to make it an effective deterrent—be willing to fire it on warning. And that, Mr. President, is the kind of hair trigger which is most likely to start the holocaust—the third and final world war. That is, by mistake. A false warning, a computer error, and there goes civilization. What makes the MX such an appalling blunder as a military weapon is the fact that the single, truly essential quality of any effective deterrent is that it be survivable, as close to invulnerable as we can get it, so that the U.S.S.R. will know that we can respond to their preemptive strike with a devastating deterrent. Of all our new weapons the MX is the least survivable, landbased, stationary, immobile, the prime sitting duck—with its 10 warheads per missile. It would obviously be the prime target for the Soviet Union and a very inviting target indeed. Why in the world should we sock $20 billion into this MX turkey at a time when we have a truly invulnerable nuclear submarine fleet and a largely invulnerable bomber fleet? The answer: the MX proponents tell us we need the MX as a bargaining chip for the massive and far more numerous Soviet multiwarhead, land-based missiles. Presumably we would eventually build our MX's up to match their land-based missiles and then we would be in a position to agree not to build more if they agreed not to build more. Or after we achieve parity with the Soviets in these Mirv'ed land-based nuclear missiles we would agree to reduce ours if they would reduce theirs. It is hard to understand why any Soviet negotiator would make that agreement. Why would be give up anything to persuade us to eliminate the one and only nuclear weapon we had which the Russians could quickly and easily and surely destroy?

The case for our production of binary chemical munitions is even weaker. Both sides had such weapons in World War II. They were never asked. Why? Was it because Hitler and his generals were humane? Why are we trying to kid? No, it was because retaliation would be sure and swift and first use would achieve no military advantage. Precisely the same case applies today, but much more strongly. Sure, the Soviets may use chemical warfare in Afghanistan against a primitive military operation. Does anyone really believe they would use chemical warfare against an enemy not only equipped with huge supplies of chemical agents but also equipped with a nuclear power which a chemical warfare attack would very likely trigger? So what do we gain by producing our own binary chemical agents for bargaining chip purposes? The Soviets will not use these weapons against us. We know exactly why they will not. For us to spend billions to build a so-called bargaining chip serves no purpose.

Mr. President, Christoph Bertram, the political editor of the German weekly, Die Zeit, wrote an excellent article on this subject that appeared on August 19 in the Washington Post. Mr. Bertram contends that choosing weapons as arms-control bargaining chips is wrong from the standpoint of our NATO alliance. I agree fully. And I add that it is also wrong in developing the most effective deterrent to protect this country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the August 19, 1983, Washington Post to which I have referred be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Friday, Aug. 19, 1983]

(By Christoph Bertram)

THIS IS NO WAY TO CHOOSE OUR WEAPONS

ARMS AND ARMS CONTROL MUST AGAIN BE JUDGED ON THEIR RESPECTIVE MERITS

The agonies that the Western Alliance has experienced to date (and may still have to experience further) as a result of its doubletrack decision 1979—to deploy new missiles in Europe unless negotiations make this unnecessary—are well known. Yet, intriguingly, recent U.S. arms decisions have followed the 1979 example rather than shunning it.

Take two examples. The U.S. Congress has voted for the MX intercontinental missile in the hope that the START negotiations might render deployment superfluous. And the decision to fund production of binary chemical munitions has equally been presented as a contribution less to military security than to arms control.

The argument behind these votes is, indeed, a powerful one: only if the United States and the Alliance demonstrate the willingness to arm, will the Soviet Union agree to arms limitations. In fact, the Reagan administration, sensing the yearning for arms control in the country and in Congress, has discovered that major military programs often receive the necessary political support only if they can be presented as a first step to arms control.

But it is a shortsighted approach both to the task of defining the requirements for defense and the opportunities for arms control. The NATO experience should serve as a warning rather than as an example, for three reasons.

First, by making its own deployment conditional on the outcome of arms negotiations, the Alliance has weakened the military case for its program. It pretended that the rationale was to counter the Soviet SS20 missile, and that once that missile disappeared, so would the rationale for Western nuclear modernization. But the SS20 is only one of the Soviet systems that must concern the West, and the military case for Western modernization would be as strong or as weak even without that weapon. As a result, NATO has never acquired fully credibility with its argument that, militarily, its program is really necessary.

Second, the political staying power of the Alliance, rather than military need, has become the chief argument for sticking to the program. Soviet pressure on European public opinion has been intense, and quite legitimately so; if the Soviet Union can stop Western deployment without paying for this by restraint of its own, it will be a good bargain from the Soviet point of view.

But the result has been to turn the NATO program into a matter of political principle rather than military rationale. Even the more doubtful aspects of the program, such as the highly accurate Pershing II ballistic missile, cannot be abandoned without unpleasant political consequences. Sticking it out has become more important than getting it right.

Third, arms control is less a concept for ordering the military competition between East and West than an escape route from a painful political decision. Today, most of the governments that supported, in 1979, the decision to station new medium-range missiles in Europe look to the Geneva negotiations in the hope that arms control will make the problem somehow go away. For European public opinion, as for many governments, any agreement in Geneva is more important than a good agreement.

The pressure for arms control is thus shaped by political opportunism and not by conceptual concern. The short term threatens to override the long term. Arms control has become a matter of political expediency rather than being a contribution to stabilize military competition between East and West.

Not all these shortcomings will be repeated if the NATO example becomes the Western rule, but many will. To escape them, arms and arms control must again be judged on their respective merits. A bad weapons program—and I consider the MX to fall into this category—will not become a good one merely because it might serve as a bargaining chip in arms control. And bad arms control is not becoming good arms control merely because it limits a bad system. Instead of ending up with sensible arsenals and sensible controls, we could end up with doubtful arsenals and doubtful controls.

There is, therefore, no alternative to the old-fashioned procedure: military requirements must be judged on what is needed militarily, no more and no less. And arms control objectives must be defined on what is needed to control dangerous military competition. At times, both objectives may contradict each other; it is them up to the political authorities to decide where the priority should lie.

To pretend that one can go ahead with questionable military programs because they may lead to desirable arms control means not only to fudge the issue. It is also a disservice to military security and to arms control alike.

FEDERAL SYNTHETIC FUELS PROGRAM

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on September 22 the Wall Street Journal published an editorial entitled "Sinful Subsidies" which reached the conclusion that there is no need for a Federal synthetic fuels program.

The editorial wisely states, "If these energy projects are economical, industry will finance them. If not, taxpayers will be out a lot of money." It further suggests that derailing the synfuels gravy train is a great first step toward reducing the Federal deficit.

The Wall Street Journal is not alone in pointing out the giant loss to the Treasury and waste of taxpayers dollars represented by the activities of the Synthetic Fuels Corporation.

The September issue of Policy Report, published by the CATO Institute contains the article, "Synfuels: The $88 Billion Dollar Mistake" written by Elena Folkerts-Landau. She points out that the Federal program of synthetic fuels subsidies was based on false economic assumptions and that program weaknesses were compounded by bureaucratic ineptitude.

A third recent critique, "Synfuels, No Win Fuels," by Doug Bandow was published on the Op Ed page of the New York Times. He, too, points out the fallacies in our present program of synthetic fuels development.

Mr. President, all three of these pieces reach the same conclusion: The Synthetic Fuels Corporation is a Government agency whose time has passed. While its enormous off-budget expenditures threaten the Treasury with a multibillion-dollar loss, the taxpayers get precious little energy independence in return. In fact, according to a Synthetic Fuels Corporation official, it would cost $150 billion to achieve the Energy Security Act's goal of 2 million barrels per day of synthetic fuels.

At a time when the private sector is fleeing what were supposed to be the most attractive synthetic fuels projects, it is also time for the Congress to take a second look at this bloated and misguided program.

I ask unanimous consent that these three articles be reprinted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SINFUL SUBSIDIES

The nation's first coal-gasification synthetic-fuels plant is now coming on stream in Kingsport, Tenn. The project is on time and on budget. But the really amazing part is that it has been done without a dime of government money.

Tennessee Eastman, a unit of Eastman Kodak, will use the plant to convert about 900 tons of coal a day into chemicals for Kodak film and other plastic products. The project, built by Bechtel, is estimated by industry observers to cost about $300 million and was planned in 1978–1979 on the basis of $12-a-barrel oil; at the current oil price of $29 a barrel, the Kodak project may be highly profitable.

If Kodak can build a profitable, privately financed synfuels project, why does anyone else need government funding? Is there any genuine need for the grossly over-funded federal U.S. Synthetic Fuels Corp. to provide tax dollars for energy projects?

For instance, SFC already has provided $120 million in guarantees for the Cool Water Coal Gasification Project in Daggett, Calif. That project, being built by a consortium led by Texaco, will use a similar coal-gasification technique as the Tennessee Eastman, although it will produce electricity instead of chemicals. Another project getting government help is an oil-shale plant being built by Union Oil near Parachute, Colo. Under a 10-year price-guarantee contract now administered by SFC, the project will supply diesel and aviation fuel for the Defense Department at a floor price of $42.50 a barrel, indexed for inflation.

SFC is eagerly trying to dole out what remains of its $14.9 billion in Phase I appropriations, due to end next June 30, before it can ask Congress for the rest of its $88 billion authorization. It recently signed letters of intent for four projects amounting to about $2.75 billion in loan and price guarantees.

Kodak has found that it can build a synfuels plant without government funds and still turn a profit. Other companies are turning to the federal dole to build their plants, while many major oil companies have simply abandoned synfuels as viable projects despite the availability of SFC monies.

All of this confirms what we thought all along—that there is no need for a federal synfuels program. If these energy projects are economical, industry will finance them. If not, taxpayers will be out a lot of money. If Congress really wants to make a dent in the deficit, here's a good place to start.

SYNFUELS, NO WIN FUELS

(By Doug Bandow)

WASHINGTON.—The Synthetic Fuels Corporation is fast becoming one of the greatest pork barrels in the history of American politics. Although none of its economically senseless projects would survive in the marketplace without subsidization, it cruises serenely ahead almost without opposition, leaving mismanagement and misconduct in its wake.

The Corporation's president, Victor Schroeder, has resigned, and the remaining officers are struggling to explain why they built a sauna in the executive suite, granted 51 consulting contracts without competitive bidding (including one for $21,000 for a six-page memo on communications) and have made only two project awards in three years, despite spending $34.5 million for administration and hiring some 200 employees.

When it was created in 1980—with $20 billion and the promise of $68 billion more—the Corporation was envisioned as the progenitor of a vital industry, and an agency that would work its magic through loan guarantees that would "cost the taxpayer little or nothing," in the words of Edward Noble, the chairman.

Neither the will of Congress nor the pronouncement of President Jimmy Carter, who was waging the "moral equivalent of war," however, could make synthetic fuels cost-effective. Recognizing the poor economics, Exxon dropped out of what was once the nation's most ambitious project, the $5 billion Colony Shale Oil plant in Colorado, and Ashland Oil shelved plans for a multibillion dollar coal-liquefaction plant in Kentucky.

The Corporation has been forced by this bad economic news to alter its funding strategies, which is bad news for taxpayers. Now, Mr. Noble says, the Corporation will work not so much with loan guarantees as with price guarantees, which, like agricultural price supports, will guarantee sales at a profit, no matter what the market price. According to the Corporation, these guarantees will account for $7 billion to $10 billion of the total of $15 billion it will spend on synfuels. It plans—for now, at least—to spend the rest in loan guarantees.

What's a barrel of synthetic fuel going for these days? The Corporation is guaranteeing $67, when a barrel of crude oil can be bought on the spot market for about $30. And even in the unlikely event that the price of crude rises dramatically, the price of synfuels will rise ever higher. When oil cost $3.50 a barrel in 1973, synfuels were projected to cost $4.50 a barrel. When oil hit $17 a barrel, estimates for synfuels went to $25. The fluidity of these estimates is due partly to the optimism of the synfuel industry and partly to the fact that synfuels plants are themselves heavy consumers of fossil fuels.

Moreover, the eventual output of plants established by the Corporation will be minimal. At the time it was chartered, the Corporation was expected to cultivate an industry that would produce the equivalent of 500,000 barrels of oil a day by 1987, and two million a day by 1992. Today, Corporation officials admit that even in the unlikely event that they succeed in building every plant they hope to open by 1991, production will reach barely a third of the 1987 goal.

Does it make sense, as synfuels advocates claim, to spend more for the alternative fuel than for the fuel from which we want to be independent? Would we be "mortgaging our energy future" by abandoning a technology that private firms refuse to develop? Absolutely not. In fact, if we are mortgaging our energy future, it is by underwriting expensive synfuels projects rather than allowing the market to dictate investments in the alternative fuels that make the most sense. Subsidized synthetic fuels undermine the competitiveness of alternate energies such as co-generation, wind, solar power and hydropower, while discouraging conservation efforts. Private firms are loathe to underwrite alternative energy projects while the Corporation is subsidizing synfuels at the rate of $37 a barrel.

There are reasons other than cost to keep the Government out of the synfuels business. Government-subsidized projects are inevitably politicized and often come to fruition for all the wrong reasons. The Peat Methanol Associated project, in North Carolina, which has $465 million in loan and price guarantees, and which even the Corporation's staff says is economically "unpromising," seems to survive only because it has had as investors a number of influential Republicans, including William Casey, the Director of Central Intelligence.

When asked last year what the American people had gotten for their money, Mr. Schroeder, the Corporation's former president, replied "one heck of a lot of information and education and understanding." If we've learned anything, it's that the Corporation benefits politicians, entrenched bureaucrats and well-connected consultants and businessmen, not the public. It's time to shut it down.

SYNFUELS: THE $88 BILLION MISTAKE

(By Elena Folkerts-Landau)

In a classical maneuver to assure its survival for decades to come, the U.S. Synthetic Fuels Corporation (SFC) initiated an $88 billion crash spending program this summer: It signed its first contract to commit federal funds to the operation of a synthetic fuels plant, the Coolwater coal gasification plant in California, and it signed its first letter of intent to obligate over $2 billion to a single synfuels project, an oil shale plant in Colorado. These events, a "milestone" in the words of SFC's chairman, Edward E. Noble, launched the SFC's drive to commit $15 billion by year's end in an effort to beat slow-paced congressional efforts to bring the scope and scale of the SFC's activities in line with current economic and political conditions.

By spring 1983, the SFC had committed no funds to synfuels projects because well-qualified industrial candidates failed to file applications for financial assistance. By then, the decline in nominal and real oil prices, the dramatic decrease in U.S. oil consumption, the vulnerability of the oil exporters' cartel, public concern over budget deficits, and indications of mismanagement inside the SFC had created disillusion with the federal synfuels program in both Congress and the Reagan administration. Yet the SFC's current initiative, if it is not soon aborted, commits the government to let the corporation monitor and provide follow-up financing for synfuels plants over the course of their 25-year operational life.

The SFC was established in 1980 by Congress, with President Carter's support, as the centerpiece of the Energy Security Act, itself a response to the cutoff of Iranian oil and the subsequent doubling of world oil prices. The independent agency was endowed with an $88 billion, off-budget authorization, $15 billion of which was immediately made available. The SFC's mandate was to stimulate commercial production of synthetic fuels so as to place an upper limit on future energy prices, and thereby insure American consumers against unlimited price increases instigated by OPEC.

One of the biggest selling points of the 1980 Energy Security Act was that the program promised to cost the government little or nothing. House Majority Leader Jim Wright (D-Tex.) and Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.), among others, predicted confidently that synthetic fuels would quickly become commercially competitive, and the SFC could therefore confine itself to loan and price guarantees that would require no actual outlays.

Now, three years later, senior SFC officials are predicting that 90 percent of obligated funds, or nearly $14 billion of the initial $15 billion authorization, will have to be financed by the U.S. Treasury. This is partly because industrial applicants insist on receiving price guarantees, which generate direct money subsidies when a synfuels project becomes operational. Loan guarantees, in contrast, may cast in doubt a company's financial integrity, and so are of limited value to reputable companies.

The Energy Security Act's production goals are now also considered impossible to meet, The mandate to share with private industry the technological risks of producing the equivalent of at least 2 million barrels of oil a day by 1992 would require, at present, more than $400 billion in public outlays. Even the least expensive of synthetic fuels, oil shale, is estimated to cost an average $60 to $90 per barrel over the 20-year lifespan of a synfuels plant, according to both the SFC and industry experts. With the market price of oil currently hovering around $28, a minimum subsidy of $32 per barrel is necessary for producers to break even. Thus, the $67-per-barrel price guarantees currently offered to investors lay the groundwork for $515 billion in public commitments. Synfuels costing an average $90 per barrel over 20 years, such as coal liquefaction, will cause federal outlays to reach at least $818 billion before the energy security goal defined in the Energy Security Act is achieved.

The SFC and its supporters, including the chairmen of the Senate and House energy committees, Sen. James McClure (R-Ida.) and Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), argue that such expenditures are acceptable because they do not affect the 1984 budget, but rather reserve their full budgetary effects for the years ahead. An SFC spokesman boldly wrote in the New York Times that SFC's planned $15 billion obligations do not contribute to the federal deficit because their budgetary effect "will take place two to four years after award" of the guarantees.

Not only is such disregard for future fiscal responsibility alarming, but it is also misleading. The public burden today is far greater than first meets the eye because current interest rates are pressured upward by investors' expectations that credit markets will have to absorb $14 billion in Treasury borrowings on behalf of the SFC. (If the SFC's request for access to the remaining $68 billion is granted in 1984, investors will expect an additional 90 percent of that sum, or $62 billion, in public borrowing, totaling almost $75 billion attributable to the SFC.) Even though funds have yet to be transferred to particular synfuels projects—in transactions that will be recorded off-budget—the effect on current interest rates is the same as an anticipated widening of the actual 1987-1990 federal deficits.

Sincere advocates of the SFC who argue that the country's energy security must be insured at any cost overlook the fact that $15 billion is expected to purchase the capacity to produce less than 60,000 barrels a day of synfuels, or less than two percent of current daily U.S. imports of oil and petroleum products. The Strategic Petroleum Reserve, in contrast, already contains about one year's supply of imports from the Middle East; its transportation and storage costs average $3.75 per barrel, or less than $15 million in annual government outlays in addition to the cost of the oil.

The creation of a centrally planned organization such as the SFC was more a congressional expression for "doing something, even if it's wrong," in the immortal words of Sen. Dale Bumpers (D-Ark.), than it was the outgrowth of thoughtful planning. Rejected by previous Congresses, synthetic fuels commercialization became the legislative bandwagon of the 96th Congress. Beginning with a relatively modest 14-page, $3 billion proposal, synfuels legislation mushroomed when the Carter administration stepped in with its $88 billion scheme to be funded by revenues generated from its proposed windfall profits tax. The Senate then tacked on numerous amendments, packaging synfuels development with solar energy, conservation, gasohol, and other energy programs; in addition, it abandoned the link between the synfuels program and the windfall profits tax.

The conference held in December 1979 to reconcile House and Senate versions of the energy security bill involved seven competing committees. So unwieldy was the proposal that almost no one was able to talk about it as a whole. Eventually, unnecessary or excessive items were added rather than deleted from the bill to gain support for a legislative package. Sen. Bennett Johnston (D-La.), pleased with the conference agreement, remarked that "there's something there for the left and for the right." When asked if the bill was not unlike a cookie jar, with something for everyone, Johnston replied "all of the cookies are good for the country." The bill was passed by an overwhelming bipartisan vote, and signed into law by President Carter on June 30, 1980. Rep. Wright called the measure "the most significant piece of legislation we're likely to enact this year."

WHAT WENT WRONG?

Why the SFC went wrong can be explained by a number of factors. First, the legislation was prepared in haste. No printed conference report was available at the time of the vote. And neither Congress nor the public was given sufficient opportunity to react to the end product. There was a lot of rhetoric about energy security, but, as Sen. William Armstrong (R-Col.) commented. "The [SFC] is not . . . supported by those who are knowledgeable of what it takes to stimulate meaningful production of energy from. . .synthetic-fuels substances."

In addition, oil price increases failed to materialize, and energy users and suppliers demonstrated a responsiveness to economic developments that defied the SFC's objectives. Oil consumption in the United States has declined 12 percent since 1980 from 17 million barrels per day to 15 million, and the share of oil in total U.S. energy consumption has dropped from 45 percent to 38 percent. Energy exploration has reached record levels, the number of oil wells drilled having more than doubled to 40,298 between 1980 and 1982 and gas wells having surged 29 percent to 18,953, before tapering off in recent months.

Most significant has been the voluntary reduction in U.S. crude oil and petroleum product imports from 6.9 million barrels per day in 1980 to an average 4.4 million in 1983. Greater efficiency of energy use and the consequent movement away from energy-intensive industries make it unlikely, furthermore, that imports will be increased to raise inventories significantly. Moreover, global strategic roles have been reversed, with oil-exporting countries more dependent than ever on capital supplied by the industrial nations. In 1980, when U.S. oil-price controls helped boost U.S. imports, the OPEC nations enjoyed a $115 billion current account surplus; today their current account has plunged to a $27 billion deficit, explaining why the OPEC cartel is powerless to fix oil prices far above the market level.

As a result, wholesale rejection of commercial synfuels development has eliminated SFC's choice of attractive opportunities. One year ago, Exxon abandoned a shale project in Parachute, Colorado, into which it had already sunk $700 million. Last October Sohio renounced participation in the proposed $3 billion Hampshire coal-to-gasoline project in Gillette, Wyoming. Ashland Oil withdrew from a proposed multi-billion-dollar coal gasification project one month later.

SFC's misguided mandate was also strongly supported by a constituency of public policy specialists who have made it their cause to bemoan the market's imperfections and who were instrumental in justifying a colossal federal energy program. Proliferating in the late 1970s, in tandem with the burgeoning federal energy budget that suported them through university grants, government consulting contracts, and direct employment with the government, these public policy specialists have successfully marketed the concept of a "social cost" of imported oil to be as high as $154 per barrel. More recently, the SFC staff induced its president and vice chairman, Victor A. Schroeder (who resigned under fire in late August), to announce that the "real" cost of imported oil is $80 per barrel to help justify $80-per-barrel synfuels subsidies.

To arrive at these figures, public policy pundits imputed dollar costs in curious ways to economic dislocations produced by the two world oil price shocks, including inflation, unemployment, the OPEC threat, and the inability of the U.S. to exploit its market power. These social costs were then spread over prevailing oil import levels, thereby raising the per-barrel "cost" of imported oil above its market level of approximately $30 to $154 (Stobaugh), $70 (William Hogan of Harvard's Kennedy School of Government), $59 (William Nordhaus of Yale), and $48 (Stanford Energy Modeling Forum).

In reality, the 1974–75 and 1980–82 recessions, which resulted in part from oil price increases and were aggravated by disinflationary monetary policies, were not linked to future imports of oil, but rather to past imports, when oil could be purchased for less than $3 a barrel. For several decades the industrial nations exploited their market power to import vast amounts of crude oil and petroleum products at prices far below competitive levels. The industrial nations accrued large economic benefits from imported oil during this period, benefits that cannot be ignored today. OPEC's nationalization of foreign interests in oil companies based in the Middle East shifted market power away from the oil-consuming nations and made possible the first oil price shock. Thus the social costs borne by the United States in adjusting to real oil price increases since 1973 have been the price of enjoying $1- to $3-per-barrel oil in prior years. Such costs are irrelevant in designing current energy policy. Moreover, the current distribution of economic power in the world oil market precludes deliberate supply disruptions and, therefore, like other trade commodities calls for no "national policy" at all.

A STUDY IN CENTRAL PLANNING

Three important lessons can be learned from the SFC experience which apply to other areas of public policy as well.

First, the SFC provides a textbook case for testing and comparing the effectiveness of market-oriented policies and centrally planned government programs in solving a national problem. Oil price decontrol was a market solution to oil shortages, whereas the SFC was intended to be a technocratic, centrally administered solution. Decontrol has resulted in lower oil consumption and imports, and great exploration and production. The SFC did none of these; instead, it is now laying the groundwork for a multibillion-dollar program of government subsidies, and in the process it has created a self-serving bureaucracy.

The trend for private synfuels sponsors to return to Congress for subsidies exceeding the sum specified in the original contractual arrangement is exemplified by the Great Plains project. In 1980 American Natural Resources, leading a consortium of companies including People's Gas, Tenneco, and Transcontinental Gas Pipeline, had their lobbyist provide the exact language in the Energy Security Act to underwrite the construction of their 20,000-barrel-a-day coal gasification project in North Dakota. The Great Plains project has since been awarded over $2 billion in federal commitments. But with the possibility of operating losses reaching $1.7 billion if oil prices fail to rise at a 5 percent annual rate, project sponsors are presently requesting additional federal assistance.

A second lesson from the SFC experience is that a government agency entrusted with enormous administrative flexibility and vast sums of money must be very carefully staffed, lest it succumb to self-promoting activities. The SFC has awarded its permanent staff annual salaries as high as $108,000, with more than 70 percent of nonclerical personnel earning over $40,000. Several senior executives with no apparent qualifications were hired on the basis of earlier affiliations with the chairman or vice chairman. According to the Washington Post, the chairman's executive secretary, who is also the vice chairman's wife, is paid in excess of $31,000 a year. Chairman Noble originally volunteered to work for one dollar per year, but was pressured—on grounds that he should appear professional—into accepting a $69,000 salary, which he promptly declared he would donate to a nonprofit organization of his choice which raises the question why taxpayers should pay for Mr. Noble's charity. SFC officials have refused to exhibit such elementary signs of good will as to place their assets in a blind trust while they select companies for $15 billion in financial assistance. Thus a mockery has been made of congressional intent to attract the nation's best talent by exempting the SFC from government pay scales and conflict-of-interest restrictions.

Exemption from public and congressional oversight has also permitted the SFC to stonewall attempts by Congress and the public to acquire nonproprietary information about the corporation's activities. This advantage, in turn, has encouraged SFC to resist curtailments in its scope necessitated by changing economic conditions and to behave in a way that runs counter to the spirit of the enabling legislation. For example, the planning department has begun spending $10 million on outside consultants to help justify some or all of the slated $68 billion congressional authorization in 1984. The Inspector General's office hired on a permanent basis two former consultants who failed to deliver a report for which they were paid $35,000. The private sector's rejection of commercial synfuels induced Schroeder to announce that the government would own synfuels project if no one else did; the board of directors then decided to obligate over $1 billion to peat, heavy oil, and tar sands, thereby affronting the legislation's primary goal of transforming the nation's major resources of coal and shale into usable substitutes for crude oil.

Further, financial assistance has been offered to Kuwait, Japan, and Germany, an odd approach to enhancing U.S. energy security. And according to SFC's executive vice president, Jim Bowden, plans are underway to expand the nominal $15 billion obligational authority, which is currently available, to $27 billion by allowing approximately 80 percent of loan guarantees to be converted into price guarantees when plant construction ends; such roll-over financing shifts almost the entire risk of a project onto the taxpayer.

The third lesson taught by the SFC experience is that the implementation of a U.S. president's policies depends critically upon the government's middle-level managers. The administration has largely failed in its efforts to appoint to middle-level positions professionals sympathetic to its outlook on the role of government. As a result, budget cuts have been prevented or undermined by the existing cadre of managers whose career advancement hinges on prolonged federal involvements.

And so it is with the SFC staff. It has successfully imposed its view on a board of directors inexperienced in the operation of government, and it has purged internal dissenters. One department intends to spend up to $10 million in grants to SFC sympathizers from industry and academia to prepare a "Comprehensive Strategy" justifying a further $68 billion in congressional appropriations. This department has been staffed by an assortment of public policy specialists who are on record as forceful sympathizers of a large-scale SFC effort. The arrogance of a bureaucrat about electoral accountability is captured in the words of the acting director of policy development: "I find [the position] unsupportable" he writes, "that 'optimal' economic instruments are 'determined by the political process.'" It is unrealistic to expect the SFC to be sympathetic to congressionally proposed curtailments of its activities when it is managed by a staff committed to the federal bureaucracy's continued role in energy.

ABOLISHING THE SFC

The case against the U.S. Synthetic Fuels Corporation is overwhelming on both economic and political grounds. There is ample evidence that over the past decade Western industrial nations, largely free of oil price controls, have become sufficiently responsive in their energy consumption, imports, and production to preclude manipulative increases in the price of oil without also creating excess supply. The wholesale rejection of commercial synfuels projects by major oil companies further indicates the unprofitability of such ventures, and hence the tremendous increase in the federal budget that will follow if the SFC proceeds according to its plan. In addition, the SFC's administrative abuses and internal mismanagement discredit its board, the administration, and Congress.

To abolish the SFC is not a partisan issue. The SFC's creation was an honest mistake, made during troubled times. But now, when much effort is being devoted to restraining the size of social and defense programs, it is inconceivable why the SFC should be spared. Unlike the energy and education departments, the SFC does not even enjoy the shield of an indigenous lobby; nor does it bestow significant political gain on either party.

At the least, therefore, an amendment to treat the SFC's activity as an on-budget entry would subject the organization to public and congressional scrutiny. Transferring SFC's activities to a conventional federal agency, such as the Energy Department, would have the triple advantage of subjecting the SFC to on-budget treatment: The SFC would be subject to the requirements of the civil-service system and to conflict-of-interest and sunshine legislation; and to pressure at the cabinet level for all agencies to make budgetary concessions contributing to paring down the synfuels program. The most effective approach would be simply to rescind Title I of the Energy Security Act, thereby abolishing the SFC.

Several bills have been introduced this year in both chambers of Congress to "eliminate a crash commercialization program" in synthetic fuels, as described by Rep. Tom Corcoran (R-Ill.). But the chairmen of the subcommittees with oversight, Sen. McClure and Rep. Philip Sharp (D-Ind.), oppose the measures and have postponed hearings. meanwhile, as SFC obligates every additional dollar, it lays the contractual foundation for government involvement spanning decades. With federal budget deficits over the course of 1984–88 estimated at around $800 billion, Congress can seize the opportunity to slash $88 billion, or more than 10 percent at once.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if there is 1 minute left, I believe the Senator from Washington is seeking recognition.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington.

THE WORLD ACCORDING TO SCOOP

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, in the September 7, 1983, edition of the Weekly, George Weigel wrote a thoughtful and insightful article on the career and the place in our history of my late senior colleague, Senator Jackson.

Mr. President, I ask uanimous consent that that article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WORLD ACCORDING TO SCOOP

(By George Weigel)

Senator Henry M. Jackson had led a full life, and died in the full flush of his intellectual and political powers. The personal pain, sharp as it may be this week, will eventually pass. But there is a public tragedy in Jackson's death that will be much more difficult to salve. For Henry Jackson's passing marks the end of a crucially important era in American political culture, and leaves a huge void in our public life that will not be easily filled—if indeed it can be filled at all.

The essential politics of Henry Jackson came into clear focus for me this past May in Washington, DC. At an evening described by host Ben Wattenberg as "what seems like the 42nd resurrection of the Coalition for a Democratic Majority," Jackson shared a panel discussion on Central America with Bill Doherty of the AFL-CIO's land-reforming American Institute for Free Labor Development, UN Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick, and congressmen Stephen Solarz and Michael Barnes. In the audience were Tom Foley, Jim Wright, Albert Shanker, The New Republic's Morton Kondracke, historian Allen Weinstein, and the former president of El Salvador, Jose Napoleon Duarte. Here, among those Democrats (and democrats) with whom he was most ideologically in tune, Jackson was at this very best.

His highly-developed geopolitical sense was evident from his analysis of the Soviet stake in a destabilized Central American isthmus. But what most distinguished Jackson was his ability, stated simply but persuasively, to see the dilemma of Central America whole. For Jackson knew, and said in effect that night, that the argument between the Alexander Haigs and the Cyrus Vances on these issues—the "East/West problem" versus "local problem" dichotomy—was both analytically sterile and very unlikely to produce thoughtful, long-term US policy in the region. Jackson did not flinch from the security and military dimensions of the question. But he insisted that, even as the Soviet/Cuban role had to be faced and a "security shield" developed for the region, the root causes of Central America's turmoil were social, political, and economic. Any American policy that did not help create the circumstances in which the people of that tortured area could see a personal stake in democracy, and the resolution of their grievances through political rather than Marxist-revolutionary means, was bound to fail.

It has long been fashionable to describe Henry Jackson as a "hawk," and his own rhetoric over the years did its share to contribute to such imagery. But to dismiss Jackson in those crude terms is a disservice to a much more intellectually complex man. It also fundamentally distorts that current in American political culture—liberal, anti-communist internationalism—which gave birth to much of the best in America's post-World War II foreign policy, and of which Jackson was the last remaining senior spokesman. In that sense, what has died with Henry Jackson is a tradition that traced its ancestry through Harry Truman and Dean Acheson, and whose most romantic expression (despite subsequent mythologizing) was the John F. Kennedy who almost took Jackson as his running mate in 1960.

It was this centrist core of the national Democratic Party, sustained by currents then dominant in the trade union movement, that guided America's emergence as a global power with responsibilities for the future course of world history. It is easy to forget, over two generations, how much of a sea-change these Democrats effected. America was not in an internationalist mood coming out of World War II. Conservative Democrats worried about the effects of a wide-ranging international engagement on the character of the country, and especially on the budget. The Taft wing of the Republican Party, with whom Arthur Vandenberg and Dwight Eisenhower finally broke ranks, but which helped produce Joseph McCarthy, remained profoundly isolationist. The American intellectual Left was torn by its own internecine battles between Stalinists and anti-Stalinists. Two expressions of this warfare were the Henry Wallace campaign and the original Americans for Democratic Action (not to be confused ideologically with the same organization today). In this cauldron of ideological battle, and faced with such brute facts of history as the collapse of the British empire and Soviet intransigence in Greece, Iran, and Eastern Europe (particularly Czechoslovakia), what came to be known as the Jackson wing of the Democratic Party designed a complex and not-to-be-oversimplified model for America's unavoidable engagement with the world.

A sharp, unsentimental view of the nature of the Leninist state that had emerged from the war as a global superpower was surely a dominant characteristic of their analysis. Taken to an oversimplified extreme, that anti-communism helped bring about the still-unfolding tragedy of Southeast Asia. But there was much more to this perspective than its firm convictions about the intentions of Soviet power.

Men like Jackson had cut their political teeth, and built much of their political base, on the American trade union movement, which throughout the 1920s and 1930s had been the scene of a massive contest for power between communists and anti-communist liberals and social democrats. Those who came out of this milieu knew that sheer anti-communism was not enough, any more than exclusively military responses to revolutionary circumstances could succeed. That most volatile of human ideas—that things didn't have to be the way they were—had been loosed on the world, just as it had been loosed within the American working class in the first three decades of this century. The contest for power in the world would be decided, as it had been domestically, by an ability to meet the communist challenge, not with the nostrums of laissez-faire conservatism, but by effective programs of social change and development.

The rebirth of Europe and Japan after World War II, the emergence of a nascent community of democracies rooted in the North Altantic community but extending beyond it, the containment of Stalin's more gross territorial ambitions: all these were at least partially the responsibility, and the great accomplishment, of liberal, anti-communist internationalists like Henry Jackson. Their ability to weave between the twin dangers of the Right—isolationism or mindlessly confrontational anti-Sovietism that refused to engage with the world's other dominant power—and the sentimentality of the Left played no small part in shaping a U.S. foreign policy that allowed a figure like John Kennedy to be the revered world symbol of hope that he became.

In the bitter aftermath of Vietnam, a debacle during which many liberal anti-communists forgot the social reform dimension of their analysis, the Jackson worldview was increasingly dismissed as irrelevant, anachronistic, dangerous. The 1970s, at least on the short view, look now like the decade in which cruder analyses and more strident voices came to dominate public discussion and foreign policy. The idea that democracy is not a North Atlantic peculiarity, but a universal yearning of all peoples who wish to control their own fate, was largely rejected, by both Left and Right (for different reasons, of course). The notion that the Soviet agenda was to be challenged, contained, and ultimately changed through imaginative US policies was replaced by an emphasis on accommodation, a theme advanced not only (or even most effectively) by the new liberals, but by such major figures in the American business community as Armand Hammer, Donald Kendall, and Cyrus Eaton. New forms of isolationism emerged, again from both Left and Right. Human rights were not to be a major focus of US efforts in the world.

The aftershocks of Iran, Afghanistan, and Poland, and the relentless drive of Soviet military expansion, have brought us, in a great historical irony, back to a situation and a set of arguments not dissimilar from those of the immediate post-World War II period. Having survived politically the firestorm of the late '60s and early '70s, Jackson was beginning to appear, not as a fossil, but as a statesman.

His measured approach to the multiple, connected crises of Central America was, in my view, the best single sign of hope over the past year. It contained all of the elements of the traditional line; that Soviet power had to be faced squarely; that confronting that reality involved security questions and military issues; but that the final resolution of the crisis would not be military in nature, but had to involve a thoroughgoing economic, social, and political reform in the region. Perhaps more than any other person, or set of political pressures, it was Jackson's ability to take the partial truths of the Haig and Vance views, and weave a more complete truth out of them, that led to a changed administration approach to Central America, the appointment of the Kissinger Commission and the designation of Richard Stone as special envoy to the region, and the (admittedly faint) glimmers of possibility that had begun to cut through the darkness of a polarized American public debate and the increasingly deadly situation on the ground in Central America. That Jackson's voice in this ongoing argument—which is by no means resolved, commissions and envoys notwithstanding—has now been stilled is a public tragedy of the first magnitude. As I look through the current roster of the United States Senate, it is virtually impossible to find a single figure, Republican or Democrat, who will raise the Jacksonian perspective, much less bring to it the authority of age and experience that would have been Jackson's. At the very moment when Henry Jackson was on the verge of assuming the statesman's mantle that had so long eluded him, through his own faults, but also through others', he is gone.

There is also bitter irony in the accident of history (or design of an inscrutable Providence) that combined, in a single day, Jackson's death and the brutal murder of 269 Korea Air Lines passengers by the Soviet Union. Jackson's response to this crime, at what became his final press conference, was a model of the kind of mature statesmanship that he had begun to incarnate. The facts of the case could not be denied; the truth of Soviet responsibility had to be acknowledged, here and in Moscow. Moreover, the question of just what it is about the Soviet system that brought it to such an unconscionable act had to be thought through: are we right in assuming that Soviet leaders operate under the same set of moral constraints that, however weakly, still shape our own policy calculus? But to this realism Jackson brought a measure of that calm which seems to come from both understanding and long experience. Unlike those elements on the Right that saw in the KAL tragedy the occasion finally to declare the Soviet Union a pariah nation, with which no other power should have any responsible business, Jackson knew, and stated, that what was needed was not disengagement, but a kind of engagement that both faced the facts of Soviet responsibility and worked to change their policy so that such a tragedy could not happen again. Jackson understood that the KAL crime could not be put only, or even primarily, into a US/Soviet framework, but had to be seen for what it essentially was: a great, new tear in the already-tattered fabric of world order. It was the "international community," Jackson said, that had to take responsibility for asserting the complete unacceptability of a crime such as the Soviets', and for devising a response to the crime that lowered the chances of its repetition.

"International community" is one of those stock phrases that politicians and diplomats often trot out in moments of stress, or when effective national action seems unlikely. But, for Jackson, "international community" meant, I think, something very real, or at least something that ought to be real. Jackson's extensive involvement in military hardware issues, and his role as resident critic of SALT I and SALT II, can obscure other commitments that ran just as deeply (deeper, I believe) in his politics. We should not forget that it was Jackson who, with Daniel Patrick Moynihan and a small band of centrist Democrats, re-established human rights as a central focus of US foreign policy, quite before Jimmy Carter was even a blip on the national political radar.

It was this commitment to human rights, I think, that was most basic in Jackson's anti-communism. Jackson had, at his best, a rare geopolitical clairvoyance; he understood the central reality of power in world politics, and the power threat posed by the USSR. But what sustained Jackson in his anti-communism, particularly during those long years when it was so unfashionable, was, I would guess, a profound moral revulsion at the nature of the Leninist/Stalinist state, and what it did to individual human lives. Jackson, steeped in Scandinavian Protestantism, knew instinctively that the City of God and the City of This World are distinct realities; but he also knew that they intersected as the most crucial points of human politics, when the questions become, what is a good person and the good state, and the relationship between the two? Jackson was no political rhetorician, a flaw that surely contributed to his failed presidential ambitions, so one will probably look long and far to find such sentiments in his public statements. But a careful tracking of the trajectory of his career—and its remarkable consistency of perspective, for both good and ill—will, I think, reveal these kinds of concerns as not only present, but basic.

In the short term, there could be no more appropriate public memorial to Henry Jackson than a US response to the Korea Air Lines tragedy that did justice to the full measure of Jackson's multi-layered worldview. Such a response might strike at least the following notes, and operate along the following lines:

The destruction of KAL flight 007 would be put into its appropriate context, which is not primarily US/Soviet, but international, American officials would make it clear that, in our minds, what has been done here is most fundamentally a brutal violation of basic tenets of international law. The international community is too fragile now, we would emphasize, for such behavior to go unremarked, unchallenged, and unchanged.

The traditional Soviet fear of territorial encroachment, with its deep roots in Russian culture and history, is an acknowledged factor in world affairs. But it cannot be allowed to become the excuse for inexcusable behavior, because radical openness to others' power is in fact the condition of the whole world today. Such is the real meaning of interdependence, and the source of much of the volatility of international life today.

Because of the international implications of the Soviets' action, the immediate, appropriate political forum for dealing with it is the United Nations. The predictable failure of the UN to come to grips with the problem, though, should not be the occasion to abandon the idea that crimes against the international community must be dealt with on an international basis, by whatever functioning elements of international life now exist. There are two international non-governmental organizations who could be very effective in imposing sanctions challenging the USSR's access to international civil aviation, whose rules it has drastically broken. The sanction, in general, would be denial of Soviet access to the international air travel system. The organizations that could make this possible are the International Federation of Airline Pilots Associations, and the International Association of Air-Traffic Controllers. The former should refuse to fly into the USSR, or any other nation which votes against a UN General Assembly censure of the Soviet action off Korea. The air-traffic controllers should refuse to handle any Aeroflot flights that leave the airspace of the Soviet Union. Both of these sanctions would remain in place, until such time as the Soviet government acknowledges its responsibility for the fate of KAL flight 007, apologizes publicly for that crime, offers compensation to the families of the victims of the incident, and agrees that it will refrain from such barbarism in the future. The sanctions would be automatically re-applied if the Soviet Union, or indeed any other nation, commits such a crime again.

Such a response, which does not acquiesce to the harsh realities of Soviet power, but seeks to change those realities through effective, non-military action, would be firmly within the Jacksonian tradition. It seems that we are often unable to face the facts about the Soviet system when the tragedies it perpetrates are large-scale: the purge trials of the 1930s, the postwar violations of Eastern Europe, the invasions of Czechoslovakia in 1968 and Afghanistan in 1978, the pressure on Polish trade unionists, the abiding horrors of Gulag and the psychiatric hospitals. It is only when the issue becomes personalized, as in the death of 269 innocent travelers, that the full message comes home.

Henry Jackson would surely have wanted us to take the full measure of that message, to drink to the bottom, in effect, the cup from which he drank for four decades. But he would want more. He would want America to act as if it were in fact, as well as theory, the confident democracy our rhetoric proclaims us to be. He would want us to act in ways that changed Soviet policy, and not merely be revolted by it. He would want us to act in a manner that strengthened the capacity of this fragile world to resolve its differences without the military force he spent so much of his public life defending.

In the cold light of history, there will surely be much with which to find fault in Jackson's worldview, his policies, and his rhetoric, as there would be with any significant public figure. It is those who make no difference who are largely immune from reasonable criticism. But, for the moment, as we reflect on the incredible twists of fate which now inextricably link his death to the raw dimensions of power which he tried to address, what seems most important is not whether he was right or wrong on Vietnam, and when, or whether he was right or wrong on SALT II, and how. What seems important is that he saw clearly the central conundrum of our times—that the problem of the Soviet Union and the urgent problem of war cannot be untangled—and insisted that resolving the first dilemma and the second must be a concurrent process. It is that message of Henry Jackson, so often obscured by others of his voices, that will be most missed. For in it resided his enduring greatness.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, even though there is 1 minute left, no other Senator is seeking recognition. I ask that the Chair inquire whether there is further morning business.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

AUTHORIZATION FOR FURTHER U.S. PARTICIPATION IN MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN LEBANON

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of the pending business, Senate Joint Resolution 159, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159) to authorize the further participation of U.S. armed forces in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. BINGAMAN addressed the chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, the matter that we are debating today is one of potentially historic implications. Whatever we do or whatever we ultimately decide, our actions in this body will constitute a permanent and irrevocable contribution to the definition of the balance of power between the legislative and executive branches of government. We will be establishing precedents for this and future Congresses as they consider vital questions of U.S. military commitments abroad.

The current situation in Lebanon is both important and complex, and I urge my colleagues to look beyond the immediate crisis to consider the fundamental constitutional issues involved and to recognize the implications of this debate for other times and other crises.

Today the debate is largely couched in terms of the constitutional prerogatives of the Congress and of the President. We are arguing whether the War Powers Act is constitutional, whether it applies to the situation in Lebanon, and, if it does apply, whether we should suspend its effect for the 18-month period that the President has requested.

Most Americans, however, are not constitutional scholars or parliamentarians, and the questions on their minds today concern not the legalities but what are the purposes of U.S. military involvement in this region far from our own shores? What do we hope to accomplish in Lebanon? Can we realistically expect to achieve our goals, whatever they are? How long do we need direct involvement of U.S. military personnel in that country?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the burden of proof is on the administration to answer those questions for us and for the American people before it asks us to give an 18-month blank check to pursue policies that it seems unable to articulate.

The administration is putting the cart before the horse. It seeks our agreement to following a path which takes it into 1985 without stating where that path is expected to lead.

Any administration, and not just this one, that would seek to involve American military forces in actual or potential hostilities without a formal declaration of war needs to articulate its reasons for doing so clearly and effectively. So far that has not been done.

Legislatively, the questions before us are relatively clearcut.

First, is the War Powers Act a valid exercise of the authority of Congress under the U.S. Constitution?

Second, does the War Powers Act apply to the U.S. military contingent operating as part of the multinational force in Lebanon?

Third, should the Congress, at this time, suspend the 60- to 90-day time period provided for in the act and, instead, authorize the troops to remain in combat in Lebanon for 18 months?

Let us take each of these three questions in order.

On the question of whether the War Powers Act is constitutional, it is clear to me that the act was and is a logical implementation of the powers assigned by the Constitution to the Congress. It is a reassertion of the fundamental right of the elected representatives of the people to have a say in matters of war and peace. The act was passed "to fulfill the intent of the framers of the Constitution of the United States and ensure that the collective judgment of both the Congress and the President will apply to the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into hostilities."

The Constitution reserves to the legislative branch the power to declare or not to declare war.

Today we face assertions that the President's roll as Commander in Chief permits him to carry out unilaterally whatever military mission he deems appropriate absent a formal declaration of war. But we find ourselves in an age when few wars are declared but many are fought.

I remind my colleagues that our last formal declaration of war was made almost 42 years ago, before this Senator was even born. Yet our Nation has fought two bloody and bitter major conflicts in the intervening years in which tens of thousands of Americans died without the benefit of such a declaration.

The War Powers Act is the law of the land, and it implements the authority of Congress to commit U.S. military forces to war, declared or otherwise. It must be invoked when, and I quote from the Act:

United States Armed Forces are introduced into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances. . . .

That brings us to the second question. That is whether the War Powers Act applies to the situation we find ourselves in in Lebanon. I cannot believe there is a serious disagreement about this issue. By any commonsense reading of the language of the act, it is clear that our troops were engaged in hostilities a full month ago, on August 28.

The final legislative issue we face is whether Congress, while contending that the War Powers Act must be complied with, should set aside the time periods provided for in the act and authorize the President at this time to keep troops there a full 18 months.

In other words, having gained the grudging acceptance of the administration to the proposition that the Constitution and the War Powers Act do indeed require congressional participation in decisions of war and peace, do we then intend to cede virtually unlimited authority back to the executive branch for a full year and a half?

My view, Mr. President, is that first we need to know what the administration wants to do in Lebanon. Our adherence to the rule of law means that we must insist upon the full application of the provisions of the War Powers Act. Having done so, we should allow the President and his advisers a suitable amount of time to define and present their policies to this body and to the American public.

In that time, we can see if the current cease-fire will hold and if negotiations follow, and President Reagan can issue a precise statement of U.S. policy goals, interests, and intentions. If continued U.S. involvement in the search for peace and stability in Lebanon is still needed after that, the Congress could and, I am certain, would authorize it. But we need to be told what we are attempting to accomplish—not just how long we might need to do so.

A suitable amount of time, in my mind, does not mean a grant extending to some far-distant date in 1985, by which time, the shapers of the current course of action may all be returned to private life.

Judgments about American dedication in this crisis will not be based on the length of the period that we authorize. They will be based on the soundness of our policies and the unanimity with which we act. If the President truly is interested in compromise and in constitutional checks and balances, we must be willing to work with him to shape a desired consensus. Then we can either extend our participation in efforts to bring peace to Lebanon or end that participation when it becomes unnecessary or inadvisable.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the role.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BOSCHWITZ). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I inquire of the minority manager of this bill, since there is a quorum call running, which I presume is charged against the Senator who suggested the absence of a quorum, and since no speakers are available on either side at this time, if it would be more appropriate to charge the quorum equally against both sides, since the statute requires that the time be divided equally.

Mr. PELL. I agree with the majority leader. We are trying to see if there are any speakers on this side.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the quorum call I am about to suggest be charged equally against the time of the majority and minority leaders or their designees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I have five major objections to and one element of support for the Resolution before us. I question our policy or lack thereof in Lebanon. I question the 18-month term of the Resolution. I question at least two glaring loopholes in the Resolution. I question Secretary of State Shultz's interpretation of the President's Commander in Chief authority.

I support the treatment of the War Powers Act in the Resolution.

OUR POLICY IN LEBANON

The Republic of Lebanon is today a caldron of warring factions, each beholden to its own separatist culture and sometimes directly or indirectly to a foreign body. Since its creation in 1943, Lebanon has been "an agglomeration of different ethnic groups." It has never "developed an inner core" or established its legitimacy as a nation. (See: "Lebanon: Nation in Jeopardy," by David C. Gordon, published by Westview Press, p. 1.)

Its politics, economy, and its military have been dominated by the Christian community (once a presumed majority, but now a definite minority) with the entire Moslem community—Sunni, Shi'ite, and Druze—left out in the cold.

Today we are supporting a Christian-Phalange government headed by Amin Gemayel, the seventh Christian President since 1943. Gemayel's scope of control is limited to the city of Beirut. He is basically the mayor of Beirut, although he is called President.

Linking our hopes to Gemayel and excluding the Moslems from meaningful power sharing is a policy destined to failure. We may gloss over the conflict with a cease-fire or two, but we cannot ignore away the deep-seated antagonisms and political imbalances in Lebanon. Peace will never come to Lebanon with an excluded Moslem community.

The basic fallacy of our policy is that it ignores the history of Lebanon. In no other nation on Earth can the past so accurately project the future. Once we understand the past, we will understand why our do-or-die-with-Gemayel policy is doomed.

The Resolution before us is, thus, pegged to a fallacious policy. No words in a Resolution, however clever, can cure that.

THE 18-MONTH TIME PERIOD

America participated in World War I for 19 months (April 6, 1917 to November 11, 1918). A lot of killing can take place in 18 months. In a country where warmaking seems as routine as brushing one's teeth, a great deal of dangerous mischief can take place in 18 months.

Presumably, the chief advantage of an 18-month Resolution is that it demonstrates our resolve. But the resolve demonstrated is deceptive. The Resolution does not reflect consensus about the scope, duration, and purpose of the Marines assignment in Lebanon. It reflects a political compromise between the President, who wants a completely free hand, and most of Congress, which would impose much stricter limitations. Papering over these differences may get this Resolution passed and get us through this day, but in all likelihood, those differences will resurface with a vengenace in the not-too-distant future. Our purposes for being in Lebanon have not been explained clearly enough to support giving the President this much discretion for this much time. Because it would be unacceptable to place restrictions on the Marines ability to protect themselves, the wise course in these circumstances is a shorter authorization.

If we pass a Resolution authorizing, for example, a 6-month stay, and circumstances are such that we renew it when the time comes, our forces will have the benefit of a national consensus supporting them. I fear that this 18-month Resolution could result in the worst of all worlds: A blank check for the President, wider involvement of U.S. forces, without the requisite support in Congress and the country. The War Powers Act was intended to avoid just that sort of hellish situation; logic dictates we should recognize the possibility and avoid it, but this Resolution seems to invite it.

The risks are too great. The time is too long.

LOOPHOLE NO. 1

Section 3 reads in part as follows:

Such participation shall be limited to performance of the functions, and shall be subject to the limitations, specified in the agreement establishing the Multinational Force in Lebanon as set forth in the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982, except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to ensure the safety of the Multinational Force in Lebanon. (Emphasis supplied)

Some form of self-defense language must be included in this Resolution. We must preserve the flexibility to protect our marines and the rest of the Multinational Force. But we should face the fact that this language is a blank check to the President to do whatever he wants to do militarily in Lebanon. Cleverly worded, it is nonetheless the Lebanese Gulf of Tonkin Resolution.

We have fresh knowledge as to how this President interprets words. He and his advisers still maintain, for example, that our troops in Lebanon have not been involved in "combat" or "hostilities" in Lebanon despite the clear and unambiguous meaning of those words and the clear and unambiguous fact of American dead and wounded.

The multinational forces in Lebanon, including our Marines, were under fire. They were in jeopardy because the situation on the ground was bad and the Lebanese Army was not strong enough to guarantee their safety in the original role as noncombatants. In my opinion, there is virtually no military operation which could not qualify under the definition of "protective measures as may be necessary to insure the safety of the multinational force in Lebanon." That language can justify naval bombardment, the use of air power, offensive missions as well as defensive actions, the landing of 5,000 or 10,000 more marines in support of the existing multinational force. In short, the language is without limit; it is the loophole of loopholes. The safety of our forces requires some such language, but we should not delude ourselves. If we want to place any limits on our potential involvement in Lebanon, this resolution does not do so. We can do so only by shortening the 18-month authorization contemplated by the Resolution.

There are other disquieting ambiguities about this Resolution. The operative section—section 3—purports to limit U.S. involvement in Lebanon to the role spelled out in the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982.

Now, how is the U.S. role defined in those letters? Read them. You will find that every reference to the activities of the multinational force is carefully circumscribed by the phrase "in the Beirut area."

The September 25, 1982, exchange of letters, referenced in the Resolution, says that the Marines were being deployed "to establish an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area * * * the presence of such an American force will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area."

In the Beirut area. Again, and again, the letters spell out that geographical limitation.

But, let us look at the statement of findings and purpose of this Resolution.

It says the purpose of U.S. participation in the multinational force is to assist the Government of Lebanon to restore full control "over its own territory" and to establish its "unity, independence, and territorial integrity."

That is something else again. Those words would seem to foreshadow a much broader U.S. role than merely keeping the peace in Beirut.

The statement of purpose would establish us as the protectors of the Gemayel government against any violent threat whether domestic or foreign.

Mr. President, this is much more than a rhetorical point. It gets to the heart of the issue in this debate—whether we are handing the President a virtual blank check to proceed as he will in Lebanon.

Some of us believe this is the case just on the basis of the extraordinary 18-month timeframe.

But, what is it we are authorizing the President to do during those 18 months? What functions and limitations are spelled out regarding U.S. forces?

The War Powers Act itself calls for the President to make a very specific report to Congress covering in great detail the scope, role, and expected stay of U.S. forces in any hostile situation. On the basis of that report, then, Congress was to act to approve or disapprove the plan.

In the case of Lebanon, there is no report. What we have instead is a reference to letters of agreement exchanged between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon on September 25, 1982.

I have already pointed out the inconsistency between what those letters say and what is pronounced to be the U.S. role in the Resolution's statement of purpose.

Let me take it a step further. The critical letters of September 25, 1982, which supposedly define the U.S. mission in Lebanon, provide for their own amendment by mutual agreement.

Now what does that mean? What does it mean when the letter from the Lebanese Minister of Foreign Affairs states, "the MNF may undertake other functions only by mutual agreement."

Will Congress have to approve any changes in function which the United States and the Gemayel governments may agree to?

Does the 18-month approval carried by this Resolution extend only to the functions spelled out in the original letters of September 25, 1982, or are they meant to embrace in advance and without the slightest knowledge of what they might involve, any and all changes which might be made in those letter agreements somewhere down the road?

What is the answer? It is not only the date that is blank on this check. We have not even filled in the amount. All we have done is made it out to the President of the United States and signed it.

SECRETARY SHULTZ' VIEW

Beyond the vague wording of the Resolution itself, is the incredibly broad interpretation which Secretary of State Shultz gives to the President's inherent authority. Secretary Shultz, in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and under close questioning by Senator SARBANES, stated as follows:

Senator SARBANES. You would not agree to the authorization being for 18 months and then it being clear that to stay there the President would have to come back to Congress. Is that correct?

Secretary SHULTZ. That's correct.

Senator SARBANES. Now is it the Administration's position that what they need to do is consult with Congress or what they need to do is obtain an authorization from Congress, that they could not expand the number or role (of the Marines) without a specific Congressional authorization.

Secretary SHULTZ. I think the President, or perhaps any of you if you were President thinking about your constitutional role as Commander in Chief, would be very reluctant to tie your hands and say that you could only order United States forces to do something or other after the Congress had authorized it.

Senator SARBANES. What this questioning is bringing out is that while the administration is seeking an authorization from the Congress, it is reserving its authority and right to increase the numbers, increase the scope and increase the time period, in each instance without a Congressional authorization.

Secretary SHULTZ. Well, I can only go back to the generality of it and say that the President has no intention of turning over to the Congress his constitutional responsibilities as Commander in Chief. Now that doesn't mean that you ignore the Congress's wishes and of course the Congress has to provide the funds and so on. And it is only sensible to consult and try to move forward in tandem on these matters. But the President must maintain his constitutional responsibility as Commander in Chief and cannot let go of it.

Reduced to its bare essence, the position of the administration is that Resolution or no Resolution, restrictions or no restrictions, words or no words, War Powers Act or no War Powers Act, the administration is going to do what it pleases, when it pleases, in Lebanon. Secretary Shultz, in his courtly manner, is telling Congress it has nothing truly meaningful or efficacious to say in this matter. Had Jimmy Carter espoused such a brazen claim of unferrered authority, some Republican would have demanded his impeachment.

Later, in a Cable News Network interview, Secretary Shultz went even further in espousing unlimited, unilateral Presidential warmaking. "Shultz Refuses To Put Limits on Marines' Mission," headlined the New York Times of September 25, 1983. The President's letter of yesterday does not, in my opinion, cure this matter.

THE WAR POWERS ACT

Now, the one thing I like in the Resolution. Section 2(b) adequately acknowledges the force and applicability of section 4(a)(1) and section 5(b) of the War Powers Act.

Once he signs the Resolution, the President is officially and legally acknowledging those vital sections, despite whatever verbal or written reservations and protestations he may make to the contrary. As a result of this Resolution, the War Powers Act lives and lives to be used in yet another day.

All Presidents who have had to operate under its restrictions—Nixon, Ford, Carter, now Reagan—have hated the War Powers Act. Presidents relish their role as Commander in Chief. Presidents view Congress as a meddlesome nuisance. But the Founding Fathers—particulary Madison and Hamilton—did not trust unilateral Presidential warmaking. When and where to go to war is the most solemn and fateful decision a free nation can make. Madison and Hamilton wanted that power to be placed in the Congress with the President, like Franklin Roosevelt after Pearl Harbor, having the right to seek a declaration of war. The War Powers Act effectuates that constitutional precept.

When you look at the history of the Constitutional Convention, it is clear the warmaking power was intended to be in the Congress. Congress in the War Powers Act does not take anything from the President. To the contrary, Congress gave to the President 90 days of unilateral warmaking authority which some of us thought was of very dubious constitutionality. I urge my colleagues to read article I, section 8 of the Constitution. If you do, you will realize where the war power truly lies.

The War Powers Act is not perfect.

On May 21, 1975, along with Senator CRANSTON, I proposed a series of amendments to the act. Some hearings were held, but the matter died quietly.

I much preferred the version of the War Powers Act which originally passed the Senate on July 20, 1973. The act we have now is really a creature of give-and-take compromise between the House and Senate conferees. Often, as we know, you do not get the best of all worlds in a Senate-House conference.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of this speech the following material be placed in the RECORD:

First. The amendments to the War Powers Act offered by Senator CRANSTON and myself on May 21, 1975, and my statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in explanation thereof;

Second. A comparison of the key operative provisions of today's War Powers Act with the original Senate version of the act as passed by the Senate on July 20, 1973; and Third. The evolution of the war powers bill from Senate to House and, thence, out of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

THE CEASE-FIRE

Mr. EAGLETON. The whole world is delighted that a cease-fire is now in place in Lebanon. The whole world hopes the cease-fire holds and ultimately leads to peace in Lebanon. Like President Reagan, we have our fingers crossed.

Unfortunately and tragically, the history of cease-fires in Lebanon has not been a happy one. Since 1975, when this civil war began, there have been so many failed cease-fires in Lebanon that even the Library of Congress has lost count.

Their best rough estimate is almost 200 cease-fires since 1975.

In June, July, and August of 1982 alone, Philip Habib arranged for 10 different cease-fires. It is against this background that the current cease-fire must be juxtaposed.

S. 1790

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Section 1. Section 2(c) of the War Powers Resolution (Public Law 93-148; 87 Stat. 555) is amended by—

(1) striking out the word "or" in clause (2) thereof; and

(2) striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "or (4) the necessity of protecting the constitutional rights of citizens of the United States by rescuing such citizens, as rapidly as possible, from any country in which such citizens are being involuntarily held with the express or tacit consent of the government of such country or by expeditiously evacuating such citizens from any country in which such citizens are voluntarily present and are being subjected to a direct and imminent personal threat, either sponsored by the government of such country or beyond the power of such government to control. In using the Armed Forces of the United States to protect the rights of any United States citizen pursuant to clause (4) of this subsection, the President shall do so only with the degree of force required to remove such citizens from personal danger.".

SEC. 2. Section 3 of the War Powers Resolution is amended by—

(1) striking out "consult with Congress" and inserting in lieu thereof" seek the advice and counsel of the Congress";

(2) striking out "consult regularly with the Congress" and inserting in lieu thereof "regularly seek the advice and counsel of the Congress"; and

(3) adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "For purposes of this section, the words 'seek the advice and counsel of, mean that the President, before taking any steps which would firmly commit United States Armed Forces to hostilities, shall in every possible instance discuss fully the proposed decision for using such Armed Forces with Members of Congress, including but not limited to the majority and minority leaders of the Senate and the House of Representatives, the chairmen of the Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees of the Senate, and the chairmen of the Armed Services and International Relations Committees of the House of Representatives and shall fully consider their advice and counsel before committing the United States Armed Forces to any such proposed decision.".

SEC. 3. Section 8 of the War Powers Resolution is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection;

"(e) Any person employed by, under contract to, or under the direction of any department or agency of the United States Government who is either (a) actively engaged in hostilities in any foreign country; or (b) advising any regular or irregular military forces engaged in hostilities in any foreign country shall be deemed to be a member of the Armed Forces of the United States for the purposes of this Act.".

PREPARED STATEMENT OF SENATOR THOMAS F. EAGLETON

BEFORE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE, JULY 13, 1977

WAR POWERS

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to participate again in the important discussion of one of the most complex and sensitive issues Congress has had to address in the history of the Republic—war powers legislation. This is the fourth time I have been privileged to testify on this subject before this Committee. But it is the first opportunity, as the distinguished Chairman of this Committee, Senator Sparkman has said, "to reflect on normally heated questions in a period of peace and tranquility." In my judgment, the existing War Powers Resolution is tragically flawed. If we take this opportunity to amend the legislation in order to restore to Congress its rightful and constitutional role in the process by which we go to war, at some near or distant occasion, when our nation's will is again being tested in the international arena, we will be glad we took this quiet time to strengthen our constitutional system.

The effort to write war powers legislation in the late 1960's and early 1970's resulted from the excessive claim of Presidents of both parties of unilateral, inherent powers to commit the nation to war to the exclusion of any congressional role in the decision-making process.

With respect to Southeast Asia, our nation has suffered a series of frustrating deceptions—from the Tonkin Gulf to the illegal secret bombing of Cambodia. A phrase coined by Anthony Austin, in his prize-winning chronicle of our official entry into the Vietnam War, The President's War, seemed to sum up fears: "the war-bred tyranny of kinds." After the 1970 Cambodia invasion had driven home with a vengeance the congressional erosion of war powers, a number of bills were introduced to restore the balance.

The bill that emerged from this Committee in 1971 was premised on the central principle that the decision to go to war, under our Constitution, is a decision for Congress alone to make. It sought to fulfill the intent of the framers of our Constitution, expressed so well by Alexander Hamilton, who said the war-making power "is the peculiar and exclusive province of Congress." Our founding fathers had had good reason—direct experience with the tyranny of a monarch with ultimate powers at his disposal—to assign matters of war and peace to the most representative branch of government.

The Senate bill was faithful to the original intent of the framers of our Constitution. The framers' central premise on a war-making authority was clear: the decision to go to war, under our Constitution, is a decision for Congress alone to make.

Under our Constitution it is the Congress vested with numerous war-related powers: "to declare War," "to provide for the common Defense," "to define and punish . . . offenses against the Law of Nations," "to raise and support Armies . . . ," "to provide and maintain a Navy," "to make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval forces," "to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repeal Invasions," "to provide for organizing, arming and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States." Congress also had the exclusive power to appropriate funds from the Treasury, and "to make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution . . . all powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof."

The President, under our Constitution, is vested, not with independent authority as sovereign, but with "executive power" of the United States. He has the duty to "take care that the Laws be faithfully executed." And the President is the commander-in-chief of our armed forces. James Madison has these words to say about who would decide questions of war and peace under our system:

"Every just view that can be taken on this subject, administers the public of the necessity of a rigid adherence to the simple, the received, and the fundamental doctrine of the constitution, that the power to declare war, including the power of judging of the causes of war, is fully and exclusively vested in the legislature; that the executive has no right, in any case, to decide the question, whether there is or is not cause for declaring war; that the right of convening and informing Congress, whenever such a question seems to call for a decision, is all the right which the constitution has deemed requisite or proper . . ."

I fail to see how our Constitution could have made it clearer that Congress would provide prior authorization when American forces were committed to battle.

The legislation endorsed by the Senate in 1973 was consistent with our Constitution. We recognized that in certain emergency situations requiring immediate response—fast-moving crises where events would certainly overtake the deliberative nature of legislative response—the President had a limited unilateral power to respond. These exceptions were carefully circumscribed to avoid Presidential misuse. They were enumerated as follows:

First, the President could repel an armed attack upon the Central States, its territories and possessions; he could take necessary and appropriate retaliatory action in the event of such an attack; and he could act to forestall the direct and imminent threat of such an attack.

Second, he could respond to an attack on American forces legally deployed abroad.

And, third, under specified conditions the President could rescue American citizens abroad to provide for their immediate evacuation from a danger zone.

Each of the exceptions is a defensive action. Even those actions would have been submitted in time to Congress. Within 30 days, unless Congress acted to provide continued authority, the action was to have been terminated.

But it was a different sort of law which emerged from Conference with the House in October-November 1973. That law, now the existing War Powers Resolution, does not involve Congress in the decision-making process until after forces were committed to battle. The words about emergency authority are nonbinding and nonenforceable. The President has the unilateral authority to commit American troops anywhere in the world, under any conditions he decides, for 60 to 90 days. He gets a free 60 days, and a self-executing option for an additional 30 days, making it 90. Congress must be notified only 48 hours after the deployment of our forces.

In retrospect, we can see how difficult were the circumstanes when the War Powers Resolution was passed. Between October and November 1973 Vice President Agnew resigned after pleading no contest to a charge of income tax evasion. President Nixon fired Watergate special prosecutor Archibald Cox and abolished the office—the now infamous "Saturday night massacre." The President found it necessary to go on television to announce "I'm not a crook", then the 18½ minute gap was disclosed. The House Democratic leadership agreed to have the Judiciary Committee begin an impeachment inquiry, and Republican Senators began discussing resignation in public.

We in Congress were frustrated with our failure to override eight successive Presidential vetoes, and, considering the tremendous pressures then created by the Watergate scandal, it is understandable how this Congress overrode President Nixon's war power veto. The irony, of course, is that we were actually expanding, not limiting Presidential war-making powers.

I believe the question of prior constitutional restraints is so essential to our system of government that the original legislation which twice passed the Senate should be passed again. In the coming days I hope to cosponsor such legislation with several of my colleagues. I have had a draft proposal prepared which, with a section by section analysis, I ask to be placed in the Record. I am not wedded to every detail of this draft. It will have served its purpose if it can help this Committee in these deliberations.

In addition, the commendable oversight hearings which this Committee is currently conducting may produce some other good ideas which may well strengthen the Resolution. Certainly, the Mayaguez crisis and the Cambodian and Vietnam evacuations carried out in 1975 under the terms of the existing War Powers Resolution show clearly there is room for improvement.

In those crises of 1975 the executive branch did not feel bound by the existing statute. The consultation process was inadequate and incomplete; many months after the Mayaguez rescue, for example, a House subcommittee oversight investigation was faced with delays and procedural obstacles in simply obtaining factual information on how the crisis had been managed. The Administration's report to the Congress of May 15, 1975 merely took note of Section 4(a)(1) of the Resolution, which calls for information on the introduction of U.S. forces into hostilities. Section 4(a)(3), which calls for a report on the enlargement of U.S. forces in another foreign nation, in this case Thailand, was ignored. Even more important, the President felt free to engage in retaliatory bombing of targets on the Cambodian mainland apparently unconnected with the rescue operation—which appears to run against the grain of our constitution.

In preparing these remarks I had the opportunity to review my closing remarks from April 12, 1973, the last time I was honored to participate with this Committee in this discussion. I concluded that testimony with these words:

"It is unfortunate that we in Congress, and Americans in general, have a tendency to overlook serious situations until they erupt into crisis. There should be little doubt that the gradual erosion of congressional war powers has grown to crisis proportions. If we fail to act now after the horrors of Vietnam have so clearly exposed the danger of individual war-making, we may never again see the questions of war and peace being decided by the sobering and deliberative processes inherent in the concept of collective judgment."

I believe those words are still appropriate, and that this Committee has performed a most praiseworthy service by again deliberating the most vital of questions—how do we go to war?

MAJOR DIFFERENCES BETWEEN KEY OPERATIVE PROVISIONS OF THE SENATE WAR POWERS BILL AND THE CONFERENCE REPORT

1. Prior authority: The Senate bill carefully enumerated the President's emergency powers in explicit language. It cited three emergency situations into which the President could commit troops: an attack on the U.S. or its possessions, an attack on American forces legally deployed abroad, and the rescue of American nationals abroad. Only in these situations was the President given prior limited unilateral authority to deploy troops (for a 30-day period). The House bill simply required the President to consult and report with Congress when U.S. forces were committed pursuant to his understanding of his powers (for a 120-day period). The divergence in these two basic approaches, the so-called authority versus performance tests, proved to be the undoing of the Act in my opinion. The Conferees settled on language similar to an authority test but, tragically, placed it in a meaningless "Purposes and Policies" section of the Act that is totally without effect.

2. Automatic cutoff provision: The Senate bill allowed troops deployed under the Act to remain so deployed only for 30 days unless Congress acted to authorize a further deployment. The Conferees settled on a 60-day period (with an additional 30 days for safe disengagement). The practical effect of this compromise, taken together with the gutting of the prior authority provision outlined above, was to permit Presidential war to be waged for 90 days.

3. Rescue of American citizens abroad: The Senate bill provided prior authority to the President to use troops to rescue Americans in danger abroad, a Presidential prerogative that has been upheld by the courts. The Conferees dropped that provision.

EVOLUTION OF WAR POWERS BILL FROM SENATE TO HOUSE AND, THENCE, OUT OF CONFERENCE

	Senate	House	Conference
1.	Authorities of President described in detail	So-called "performance test": President simply reports on deployment	"Authorities" described in nonbinding section.
2.	30-day period within which President can act without congressional approval, with additional time for safe removal.	120-day period	60-day period, with 30 additional days for safe withdrawal.
3.	A bill or statute could force withdrawal of troops before 30-day period expired	A concurrent resolution could force withdrawal	A concurrent resolution could force withdrawal.
4.	Suggested need for collective judgment	Required Presidential consultation in emergency situations	Required Presidential report within 48 hr of commitment of troops.
5.	No peacetime deployments affected	Peacetime deployments covered as well as into hostilities	Peacetime deployments covered by reporting provision but not automatic termination.
6.	Operative any time President acted, even in defending against direct attack	Excluded military actions within territory and possessions of United States.	Operative anytime forces involved.
7.	Use of U.S. forces in hostilities triggers 30-day period	Final decision to commit forces to be followed within 72 hr by report to Congress triggers 120-day period.	Introduction into hostilities or imminent hostilities.
8.	Introduction of troops to include military advisers directly involved in combat-related activities	Military advisers not covered	Military advisers or other hostilities-related personnel covered.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum with the time to be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 11:45 A.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have conferred with the minority leader on the request I am about to place and he concurs.

There is a briefing in room S-407 on the situation in Lebanon offered by the administration for Senators on both sides.

In view of that, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now stand in recess until the hour of 11:45 a.m.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 10:43 a.m., recessed until 11:45 a.m., whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. GORTON).

AUTHORIZATION FOR FURTHER U.S. PARTICIPATION IN MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN LEBANON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159) to authorize the further participation of U.S. Armed Forces in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

The Senate continued with the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, as a Senator from the State of Washington, suggests the absence of a quorum, the time for which will be charged equally to both sides. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 12:15 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the briefing in the secure room on the Senate side is still in progress. I would estimate it will take at least 25 more minutes to complete or for Senators to find their way back to the floor.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in further recess until the hour of 12:15 p.m.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 11:48 a.m., recessed until 12:15 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. KASTEN).

QUORUM CALL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the briefing on Lebanon is still in progress in the secure room on the Senate side. I am trying to ascertain the needs of Senators to speak while that briefing is going on.

If there is no requirement for Senators to speak, I am inclined to ask the Senate to recess again. But while we are trying to make that determination, I ask unanimous consent that I may now suggest the absence of a quorum with the time charged equally against the allocation of the two sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I now suggest that absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be recinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as I indicated a moment ago, the briefing is still in progress. There are meetings of an official nature off the floor that will begin at 12:30 p.m.

I have consulted with the minority leader who is agreeable to the request I am about to put.

RECESS UNTIL 1:30 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in light of these two circumstances and the requirement that Senators attend in both instances, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now stand in recess until 1:30 p.m.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 12:18 p.m., recessed until 1:30 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. ABDNOR).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I announced earlier, before the recess, that today is sort of cut up. We had a briefing this morning in the secure room on the Senate side of the Capitol that lasted longer than expected. Then there was a caucus off the floor of the Senate. Those caucuses, while not of an official nature, are quasi-official and go a long ways toward setting the direction and policy of the Senate, and it is desirable, therefore, to accommodate them.

I understand a caucus is still in progress involving many Senators. While I ascertain whether there is a need for additional time, in which event I would ask the Senate to recess again, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order for me to suggest the absence of a quorum with the time to charge equally against the adversaries as described in the statute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as I said earlier, a caucus is still in progress and will be for some little while. I ask unanimous consent, at this time, that the Senate stand in recess until 2 p.m.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 1:31 p.m., recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. BAKER).

The Senate continued with the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 159.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for the recess having expired, the Chair recognizes the Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I should like to offer several observations respecting the resolution which has been introduced by the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to authorize continued U.S. participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

While there has been much learned in the Senate regarding the details of the War Powers Act and its applicability to the current situation in Lebanon, I should like to address my remarks rather more to the first finding and purpose stated in the joint resolution before us. Section 2 declares that

The Congress finds that . . . the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East.

I repeat this:

The Congress finds that . . . the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East.

Mr. President, the thrust of my argument today will be that this congressional declaration is fundamentally at odds with the proposition set forth by Walter Lippmann in his classic study, "American U.S. Foreign Policy: Shield of the Republic," which was published in 1943, in the middle of the Second World War, and which carries on its title page a line from George Washington's 1796 Farewell Address, which is read here every February on the anniversary of his birth. Washington wrote of the moment:

When we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

It is the fundamental thesis of Walter Lippmann's book that the controlling principle of foreign policy must be that the Nation maintain its objectives and its power in equilibrium.

Lippmann wrote of:

The compelling and, once seen, the self-evident common principle of all genuine foreign policy—the principle that alone can force decisions, can settle controversy, and can induce agreement. This is the principle that in foreign relations, as in all other relations, a policy has been formed only when commitments and power have been brought into balance. This is the forgotten principle . . .

Lippmann wrote in 1943, though it is as true in 1983—

. . . which must be recovered and restored to the first place in American thought if the nation is to achieve the foreign policy which it so desperately wants.

. . . a foreign policy consists in bringing into balance, with a comfortable surplus of power in reserve, the nation's commitments and the nation's power.

I take a moment to restate the parallel between the two texts to which I refer. The joint resolution says, in the first instance:

The Congress finds that the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective.

By a happy circumstance of the calendar, it was precisely 40 years ago—I recall reading this as a very young man—Walter Lippmann put forth the proposition that the controlling principle of foreign policy is that the Nation maintain its objective and its power in equilibrium.

My purpose this afternoon is to state that if the Senate should vote to adopt the resolution before us, an eventuality that seems quite probable, we shall be acting completely contrary to Lippmann's wise dictum by asserting an objective in foreign policy that it is quite beyond our power to attain. Disequilibrium shall accordingly be the result, marked by turmoil, setbacks, even defeat, though defeat may be postponed by deeper engagement, wider commitment of our armed forces and political energies.

It is astonishing to think that the White House would have sponsored this proposal, that a President—any President—could have agreed to sign this resolution. Yet, though one may be dismayed, one cannot act surprised. As I have said before, there is a leakage of reality in this administration that somehow seems impossible to overcome. To declare as essential what cannot be achieved is to insure failure.

Consider for a moment what the United States will be saying with this resolution. We are saying that the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is the essential U.S. foreign policy objective. That means, in the first instance, and most specific instance, that the Syrian Army will evacuate, leave Lebanon.

In what reasonable circumstances could we contemplate that happening?

Mr. President, I say that there is only one circumstance, and that is in the event a U.S. expeditionary force of some considerable size were sent to Lebanon to drive the Syrian Army to the borders of Syria.

Having attained the initial condition of this essential objective in U.S. foreign policy, how would we then maintain that condition? Only by leaving our expeditionary force on the borders of Syria indefinitely. For the moment we departed, the Syrian Army would reappear, and our essential foreign policy objective would once again have failed of attainment.

HISTORY OF LEBANON

There is a history here known to most Members of the Senate but perhaps not widely known in the country. It is a history of an obscure segment of the Ottoman Empire, and the mandates of the treaties of peace that followed the First World War.

The first thing to know, and I think the most important thing to know, it is that until September 1920 there never was a nation called Lebanon.

France, under the peace treaties that followed World War I, was assigned a portion of the Ottoman Empire as a mandatory power. Much as the British were to divide their nearby mandate in the area into the states of Palestine and Trans-Jordan, and the like, the French proceeded to create two new states in their mandate.

The borders of the modern nations of Lebanon and Syria were drawn by functionaries in some department in the Quay D'Orsay. The state of the greater Lebanon included not only the former autonomous Turkish province of Lebanon but also Tripoli, Sidon, Tyre, and Beirut, some of which, in earlier times, had been under the control of the Amirs of the Lebanon.

In 1941, the Free French commander, General Catroux, formally declared Lebanon a sovereign independent nation. In 1943, a National Pact organized the government confessional lines according to the 1932 census, the last one taken in that country, which seemed to give a majority to the Christian Maronite community.

It is important to note that the government in Syria did not then, and has never, recognized the existence of a country called Lebanon. Successive Syrian rulers have viewed Lebanon as simply part of Greater Syria with its capital in Damascus.

Note that there had never been, until after the First World War, a country called Syria. Far back in biblical history there was a country we know as Assyria, and there is a Syrian culture and a Syrian people, much as there is a Levantine people. But a national country with borders and constitutions and flags and great seals, no.

Like Lebanon and Jordan, Syria is one of the results of the League of Nations arrangements that followed the defeat of Turkey in the First World War. Again, its independence really came with the defeat of France in the early part of the Second World War.

Yet Syria, having attained its independence of empires, has asserted an imperial claim to the land and people of Lebanon. This, in short, is how the Marines came to be invited to Lebanon.

In 1975, in an open, unabashed act of aggression, Syria invaded Lebanon which had maintained a precarious peace among its many different elements until that time but by then internal peace was in fact breaking down.

The West chose at the time to do nothing about this. I can report that I was then the American Ambassador to the United Nations. We knew the Syrians were moving in. We knew that the Soviets were providing significant amounts of aid to leftist forces through the Lebanese Communist Party.

The Lebanese Ambassador, a good man of great personal qualities, Edouard Ghorra, asked to see me. I said, of course. He said: "My country is being invaded by the Syrians. Is there any hope of American help?"

This conversation took place at the United Nations, where a clear violation of the Charter was occurring on television and on the front pages.

Ghorra asked if there was any hope of American help. I had to say to him that there was none, that the United States—this was the administration of President Ford—would do nothing. And we did nothing.

I was not speaking from instructions from Washington. I was speaking from my understanding of the political atmosphere in our Capital. The next administration did nothing either.

Finally, as Syrian power extended down into the Bekaa Valley; as an extraordinary emplacement of PLO forces located themselves above the Litani River, there came a time when the Soviets had so militarized that region that it posed a clear and direct threat to the security of Israel. The Israelis responded as they have done before when attacked, they responded militarily, and the situation we now see came into being.

Having watched Lebanon be destroyed from within and without by Syrian forces relying on the Soviets, over 8 years, we now suddenly decided the United States should do something.

There was a time, at the moment of the invasion, when the crime was committed, we did nothing, said nothing, proposed nothing, intimated nothing, expected nothing from anybody else.

I recall the French—and I do not mean to be derisory—sent their former Prime Minister, Pierre Mendes-France for a 2-day inspection tour 8 years ago. He returned to Paris and said there was nothing to be done.

We go from the point of doing nothing, proposing nothing, at the time the problem was created, to declaring that undoing the events of 1975 has become an essential American foreign policy objective.

Are these serious persons who drafted this resolution? Had they ever heard Walter Lippmann's thesis, that a nation's commitments must be in equilibrium with its power?

Mr. President, we do not have the power to do what this resolution promises we shall. We could gather together forces from around the globe and make our way to the Syrian border, abandoning other strategic positions which should be protected—but, as I stated earlier, this would only be for the purpose of staying at the Syrian border indefinitely, because the moment we departed the Syrian Army would come right back in and our essential U.S. foreign policy objective would be undone again.

Ask what this means, this abrogation of a fundamental principle of sound foreign policy—that one's commitments must be in equilibrium with one's power.

After 8 years of absolute inaction, never asking the French to do anything serious—it was their mandatory power—never making clear to the Syrians that those could be costs to them for their policies; never asking the Saudis to influence the Syrians whom they finance, what was a matter of indifference has become essential to American objectives.

Mr. President, I spoke earlier of a leakage of reality in the present administration. I believe that with great conviction. Time and again, one observes its highest officials making commitments that they are in no way able to keep and then, upon learning of the inability, reversing themselves and American policy.

We enjoyed more than normally interesting experience here in the Senate and in the country within the past few days. Last week a deputy representative at the United Nations—who, one learns today, has already offered his resignation from the post—invited the members of the U.N. to leave the United States if they chose, and he offered some rather colorful language which has led some to observe that the State Department still seems to have not found out that the Sun sets in the West, and he invited 156 members of the U.N. to sail off into the sunset, which of course would be toward Jersey City.

When the President, upon reflection, endorsed the suggestion that the U.N. think about leaving the United States, this aroused a great feeling of patriotism among the Members of this body. By the end of the day on which the President's remark was carried in the press, last Thursday, the Senate had voted overwhelmingly to cut our contribution to the United Nations in half. We showed those Reds. And then we showed them some more, for the amendment we adopted, by vote of 66 to 23, also stipulated that if this unilateral action was not formally accepted by the U.N. we would cut our contribution off completely.

Mr. President, 20 years ago there was one institution in the world that wanted the United Nations out of the United States, and that was the John Birch Society. It has since been joined by the Government of the Soviet Union.

It would be my view that we should cooperate with neither, but we did. Only in the dawn's early light—not until, if I may say, I called it to their attention in an essay that appeared yesterday on the op ed page of the New York Times—did they recognize that if we did this we would lose our right to vote in the General Assembly.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 27, 1983]

U.N. DO THE DAMAGE

(By Daniel Patrick Moynihan)

In his address yesterday to the United Nations General Assembly, President Reagan did not repeat his suggestion of last week that the United Nations consider itself free to leave New York City or that, alternatively, delegates divide their time between New York City and Moscow. His speech was conciliatory, and in ways a retraction. Even so, there is damage to be undone.

Mr. Reagan's remarks were voiced last Wednesday and appeared in the press Thursday morning. Thursday evening, an aroused Senate voted, 66 to 23, to cut our contribution to the United Nations and its principal agencies by one-half—or completely if the organization does not accept our unilateral decision on what has always been a negotiated sum.

The United Nations Charter provides that a member two years in arrears on its financial contributions "shall have no vote in the General Assembly." If America defaults, as the Senate action would have us do, there would unquestionably be a move to transfer United Nations headquarters to Geneva—or, more likely, to Vienna, because Vienna is more to the Soviet Union's liking. The move would surely succeed, and it would mark, as the columnist Joseph Kraft has written, "the decline of this country as a great power." It would date the collapse of the post-World War II arrangement for a world order. It would almost certainly lead to general disorder and possibly general war.

The nation and New York City have been done a disservice.

The decision to situate the United Nations in New York City did not come automatically, or even easily. The Charter was signed in San Francisco on June 26, 1945. A Preparatory Commission met in London the following November, with one of its duties that of finding a permanent location. (The first General Assembly also met in London.) There was strong sentiment for a European site, but that failed by a 25 to 23 vote. The decisive factor seemed to have been the judgment of Trygve Lie, the first Secretary General, who believed the League of Nations had failed largely because America had refused to join and that a location in the United States would make it difficult for us to withdraw should our traditional isolationism emerge once more. (As it now appears to be doing?)

Our representative on the commission, Adlai E. Stevenson, said that the United States would warmly welcome the United Nations—Congress had so resolved—but would not seek to influence the decision. By contrast, Andrei A. Gromyko indicated that the Soviet Union supported having the headquarters in America. (Just why, we will not know until the Gromyko papers are opened. The Russians no longer hold that position.) The commission finally agreed and New York City was chosen when John D. Rockefeller Jr. donated $8 million for the Turtle Bay site, and Mayor William O'Dwyer, working with Robert Moses, found $30 million for the various improvements we think of as United Nations Plaza.

So at first the decision on where to put the United Nations was not a political statement. Thus, the diplomatic center of the world was put in the principal city of the world's most important democracy. But the decision became political, for World War II did not end totalitarianism.

This has made the United Nations more, not less important to the democracies, for the Charter commits each member to a regime of at least minimal political and human rights.

The Charter states, in part:

"We the peoples of the United Nations determined

To save succeeding generations from the scourge of war * * *

To reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights * * *

To establish conditions under which justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law can be maintained. * * *"

It is of inestimable value that these are the proclaimed standards of the nations of the world, to which they are bound by solemn covenant.

Is there a double standard at the United Nations? Of course, there is. Two-thirds of its members are in gross violation of that covenant, and they take it out on us. But we can give as good as we get, not least because we have the Charter on our side. (We have our own double standard, mind. The totalitarians in Peking can say anything, vote any way, concerning America. We respond by offering arms.)

It had seemed that this General Assembly would concentrate on Soviet conduct. Now it is we who are the most likely targets, and this time the criticism won't be as easy to dismiss.

President Reagan, losing no time, should demand that the Senate reverse itself.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Our having lost our right to vote, there would in a very short order materialize an effort to have the United Nations depart from the United States, presumably to Vienna, where the Soviets would most like it to be.

We have violated a fundamental commitment made to the United Nations, which is principally that although we do not have any commitment to pay any fixed amount, we do have a commitment to negotiate what we will contribute. This is done in the Fifth Committee of the General Assembly.

But we showed them, did we not?

Two days later, on this past Sunday, the President was obliged to express his dismay that the Senate had followed his lead. One imagines all manner of officials at the White House suddenly seeing the light and saying to himself, "Oh my gosh, what have we done this time."

The President expressed his dismay to the Secretary General of the United Nations on Sunday.

This morning, Mr. President, we learned that George P. Shultz, our distinguished Secretary of State, a man who has won the respect of every Member of this Senate, was yesterday pursuing his difficult duties in New York, at the United Nations. With his counterparts from Britain, France, and Italy, Secretary Shultz was investigating whether we could not get the United Nations to contribute to the peacekeeping forces in Lebanon.

The same United Nations the administration had just told to sail into the sunset, and the same United Nations which, to show those Reds, the Senate had just cut off every penny. This same United Nations found Secretary Shultz in its midst, hoping to secure the assistance of the United Nations in Lebanon.

The Secretary of State's work, as difficult a job as there is in Government, has been rendered still more difficult by the inclination of others in his administration to say what they cannot mean. They do not seem to understand that, for good or ill, they won the last election. They are required now to govern.

Another illustration of the leakage of reality occurred just a few days ago.

The President very much desires that we increase the funds available to the International Monetary Fund. This of course is to deal with a world financial crisis occasioned in large part by the interest rates of the United States, largely brought about by the economic policies of this administration. Having made a career of speeches against international "globaloney", the President now recognizes that this country needs an international monetary system. We need it more than anyone.

Yet just 2 months ago, in the House of Representatives, the National Republican Congressional Committee was raising money for Republican candidates by accusing Democrats who had helped the President defeat an amendment that would have immobilized the IMF of supporting communism."

My very good friend, Representative DAVID OBEY of Wisconsin, has been very blunt on the meaning of this. He has said, in effect, "Mr. President, if you want this legislation passed, you apologize."—not personally, not in any undignified way, but simply to say the Republican Campaign Committee's position was wrong and does not represent the policy of the administration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the relevant documents of Mr. OBEY's request to the administration.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., September 15, 1983.

DEAR COLLEAGUES: I warned Treasury Secretary Regan two years ago in a hearing before the Foreign Operations Subcommittee that it would be very difficult for Democrats to show bipartisan support for the administration on issues such as international banks which we know are not popular politically, but are essential to U.S. interests, if we are subsequently attacked for our efforts by members of the President's party. I stated, "People like to be statesmen around here, but they do not like to be suckers." Well, there are 160 of us who have been treated like suckers on the IMF authorization bill (H.R. 2957).

During consideration of that bill, Congressman Gramm introduced an amendment calling for the U.S. Executive Director of the IMF to actively oppose any loans to communist dictatorships. You and I voted against the Gramm amendment, as did Minority Leader Michel and the Ranking Minority Members of the Banking and Appropriations committees. The administration opposed such restrictions, and the Republican controlled Senate had voted down similar provisions in their IMF authorization. We agreed with the administration position that such restrictions were counterproductive. Most of you subsequently voted for the final passage of the IMF authorization, again in support of the administration position, despite certain qualms about benefits to the banks.

The very next day, the National Republican Congressional Committee issued a release in the districts of 20 Democrats who voted, as the administration wished, against the Gramm amendment. That release accused them of supporting communism by that vote. I have enclosed a "generic" copy of the release with this letter.

I am asking you to sign the enclosed letter to the conferees which urges them not to bring back a conference report on the IMF until the President has sent a letter of affirmation to those who supported him on this issue. I have informed Minority Leader Michel and Secretary Regan that I am taking this action, and warned them that unless such a letter from the President is received, the IMF legislation faces certain defeat. Please join me in seeing that the administration plays fair on this issue. As the letter states, we do not want to bring down the IMF. We do want to prevent a situation in the House which will make it impossible for needed legislation to pass in the future because House members are attacked when they put national interest ahead of political considerations. And let there be no mistakes about it. This is the kind of situation that has been created and will not be rectified without such a letter from the President. If you wish to sign the letter to Chairman St Germain, please call Cindy Taylor or Mike Marek in my office on 225-3365.

Sincerely,

DAVE OBEY,
Member of Congress.

(NAME) VOTES TO LOAN MONEY TO COMMUNIST NATIONS

WASHINGTON.—U.S. Rep. (Name) voted yesterday to loan U.S. taxpayers' money to communist nations. The vote came during consideration of H.R. 2957, the bill authorizing funds for the International Monetary Fund (IMF).

"It's a slap in the face of the taxpayers of this country that would vote to give loans to communist dictatorships," charged Congressman Phil Gramm (R-TX), author of an amendment to prevent the loans. "Further, how can this vote be explained to the veterans of our country who have fought against the dangers of communism?"

Congressman Gramm offered his amendment to the International Recovery and Financial Stability Act. Gramm's amendment, which had strong bipartisan support, passed overwhelmingly. The vote was 242-185. (Name) voted "no."

"Over $8 billion goes to the IMF for loans. It's unconscionable that (Name) would want that money to go to bail out the bankrupt governments of communist nations," continued Gramm.

"How could these members show such total disrespect for the freedom we've always fought for?" Questioned Gramm. "What gives them the right to vote to support communism?"

"In this vote we had a clear choice: prevent the hard-earned money of the working people of this country from going to communist dictatorships, or support communism. Obviously (Name) chose to support communism rather than the people of this country," said Gramm. "It's impossible for (Name) to justify this total disregard of our country's taxpayers," concluded Gramm.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Finally, Mr. President, I just want to note that this morning on the front page of the New York Times a headline reports "Reagan Praises IMF and Warns Congress Over Delays in New Aid."

The cause of the delay is the leakage of reality among the President's supporters. The President is trying to fix the problem it has caused the United States. Soon they will be coming here asking the Senate to reverse the action we took on Thursday night. They will have to. And I suppose we will do it.

In the end we have to be responsible. And after all it was we who acted the other night. But there is no question what we were reading in Thursday morning's press remarks about how interesting an idea it would be if the United Nations spent at least half its time in Moscow and so forth.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I state that the same thing will happen if we adopt a resolution declaring it to be an "essential U.S. foreign policy objective" that we bring about a military solution in Lebanon which we have not got the capacity to bring about.

There has not been a wiser proposition set forward about American foreign policy than that of Walter Lippmann in 1943. This was the time America was beginning to realize it was going to have to have a foreign policy. The absence of one had brought Pearl Harbor to us. The absence of one had caused us to send our armies over the whole of the globe. The great fighting of the Second World War was about to begin, in the summer of 1943.

Lippmann wrote:

Without the controlling principle that the nation must maintain its objectives and its power in equilibrium its purposes within its means and its means equal to its purposes, its commitments related to its resources and its resources adequate to its commitments, it is impossible to think at all about foreign affairs. Yet the history of our acts and of our declarations in the past fifty years will show that rarely, and never consistently, have American statesmen and the American people been guided by this elementay principle of practical life.

I propose, Mr. President, that the resolution before us will bring about disequilibrium and worse. And, as much as I regret to say this to the distinguished authors of the resolution, I propose to vote against it.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. President, I yield for a question, but I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. I would like to put a question to the Senator from New York. Would not the Senator agree that one of the burdens of leadership is to seek to carry through a responsible policy in all quarters which that policy will be passed upon? It is not sufficient, as President of the United States, to go before the IMF and tell them that the quotas have been increased and at the same time not take the actions which he must take with respect to the Congress to help bring that about. In fact, in that instance, the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee has played some of the meanest brand of politics I think any of us have ever seen. The President, on the other hand, is telling the IMF that he needs this quota and, on the other hand, is doing nothing to set right the actions of his own party with respect to its harsh attack on those Members of the House of Representatives who voted to carry the President's program through.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Exactly. The Senator from Maryland, who served with such distinction in the House, has made this point. Is it schizophrenic? Is it cynical? Is this the leakage of reality I discussed? I do not know which, but I do recognize it is and so does he.

Mr. SARBANES. What about the U.N. issue? The President went before the United Nations on Monday and told the United Nations that he was a strong supporter of the United Nations and affirmed the American commitment to the United Nations. At the same time, earlier the President had contributed to unleashing forces in the country and in the Congress which helped to lead to the very deep slashes in the American contribution to the United Nations. It was the President who said that the comments of the deputy representative reflected the views of the American people with respect to sailing into the sunset. It is the President who suggested that maybe they ought to go elsewhere for part of the year.

How can you play it both ways? How can you feed those fires, those passions, and then turn around and go before the United Nations and be Mr. Responsible and say, "Well, now we really come to tell you what strong supporters we are," when, at the same time, you have turned loose the very forces that are undercutting the support for the United Nations?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I would say to my distinguished friend that there comes a time—and the majority leader is on the floor and I hope he might hear this and the distinguished minority leader is on the floor—there comes a time when the issue of character arises. I say that with care and, I hope, restraint.

There comes a time when the issue of character arises.

Can a leader, or a ruling party, repeatedly say one thing and do another? Can you repeatedly appeal to the most primitive of political responses in people while engaging in the necessary conduct of the world's most important democracy?

Mr. SARBANES. Let me take it a step further. The Secretary of the Interior of this administration has made outrageous comments reflecting attitudes that I believe the overwhelming majority of the American people reject, and yet the President is tolerating his presence. What message does that send to the Nation in terms of the kind of attitudes we are willing to tolerate? And this is not someone out on the street who has got some prejudiced ideas. This is a member of the President's Cabinet, holding one of the most important positions in the Nation.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Could I not ask the Senator from Maryland, what must the Secretary of State be thinking, as he goes up and down the corridors of the United Nations today asking the United Nations for help in our problems with Lebanon, in the aftermath of what the Senate has done and what the President has said?

It seems to me they had better decide either to be a government or a permanent opposition. Should they choose to be a permanent opposition, it would be fine by me.

Mr. President, I thank you for your patience. I thank my friend from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is recognized.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I rise to advise the Senate of my position regarding the use of American troops in Lebanon.

This matter has caused me great anguish, as I am sure it has for most Senators. The President has sought, through the use of this country's power and prestige, to bring peace to a part of the world which for so many years has only known conflict.

For many years, I have been deeply troubled that the Congress has spawned too many would-be Secretaries of State, ready at a moment's notice to take pot shots at anything the sitting administration—Democrat or Republican—seeks to do. As a result, we have confused both friend and foe around the world with our many voices, when we should have been speaking with only one. If America is to have an effective foreign policy, then the President, in consultation with the Congress, must serve as the primary spokesman and leader in this vital area.

But in spite of these considerations, I find that I must with great reluctance disagree with my President on Lebanon.

After very careful examination of these issues, I have concluded that our ground troops are serving no useful military purpose in Lebanon, except as sitting ducks, and that the President should withdraw them as quickly as prudently possible. I am reluctant to tell him that this withdrawal should occur tomorrow, but certainly it should be accomplished long before even a 6-month time limit is reached. We should be considering days or at most a few weeks, not months, and so I intend to vote against the 18-month limit which the President has requested.

It is my general feeling that American ground forces should only be employed in rare instances where there is a clear military objective that can only be achieved through the use of combat troops on the ground. In most instances, we should seek to achieve our policy objectives through the supply of friendly forces, and there may be occasions when we can effectively assist in accomplishing our purposes through the use of air and sea power. In those exceptional instances when ground forces are employed, they should be sent in sufficient numbers to rapidly achieve whatever military mission they are assigned.

Unfortunately, it does not appear to me that the marines in Lebanon have a realistically achievable military objective, and, therefore, should be withdrawn. They are having little discernible impact on the political situation in Lebanon, yet are being asked to risk their lives nonetheless.

I was one who opposed the introduction of American troops into Lebanon in the first place. More than 14 months ago, on July 8, 1982, I wrote to President Reagan expressing my opposition to sending U.S. troops to Lebanon. Yet, I hoped that the President was right and I wrong, that our troops might be able to stop the violence that has racked that nation for so many years. The news of the ceasefire is welcome, but in a country that has had 200 cease-fires since 1975, I think that further violence should be expected.

Both the Soviet Union and Syria are eager to interfere in Lebanese affairs. However, this interference must not blind us to one essential fact—Lebanon is engaged in a civil war. Like all civil wars, the Lebanese war will be fought with exceptional savagery and bitterness, with particularly dire consequences for the defeated parties. It will continue to rage, with or without foreign interference.

Under such circumstances, why do we maintain a U.S. ground force in Lebanon? Recent military developments have shown that the concept of the protective screen is not working. In the light of those developments, we are faced with three fundamental options. First, we can expand our commitment, taking an active, military ground role on behalf of the current Lebanese Government. Second, we can simply stay put, maintaining our forces at their present level. Third, and finally, we can withdraw our ground forces.

So far as expanding our commitment is concerned, does anyone in this body sincerely believe that the American people wish to send substantial ground forces into the Lebanese interior? Have we considered the heavy casualties which we would take if we chose to push our forces into the forbidding terrain of the Chouf Mountains? In my opinion, such a military initiative would serve only to unite many of the now warring parties into an anti-foreign, anti-American coalition.

Therefore, we withdraw or we stay put. However, our forces no longer provide a protective screen for the Lebanese Government. The decay of the Lebanese Government has rendered them impotent, through no fault of their own. The hard fact of the matter is that our marines in Beirut serve little purpose other than to provide targets for warring Lebanese artillerymen.

In reality, we do not enjoy a series of options. We have only one option—withdrawal of the Marines.

Mr. President, I do support the finding embodied in this resolution that the War Powers Act should be invoked. The purpose of that legislation was to cover situations like this.

But I still cannot support this resolution for the reasons I have stated. Our ground troops should not be used as political pawns in any world situation. They should be committed only when there is a clear military objective and in sufficient force to achieve that objective.

The President has tried to find a way to peace in Lebanon through the use of American troops. Regrettably, it does not seem that it is a course that will work. Giving him the authority to keep the Marines in Lebanon for another 18 months will only prolong, in my judgment, an ultimately fruitless course of action.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in a private conversation with the minority leader off the floor a moment ago, I was apprised of the fact that I believe he is going to offer an amendment to the pending resolution. I will yield the floor if he wishes to do that.

I would inquire of the minority leader, if he, in fact, offers that amendment, whether it would be possible to dispose of that amendment today?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I personally would be amendable to the idea of voting on it at 5:30 today, which would give us 3 hours on this amendment.

Mr. CHILES. On this amendment or final passage?

Mr. BYRD. On this amendment. Senator PELL indicates 5 o'clock. Is that agreeable with Mr. NUNN? On or in relation to the amendment by 5 o'clock or at 5 o'clock?

Mr. NUNN. The Senator's amendment?

Mr. BYRD. The amendment I am offering.

Mr. NUNN. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. I think that would be agreeable.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the minority leader was kind enough to show me a copy of the amendment, which I looked at briefly but not in detail. I would favor that. But before such an agreement can be entered into, as he will understand, I will have to check our people on this side and see how we might proceed. But I would suggest that Senators assume that we may be able to work that out, to have a vote on or in relation to this amendment at 5 o'clock. I will shop for that and I will have a further announcement to make.

Mr. SARBANES. Is the request at 5 or by 5?

Mr. BYRD. I would suggest it be at 5, so Senators will be on notice. Does the Senator have a suggestion to the contrary?

Mr. SARBANES. No.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, we will shop, may I say to the majority leader, to see if we can have a vote no later than 5, possibly earlier.

Mr. BAKER. All right.

Mr. President, may I take this opportunity to say, as I have said, I believe, on yesterday and again this morning, it is not the intention of the leadership on this side to ask the Senate to remain past about 6 o'clock today. So setting a time would be a great convenience from that standpoint so we will know approximately when this vote will occur.

I also understand from my conversations with the minority leader that there may be other amendments offered to this resolution. If that is so, then I assume we will not get to final passage of this resolution until tomorrow.

Mr. BYRD. In response to the majority leader, I indicated to him that we have discussed this matter in caucus. There will be two or three other amendments, as I read the caucus, two or three others. It would seem to me we would not have any difficulty in disposing of those two or three others by 2 o'clock tomorrow or perhaps earlier.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I will confer with the minority leader to adjust the time for coming in so that we will have adequate time to dispose of any remaining amendments prior to the expiration of the statutory time at 2 o'clock tomorrow. We will work that out without any difficulty, I am sure.

THE CONTINUING RESOLUTION

Also while we have just a moment, I would presume to ask the minority leader if he has any insights into the progress we might make on the CR, the continung resolution. It will be up next, unless we have unemployment benefits extension next. There has been a strong request by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee to try to keep the CR clean. I share that view.

Let me add this to the record for the consideration of all Senators. I made this information available to the minority leader already.

I spoke with the Speaker today and indicated to him, after the colloquy I had this morning with the minority leader, that the Senate would find it very difficult to agree to a continuing resolution that extended until November 17 if we are going to go out sine die on November 18. I believe the Speaker understands that and would not object to the Senate changing that date if such a CR comes over here to make it November 10, or thereabouts, so that we would have adequate time to deal with the CR in a rational and reasonable way.

I also made one other suggestion, Mr. President, to the Speaker—and I certainly do not presume to speak for him. I suggested it would be a lot easier for Senators not to offer their amendments to the CR if there are some other appropriations bills coming along and especially whether or not one of the two supplemental bills might reach us in time to deal with them before sine die adjournment. The Speaker acknowledged that, I might say, on the floor, as I am now doing, that he will try to complete action on a supplemental and have it here before November 10 so that we could address the supplemental appropriations issue and perhaps amend it as the Senate might wish.

I think that may enhance the chances, at least on this side, to get by without amendments to the CR and maybe get a time agreement on it. That leads me to the next question. That is what the minority leader thinks our prospects might be for getting a time agreement on the CR or completing action on it tomorrow.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I yield for a question.

Mr. SARBANES. Is it the majority leader's intention to take up the unemployment benefits ahead of the CR so that that problem will be addressed and be off the agenda and taken care of?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President, that is my wish, because I think we simply cannot dare let that go by without completing action. I intend to consult, however, with Senator DOLE, the Chairman of the Finance Committee, and Senator HATFIELD, of the Appropriations Committee, before I make a final decision in that respect. My preference at this moment would be to do the unemployment benefits extension first.

Mr. BYRD. It is my hope, may I say to the majority leader, that we could do the unemployment compensation extension first. I would say that our chances of getting a time agreement on the continuing resolution, possibly without any amendments, is just 50-50.

I would hope that inasmuch as we discussed it in our talks today, knowing where those possible amendments are coming from, we might be able to work it out in a way that would avoid any amendments.

Mr. BAKER. Very well. Mr. President, I will say on my own behalf as a Senator from Tennessee that I would find it very difficult to refrain from offering a Clinch River Breeder Reactor amendment to the CR. If everyone else does not, maybe I will not either. We will see how that goes. I do not think I have set a bad example for anybody yet. I do hope there is a chance we can get the CR out of the way and save our fights for another day, more especially on the supplemental.

Mr. BYRD. Or the November 10th date.

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

AMENDMENT NO. 2231

(Purpose: To require the President to submit to the Congress the report required under Section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution and to specify the roles and missions of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon; and to extend the 60-day period for 60 days from the date of enactment, provided that the President submits the report.)

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Mr. NUNN, Mr. CHILES, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. DIXON, Mr. EXON, Mr. FORD, Mr. GLENN, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SASSER, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. PELL, Mr. DODD, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. PRYOR, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia (Mr. BYRD), for himself, and Mr. NUNN, Mr. CHILES, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. DIXON, Mr. EXON, Mr. FORD, Mr. GLENN, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SASSER, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. PELL, Mr. DODD, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. PRYOR, proposes an amendment numbered 2231.

SECTION 1. The Congress finds that—

(a) Starting on August 29, 1983, the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Peacekeeping Force in Lebanon were introduced into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities were clearly indicated by the circumstances as provided for in section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution;

(b) Not later than August 31, 1983, a report from the President was required to be submitted by the President to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate pursuant to section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution, which was required to include the following information:

(1) The circumstances necessitating the introduction of the United States Armed Forces into Lebanon;

(2) The constitutional and legislative authority for the introduction of the United States Armed Forces into Lebanon; and

(3) The estimated scope and duration of the hostilities, or of the imminent involvement of the United States Armed Forces in hostilities.

SECTION 2. Not later than 48 hours after the enactment of this resolution, the President, as required by section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution, shall submit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate a report containing the information required by paragraphs (A)-(C) of section 4(a) of the War Powers Resolution, together with the following additional information:

(a) A description of the specific goals of United States policy in Lebanon;

(b) A description of the specific roles and missions of the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Peacekeeping Force in Lebanon, including the governing rules of engagement for fulfilling the goals of United States policy in Lebanon; and

(c) A description of the specific criteria that are being applied to determine when the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Peacekeeping Force in Lebanon have successfully accomplished the roles and missions described in clause (b).

SECTION 3. Pursuant to section 5(b)(2) of the War Powers Resolution, the 60-day period specified in section 5(b) of such Resolution is hereby extended for 60 days from the date of enactment of this resolution, provided that the President complies with the requirements of Section 2 of this resolution.

SECTION 4. Nothing in this resolution modifies, limits, or supercedes any provision of the War Powers Resolution or the requirement of Section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, relating to Congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of the United States Armed Forces in Lebanon.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if any other Senator wishes to become a cosponsor, I will add their names.

(The name of Mr. HOLLINGS was added as a cosponsor.)

Mr. GLENN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, a few days ago Secretary Shultz and General Kelley appeared before the Committee on Foreign Relations to explain the executive branch's view concerning the proper role for the United States in Lebanon. At that time, I indicated that we all agree that the stakes in Lebanon are high, and we certainly all want to see a strong and united Lebanon. We all want to see the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon. We all want to see an enduring peace in the Middle East. In fact, I submit that on these goals a real consensus exists between the Congress and the administration. And if goal setting was all there was to it, few would voice opposition to the original resolution we have before us today. But many of us believe that before we commit American troops to a situation involving hostilities or imminent hostilities, we need to ask how the President plans to achieve his stated goals, and at what cost and risk.

At our hearing, I asked Secretary Shultz four questions.

First, is there any reason why we should not expect to be involved in direct armed conflict with the Syrians before this is over?

Second, how many more troops will we have to commit before we achieve success in our stated mission? I will get to his statement of our mission in just a moment.

Third, are we, after a year of military involvement in Lebanon, closer to or further from a peaceful resolution of the problem?

Fourth, is there any plausible scenario by which we avoid unlimited escalation of our involvement on the one hand or disastrous withdrawal under fire on the other?

I have yet to receive a satisfactory answer to these questions from anyone. Instead, goals and objectives are repeated along with a plea for an 18-month blank check.

Secretary Shultz stated before the committee that:

From the beginning, we have had essentially three policy objectives in Lebanon: The withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon; a sovereign, independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity, and able to exercise its authority throughout its national territory; and security for Israel's northern border, so that the inhabitants of northern Israel can live in safety and without fear of artillery and rocket attacks.

OK, fine. I accept these as legitimate and laudable objectives for the United States to pursue. But many questions remain unanswered. For example: How do we propose to achieve these goals? What are the chances for success? How does the role and mission of U.S. Marines in Lebanon fit into the equation? How long do we anticipate being directly engaged militarily in Lebanon? And does achievement of these goals risk war with Syria? On these and other related questions the administration remains silent both publicly and privately. Such silence is substantively wrongheaded and, in my judgment, patently illegal.

The War Powers Act of 1973 clearly states that:

In the absence of a declaration of war, in any case in which U.S. Armed Forces are introduced * * * into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances * * * the President shall submit within 48 hours to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the President pro tempore of the Senate a report, in writing, setting forth—

(A) The circumstances necessitating the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces;

(B) The constitutional and legislative authority under which such introduction took place; and

(C) The estimated scope and duration of the hostilities or involvement. * * *

It further states:

The President shall provide such other information as the Congress may request in the fulfillment of its constitutional responsibilities with respect to committing the Nation to war and to the use of U.S. Armed Forces abroad.

Mr. President, the administration has said that because our forces are on a "defensive" mission, they are not required to submit such a report under the War Powers Act. I think such tortured logic would indicate that Pearl Harbor was not combat, because we were on the defensive. To say, when marines are being killed and wounded, when we are giving purple hearts and they are given combat pay, that hostilities have not been reached is just tortured logic. I ask again: Where is that report? What is the scope and duration of our problem? And what is the plan for achieving our policy objectives?

Some probably will argue that a secret plan exists over in the White House or in Mr. McFarlane's briefcase. They might even argue that they do not share it with us because of constitutional differences surrounding the War Powers Act. Flouting the law of the land in that fashion would be bad enough, but I think it is even worse than that. I am afraid they do not have a plan. I am scared to death they do not have any idea what the scope or the duration of our involvement in Lebanon may be. They appear to be long on hope and short on specifics.

Originally, we committed the marines to Lebanon to facilitate the PLO's withdrawal from the Beirut area.

I underline Beirut area, because I am going to have something to add to that in a moment. Later, we reintroduced our forces as part of the MNF to provide a peacekeeping presence in Lebanon limited by agreement strictly to the immediate Beirut area and in a noncombat role.

To go back to that briefly, the Government of Lebanon sent a letter to the United States on September 25, 1982. In that letter, they requested our presence in Lebanon. I ask unanimous consent to have this letter and the subsequent letter printed in the RECORD as part of my speech.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Beirut, September 25, 1982.

His Excellency FOUAD BUTRUS,
Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs Beirut,

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to refer to Your Excellency's note of 25 September 1982 requesting the deployment of an American Force to the Beirut area. I am pleased to inform you on behalf of my Government that the United States is prepared to deploy temporarily a force of approximately 1200 personnel as part of a Multinational Force (MNF) to establish an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area. It is understood that the presence of such an American Force will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area, an objective which is fully shared by my Government, and thereby further efforts of the Government of Lebanon to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring to an end the violence which has tragically recurred.

I have the further honor to inform Your Excellency that my Government accepts the terms and conditions concerning the presence of the American Force in the Beirut area as set forth in your note, and that Your Excellency's note and this reply accordingly constitute an agreement between our two Governments.

ROBERT DILLON,
Ambassador of the United States.

REPUBLIQUE LIBANAISE,
MINISTERE DES AFFAIRES ETRANGERES,
Beirut the 25th of September 1982.

His Excellency ROBERT DILLON,
Ambassador of the United States.

YOUR EXCELLENCY. I have the honor to refer to the urgent discussions between representatives of our two governments concerning the recent tragic events which have occurred in the Beirut area, and to consutations between my government and the Secretary General of the United Nations pursuant to United Nations Security Council Resolution 521. On behalf of the Republic of Lebanon, I wish to inform Your Excellency's Government of the determination of the Government of Lebanon to restore its sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area and thereby to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring an end to violence that has recurred. To this end, Israeli forces will withdraw from the Beirut area.

In its consultations with the Secretary General, the Government of Lebanon has noted that the urgency of the situation requires immediate action, and the Government of Lebanon, therefore, is, in conformity with the objectives in U.N. Security Council Resolution 521, proposing to several nations that they contribute forces to serve as a temporary Multinational Force (MNF) in the Beirut area. The mandate of the MNF will be to provide an interposition force at agreed locations and thereby provide the Multinational presence requested by the Lebanese Government to assist it and the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) in the Beirut area. This presence will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area, and thereby further efforts of my government to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring to an end the violence which has tragically recurred. The MNF may undertake other functions only by mutual agreement.

In the foregoing context, I have the honor to propose that the United States of America deploy a force of approximately 1,200 personnel to Beirut, subject to the following terms and conditions:

The American military force shall carry out appropriate activities consistent with the mandate of the MNF.

Command authority over the American Force will be exercised exclusively by the United States Government through existing American military channels.

The LAF and MNF will form a Liaison and Coordination Committee, composed of representatives of the MNF participating governments and chaired by the representatives of my Government. The Liaison and Coordination Committee will have two essential components: (A) Supervisory liaison; and (B) Military and technical liaison and coordination.

The American Force will operate in close coordination with the LAF. To assure effective coordination with the LAF, the American Force will assign liaison officers to the LAF and the Government of Lebanon will assign liaison officers to the American Force. The LAF liaison officers to the American Force will, inter alia, perform liaison with the civilian population and with the U.N. observers and manifest the authority of the Lebanese Government in all appropriate situations. The American Force will provide security for LAF personnel operating with the U.S. contingent.

In carrying out its mission, the American Force will not engage in combat. It may, however, exercise the right of self-defense.

It is understood that the presence of the American Force will be needed only for a limited period to meet the urgent requirements posed by the current situation. The MNF contributors and the Government of Lebanon will consult fully concerning the duration of the MNF presence. Arrangements for the departure of the MNF will be the subject of special consultations between the Government of Lebanon and the MNF participating governments. The American Force will depart Lebanon upon any request of the President of Lebanon or upon the decision of the President of the United States.

The Government of Lebanon and the LAF will take all measures necessary to ensure the protection of the American Force's personnel, to include securing assurances from all armed elements not now under the authority of the Lebanese Government that they will refrain from hostilities and not interfere with any activities of the MNF.

The American Force will enjoy both the degree of freedom and movement and the right to undertake those activities deemed necessary for the performance of its mission for the support of its personnel. Accordingly, it shall enjoy the privileges and immunities accorded the administrative and technical staff of the American Embassy in Beirut, and shall be exempt from immigration and customs requirements, and restrictions on entering or departing Lebanon. Personnel, property and equipment of the American Force introduced into Lebanon shall be exempt from any form of tax, duty, charge or levy.

I have the further honor to propose, if the foregoing is acceptable to Your Excellency's Government, that Your Excellency's reply to that effect, together with this Note, shall constitute an agreement between our two governments.

Please accept, Your Excellency, the assurances of my highest consideration.

FOUAD BOUTROS,
Deputy-Prime Minister,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I shall not read all of both letters now, although they will appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point. I note that in the letter from the Lebanese Government they begin by requesting our Government's participation and our attention to recent tragic events, which have occurred in the Beirut area.

It goes on that on behalf of the Republic of Lebanon, they wish to inform us of the determination of the Government of Lebanon to restore its sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area, thereby to assure the safety of persons in that area and bring to an end the violence that has recurred; to this end, it is stated, Israeli forces will withdraw from the Beirut area.

It continues and asks for our participation with part of several nations to form a multinational force to come into, I underline again, the Beirut area.

The mandate of the multinational force would be to provide a peacekeeping force and so on in the Beirut area. This presence will facilitate the Lebanese Government's sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area.

It goes on and on, talking about our coming in with 1,200 personnel to Beirut. It states in the latter part of the letter that it will only be needed for a limited period of time.

In our letter back to the Government of Lebanon, we repeated the phrase "in the Beirut area" five different times. Your Excellency, we say in the opening of that letter, I have the honor to refer to, and so forth, requesting the deployment of an American force to the Beirut area. It is understood the presence of such an American force will facilitate the restoration of the Lebanese Government's sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area.

Once again, even in the last paragraph, concerning the presence of the American force—it states yet one more time—in the Beirut area.

Now we come back and find the Secretary of State's declaration of why we are in Lebanon now to be, to quote from the Secretary's statement:

Our purpose in being there is to provide a sovereign, independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity and able to exercise its authority throughout its national territory.

That is one of the purposes.

Obviously, there has been a tremendous expansion—somewhere in the State Department or the administration—of our role in Lebanon, well beyond the limited role we were asked to come in and perform, and which we agreed to perform. Now we have four marines killed and many others wounded in combat and have commited an aircraft carrier, the battleship New Jersey, and another group from the Indian Ocean to support our forces in Lebanon. Our mission has also expanded to include seeing to the withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon and apparently after that U.S. forces will remain on until a sovereign, independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity is able to exercise its authority throughout its national territory.

I come back to my original proposition: Even if we succeeded in persuading the Syrians to withdraw their forces from Lebanon—a task that may well be impossible to achieve through diplomacy alone—we would still face the reality of a deeply divided Lebanon. In Lebanon's 40-year history, turbulence and factionalism has occurred repeatedly. It has suffered continued challenges to its sovereignty and independence. And how do we propose to put an end to this sad and difficult history today? This is, do not forget, a nation that has had some 200 ceasefires in the past 7 or 8 years. The frank answer, unfortunately, is we do not know. We just hope it all works out for the best.

Those who argue that in a time of crisis we have a responsibility to close ranks behind the President and present a solid bipartisan coalition to our adversaries have a point. But, I submit that we have an equally compelling duty not to follow the executive branch over each and every precipice like sheep. And if we blindly sign on to the 18-month blank check requested, that is exactly the direction we are heading.

That is the reason I support the substitute amendment that the minority leader just submitted to the desk. But, I have no illusions. I can count votes as well as anyone. Right now it looks as if the Baker resolution will pass, but it may well be close. The President may get his blank check, but it may also demonstrate that there are significant divisions within the ranks. Is that the message we want to sent to the Lebanese Government? The Israelis? The Syrians? I think not.

Rather than have a close vote and suffer unnecessary international embarrassment and the perception of a lack of resolve, why can we not go back to square one and start over, the proper way this time. That is in the best interests of the executive branch, the Congress, the American people and Lebanon. I urge my colleagues to consider this option. It would consist of three simple steps:

First, the President should invoke the War Powers Act as required by law.

Second, he should submit to Congress a report that includes the expected scope and duration of U.S. involvement in the hostilities, hostilities which we are already involved in.

And third, he should outline publicly or privately his plan for achieving our state policy objectives in Lebanon and how this relates to the commitment of U.S. Armed Forces there.

Such an approach is still possible. It is the sensible thing to do. It is the right thing to do. I urge the leadership to consider it seriously.

Mr. President, I add one other statement, and that is that the first thing you learn in the military is that you scale your forces and their equipment to accomplish very specific objectives, or you do not commit them. We do not have such a definition of purpose in Lebanon right now. Our purposes are vague, calling for the establishment of a national sovereignty over the whole nation of Lebanon. And 1,200 marines or a multinational force are not likely to give that kind of national sovereignty potential to the armed forces of Lebanon.

If, pursuant to the original letter to us from Lebanon and our reply to them, we are to have a mission in the Beirut area—underline "in the Beirut area"—let us specify the mission. Let us get the multinational force together, and let us bring the 7,000 UNIFIL troops from southern Lebanon in as part of that group, and then we would have truly an international group—and we would not see this potential crisis developing into a confrontation between the United States and Syria. At least we would have a mission, and we would be assigning our forces to accomplish that mission.

Short of that, I see our involvement in Lebanon going on for an indefinite period, with additional casualties. I do not think the American people want that, I do not think Congress wants that, I do not think the Senate wants that—and certainly I do not want that.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I believe that Congress should vote again, before we adjourn at the end of this session, on the presence of U.S. Armed Forces in the Multinational Peacekeeping Force in Lebanon. The volatile nature of the conflict in Lebanon requires at least this much participation and periodic oversight by Congress if we are to exercise our serious responsibilities under the War Powers Act.

We should authorize our Armed Forces to remain in Lebanon only for another 60 days, by which time Congress should act again to review our military involvement and to determine whether an additional statutory extension for the presence of our troops is appropriate.

The merit of this proposal is that it neither enforces an unreasonably short deadline for our military role in Lebanon nor enacts an unreasonably long period of authorization with respect to the critical decisions that may await us on the use of American combat forces in Lebanon.

Congress won an extremely important showdown with the President last week over the applicability of the War Powers Act. Whatever qualifications the President may still have in mind, he is on record last week and again in his letter yesterday that he will acquiesce in our view that the War Powers Act applies to Lebanon and that he will sign this compromise resolution saying so.

How, then, can we win so much last week and give it all back today by bowing out of Lebanon for the next year and a half?

Are we too timid to exercise our constitutional responsibility? Are we too fearful of Ronald Reagan to actually use the hard fought victory we won from Richard Nixon 10 years ago, when we rose up and voted 75-18 in this Chamber to override a Presidential veto and make the War Powers Act a part of the statutes of the United States? How could we write the War Powers Act into law because of Vietnam, and then write it off for Lebanon?

Some say that Lebanon is not Vietnam. But I reply, we must not give the President the power to turn it into one.

I reject any approach by Congress to Lebanon under the War Powers Act that says to President Reagan, "Take 1,600 marines and the battleship New Jersey, and call us in 1985."

The fundamental issue in this entire debate is the length of time that Congress is prepared to authorize our troops to remain in Lebanon under the War Powers Act without another look.

In my view, the 18-month period in the pending resolution is far too long. It permits the President to continue U.S. military involvement without further congressional participation until March 1985. That sort of open-ended extension violates the spirit of the War Powers Act. It is an abdication by Congress of our constitutional and statutory responsibilities on the most difficult question of all—the question of war and peace.

None of us can foresee at this time the course of events in Lebanon. The cease-fire achieved over the past weekend is a hopeful sign that progress is being made toward a negotiated settlement and toward a new coalition government that fairly serves the interests of all the parties to the conflict. All of us hope that the progress of recent days will continue, and that an agreement will be reached which will permit our forces to come home. But these possibilities of peace are far too uncertain to warrant a decision by Congress to abandon our proper role under the War Powers Act, by writing a blank check for unilateral action by the President over the next 18 months.

The wisest course for Congress to follow now is to insist on periodic review of our military role in Lebanon—and at intervals short enough to permit us to act quickly in the wake of sudden changes in the circumstances of our involvement or a flareup in the hostilities.

No one should underestimate the enormous difficulties which we face in Lebanon. There are serious questions not only about how long we should be there, but why we are there, and whether we should be there at all. Our Marines have a right to our support, but they also have a right to know that they are in Lebanon with the full approval of both Congress and the American people, in accord with the laws of the land. They do not have that approval today, and it is irresponsible for Congress to pass the buck to the President when we know he does not have the country behind him.

It was also disturbing, therefore, to learn from the Secretary of State and others in the administration last week that the President may still feel free to disregard the War Powers Act and ignore the proper role of Congress with respect to the continuing presence of our troops in Lebanon. Yesterday's letter from the White House allays—but hardly ends—this concern. And it is doubly unwise for us to relax our vigilance under the War Powers Act when a constitutional confrontation over it may yet lie ahead of us.

Whatever our views on the appropriate length of the authorization in the pending legislation, there is broad bipartisan agreement in Congress that the War Powers Act is now in operation and that the President must obtain the approval of Congress to maintain our military forces in Lebanon beyond the end of October. In these circumstances, the most that Congress should do now is to extend the deadline until the end of the present session. Before we adjourn, we should have the opportunity to review the presence of our forces in the circumstances prevailing at that time. If there is a legitimate justification for our continuing military involvement, a further extension should be granted. If not, our troops should come home. That is what the War Powers Act means, and that is why we passed it in the first place.

It is in the highest national interest to maintain the strongest and broadest possible support for any continued presence of our Armed Forces in Lebanon. The administration and Congress can accomplish that goal only through regular review and reauthorization for the involvement of our troops.

That is why the framers of the Constitution, recognizing the fundamental nature of actions that could take the country into war, prudently intrusted these decisions to the joint responsibility of the President and the Congress. That is why the authors of the War Powers Act in 1973 created a careful accommodation between the President's constitutional responsibility as Commander in Chief and Congress constitutional responsibility to declare war and to maintain America's Armed Forces.

As the war powers resolution itself explicitly states, its historic purpose is to "fulfill the intent of the framers of the Constitution of the United States and insure that the collective judgment of both the Congress and the President will apply to the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into hostilities, or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances, and to the continued use of such forces in hostilities or in such situations."

The all-important words in that provision are: "the collective judgment of both the Congress and the President." That is all we are seeking in this amendment—to insure that the actions we take on Lebanon truly reflect this collective judgment.

Under the current difficult circumstances in Lebanon, it is imperative that the clear procedures of the War Powers Act be strictly observed. There is now no attempt by the administration to claim that the present situation in Lebanon does not involve hostilities within the meaning of the War Powers Act. The President has indicated that he will sign the pending resolution, which specifically finds that the war powers resolution is in effect for Lebanon. Indeed, there can be no other rational conclusion.

Since the end of August, marine positions have been repeatedly shelled by the Druze militia. Four marines have been killed in the last 4 weeks and 42 have been wounded. U.S. forces on the ground and offshore have returned hostile fire, and the President has authorized the use of air strikes to protect our forces.

And these Presidential orders go beyond retaliation for direct assault upon U.S. positions. Now, our forces are authorized to help defend Lebanese Army positions as well, if those positions relate in some way to the safety of our troops.

The President labeled the fighting in Lebanon an "outright civil war," and the Pentagon authorized hostile fire pay for our forces. With or without the present cease-fire, it is plain that, by any responsible definition of the term, the situation in Lebanon involves "hostilities" within the meaning of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Act.

All of us hope that the present cease-fire will hold, that our diplomacy will succeed, and that the multinational force in Lebanon will be able to turn its functions over to the Lebanese Armed Forces or a United Nations peacekeeping force as soon as possible.

Short of complete success, however, it is possible that the current peace initiative will make progress, but that the continued presence of the multinational force will be required to support the initiative. Alternatively, if the circumstances deteriorate in the next few months, there may be no justification whatever for our continued military presence. If there is no peace to keep, it makes no sense to maintain a peacekeeping force. In that event, it should be up to Congress and the President together—not the President alone—to decide whether our troops still belong in Lebanon.

I support the overall objectives of American policy in Lebanon. Two years ago, Senator BOSCHWITZ and I sponsored legislation enacted by Congress setting forth a series of fundamental principles, including withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon, support for a sovereign and independent Lebanon, and respect for the legitimate rights of all the Lebanese communities.

To achieve these larger goals, the United States and other concerned nations must step up the diplomatic pressure on Syria and the PLO to withdraw completely from Lebanon. Syria has never recognized the sovereignty of Lebanon. Its actions since 1975 have consistently undermined the integrity of Lebanon and intimidated both its Government and its people. While it has accepted the current cease-fire, it is Syria that has been blocking the withdrawal of foreign forces from Lebanon, despite an explicit request from the Government of Lebanon for Syria to leave. It is Syria that has permitted PLO forces to return to the areas around Beirut—and these are the very forces that were responsible for so much destruction and devastation in Lebanon and for so many terrorist attacks on Israel.

And behind Syria stands the Soviet Union. The Soviet rearmament of Syria last year and the introduction of advanced SA-5 surface-to-air missiles have served only to embolden Syrian designs on Lebanon and solidify the intransigence of the Syrian Government. There is a clear military pipeline that extends from Moscow to Damascus to the Soviet/Syrian surrogates in Lebanon itself.

The challenges we face in Lebanon are an extremely difficult test of American foreign policy. Achieving a lasting cease-fire, encouraging the process of national reconciliation and securing the withdrawal of foreign forces will require sensitive and creative diplomacy by America and by other nations. Without full cooperation between Congress and the administration, our policy is far less likely to succeed.

The resolution before us should be the vehicle for establishing a framework of strong bipartisan cooperation between Congress and the President as events in Lebanon unfold. This amendment will achieve that goal, by guaranteeing the proper role for Congress in the difficult days to come. I urge the Senate to adopt it.

I yield back the floor.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I believe that every Member of this body who has spoken on this issue has begun with a statement of his or her own deep concern about the situation in Lebanon. All of us have that concern because it is very likely that there is no clearly correct answer. My concern is not, however, with the number of months for which we may authorize our presence in Beirut or in Lebanon, not about either the time or the procedures with which we are dealing here, but with the substance.

I would have wished that we had not begun our intervention or our peacekeeping mission in that most unhappy of nations. We have in fact done so. We have now before us only a series of unpleasant alternatives, but we must deal with those alternatives. I fear greatly that we are following in this connection what has all too often been our course of action in the several decades since the end of the Second World War, and that is to say an intervention sufficient deeply and properly to concern the American people, to threaten the lives of American military and civilian personnel alike, but an intervention too little, too timorous to have any strong impact on the outcome which we seek.

And it may well be that that is the situation in which we find ourselves in the Republic of Lebanon. Nevertheless, it seems to me at this point that we have essentially only three appropriate courses of action.

The first is that presented eloquently by the senior Senator from Delaware (Mr. ROTH)—to leave promptly, completely and quickly.

The second is that proposed by the amendment which is before us at the present time—to allow a cautious continuation of our present presence in Lebanon subject to constant review by Congress.

Third, of course, is the course of action recommended by the President and by the majority leadership in the Senate and by the leadership of the majority in the House of Representatives.

I regret to say that it seems to me that of those three unpalatable, unpleasant alternatives, only the third has any reasonable chance of success in bringing peace to Lebanon and to the Middle East peace which is so important to us now and so important to our future.

We have noted in the past several days some cautious progress. First, the cease-fire, which we all hope and pray will continue for an extended period of time, but the continuation of which we deeply fear may be uncertain.

Second, some recognition on the part of conflicting sectarian groups in Lebanon, that they have no future unless the future is in living together and in making some new arrangement under which they can live together in that nation in peace.

Lebanon may not be subject to salvation. Lebanon may eventually be partitioned in two, three, four or even more separate sectarian enclaves. But while we have any realistic chance of seeing to it that Lebanon is whole and at peace, it is certainly worth some effort on the part of this Nation to try to reach that goal.

Having started down the course which the President began more than a year ago, if we precipitously leave Lebanon now, we will almost certainly be followed by France, by Italy, and by

Great Britain. That almost inevitably would be followed by an even greater increase in the sectarian violence which has so plagued Lebanon over an extended period of time, by further intervention in Lebanon's internal affairs on the part of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, Syria, and perhaps Israel as well.

The risk of a new war between Israel and Syria would be greatly increased. And if that occurs, it will be difficult in the future, as it has been in the past, for us to stand aside idly and in a neutral fashion while such a war, with such dangerous potential impact to the entire Middle East, takes place.

The consequences of our leaving precipitously, it seems to me, are therefore likely to be extremely negative and are likely to threaten, in the relatively short range, more American lives, not to mention our ability to work toward peace in the world, than is the case by our staying.

The second alternative, of course, is that proposed by the present amendment, to go along reluctantly with what the President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives propose to do, but constantly to redebate this issue every 60 days or every 90 days, through the course of an election campaign in which the temptations to engage in partisan bickering will become more and more overwhelming and, at the same time, to show an extremely uncertain trumpet, both to our friends and to our foes in the Middle East.

How, I wonder, can we be a force for peace in the Middle East, and most specifically in Lebanon, if we are constantly subject to the proposition that a temporary majority in one House or another can cause a precipitous withdrawal 60 days from now, 90 days from now, during the course of a political debate next year?

(Mr. ROTH assumed the Chair.)

Mr. NUNN. Will the Senator from Washington yield just for a brief observation and question?

Mr. GORTON. The Senator is delighted to yield to his friend from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I thought about the Senator's comments and appreciate the choices he has posed. I do believe, however, that the Senator has incorrectly described the amendment that the Senator from West Virginia has sponsored.

I would take exception to a description of that amendment as going along with the President and the Speaker in limiting the time. The Byrd-Nunn-Chiles amendment says to the President of the United States and to the Congress that we cannot make the decisions that the War Powers Act envisions unless we have a definition of the mission of the Marines from the President.

The resolution which the Senator described as being option No. 3, the Percy-Baker resolution, cites and I will quote that resolution:

. . . in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory.

This is the closest statement I can determine that resembles a mission.

I have just been through 3 days of hearings on this, and I have not heard the administration yet tie the Marines to that goal. What they have tied them to is the first goal in the Percy-Baker resolution which states: "the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon." This is not directly tied to the marines, but implicitly tied to them in foreign policy.

This seems to be the very broad goal the administration is describing. This Baker-Percy resolution is basically saying that if we pass it as it now stands, we are willing to keep the Marines force in Lebanon until the Government of Lebanon has complete control over its own territory. That is about as broad an open-ended commitment as anyone can make.

So I take exception to the description of the Senator from Washington of the Byrd resolution as going along with the President and the Speaker. It is just absolutely the opposite. It says that we cannot make a decision rationally until the President defines clearly the mission. There is no better example of why we need to get that mission defined by the President than the Baker-Percy resolution which describes the marines as being there not only for the implicit purpose of removing foreign forces from Lebanon, but for the expressed purpose of restoring full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory.

I submit that what we are on the verge of doing here today—if we do not pass the Byrd resolution and if we instead pass the Baker-Percy resolution—we are endorsing what is virtually an open-ended commitment by the Congress. This is a congressional resolution—the Baker-Percy—that is broader in its description than even the administration's own description of its mission in terms of the marines. We are endorsing an open-ended commitment and we are implicitly limiting the means whereby that commitment can be carried out.

If there is any lesson from Vietnam—and I am one of those who questions the analogy to Lebanon in terms of geography and so forth—but it is relevant to compare the kind of open-ended commitment we had in Vietnam with the limited means with which we were ever willing to carry it out. This is precisely the trap we are about to fall into if we pass the Baker-Percy resolution.

So I would just ask the Senator from Washington—and I appreciate his being so patient, and I realize this is more an observation than a question—but I would ask him if he would take a very careful look at the Byrd resolution, the substitute or the Baker-Percy amendment. I hope that he would look at it with a view of being not endorsing what the President and the Speaker have agreed on in simply cutting the timeframe, but rather questioning the whole premise under which that agreement was entered into without the administration ever being required to come forward and define precisely what the marines are doing in Lebanon and without their being willing or able of defining the conditions under which we would withdraw those marines. I simply ask the Senator to take another look at the Byrd amendment in that light.

I thank him very much for being patient enough for me to make that clarification.

Mr. GORTON. The Senator is delighted, as always, to hear the thoughtful concerns and message of his friend the senior Senator from Georgia. But having listened to that concern, his views are essentially no different.

It seems to me that the overwhelming thrust of the amendment which is before us now is to cut down, very substantially shorten, the commitment which the United States is willing to make in Lebanon.

I would have been willing to consider more carefully a proposal that we simply reject any further use of our troops in Lebanon at all because at least it would be a clean cut. At least it would say: "We have no interest in this subject matter whatsoever. We were wrong to go in in the first place. We should return home."

To say that unless the President of the United States rephrases the resolution he proposes in some way which is more satisfactory to those who oppose this commitment, an objective which I strongly suspect could never be met, which will simply lead to another objection 30 or 60 days from now, seems to me to be totally unrealistic.

I believe that such an uncertain response to the problem which we face today would almost inevitably result in more violence in and around Beirut, almost inevitably result in more casualties to the marines who are stationed there, than would the acceptance of the resolution in the form agreed to between the majority leader, the President, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

It seems to me that the default which is taking place here is the placing of limitations on a commitment once a commitment is made. And to surround it by even more limitations is indeed the mistake we have made in our foreign policy and in our use of military forces in a number of other places around the world in the course of the last 10, or 15, or 20 years.

I am concerned about the limitations with which we are faced here in this resolution. I would be even more deeply concerned about those included in this amendment, which seem to me to be designed simply to prolong the debate—which has perhaps gone along for too long a period already—and which provide no certain leadership and no certain direction.

The goals of the Baker-Percy resolution are worthy goals. I question whether or not they can be reached. I do note that in this resolution there is an opportunity, on a short-end basis, not subject to filibuster, to make a change, to withdraw this authority if the Congress deems it necessary to do so at any time.

As a consequence, I continue to submit that the worst choice that we can make is to do this 1 month, or 2 months, or 3 months at a time, to try to dot every "i," cross every "t," and enter every comma as to precisely what our mission is, when we really do not know what the future will bring. It would be better, I would submit, to leave right now, completely, to say, "a plague on all your houses in Lebanon," to let whatever civil wars that go on go on, and not concern ourselves with whether or not there will be another war between Syria and Israel in the immediate aftermath of our leaving.

I do not like the situation that we are going to face if we pass the resolution which was put before us. But I like even less an attempt to establish in advance a situation in which every few months we will incur new limitations, engage in new guesswork, whether looking backward or looking forward, beyond what we have in this resolution.

I would hope, I would fervently hope, that the administration will have our Marines out of Lebanon in a period of time far shorter than the 18 months provided for in the resolution.

I would hope that at that point we will be on the road not only to peace, but to reform within Lebanon itself.

I would have been far more concerned, and I was for all practical purposes ready to come to this floor and speak against the resolution, when we were faced with the proposition articulated last week by the Secretary of State that we were not engaged in this body in any meaningful action whatsoever; that if we passed the resolution, the administration could nevertheless change both the number of troops and their functions at will, without returning to the Congress for guidance.

I am satisfied by the representations of the President and the majority leader that if there is to be any change in numbers or locations or function which is substantial in nature that we will have this matter before us again. But I believe now, faced with a group of unpalatable alternatives, that the single alternative available to us which is most likely to bring peace, most likely to be least costly to the United States of America, most likely to be successful, is not to engage in more debate over limitations, but to vote yes or no on the resolution as a whole, and, I deeply regret to say, to vote in favor of it.

Mr. MATHIAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, we are now in the closing hours of a debate that began on September 12 when I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 159, the war powers resolution. The Nation has moved a considerable distance since that day. The resolution has been amended in committee to include a delicate compromise that authorizes the President to keep U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon up to 18 months. I reluctantly supported this compromise in the Foreign Relations Committee in the belief that if a shorter period were adopted there, the broad principles of the War Powers Act might be abandoned before they could be considered on the floor.

Before I comment on the compromise, I would like to set out some of the background of Senate Joint Resolution 159 which is before the Senate today.

On August 30, after we had received news, the tragic news, that the first two Marines had been killed by hostile fire in Lebanon, I wrote privately to President Reagan urging him to invoke the war powers resolution on his initiative and to seek congressional participation in the difficult decisions facing the United States in Lebanon. I made this request, as I told the President, because I believed that new conditions existed which require that both the executive branch and the Congress reexamine their responsibilities under the war powers resolution. Two days later, on September 1, Mr. Duberstein, Assistant to the President, acknowledged my letter, saying that it was being shared with "appropriate foreign policy advisors."

I was particularly disappointed that the President did not choose to report to Congress under section 4(a)(1) of the resolution. But I did not give up hope that, on reflection, he would do so. On September 10, when I heard nothing further from the White House, I publicly announced that I would introduce a resolution on September 12, which was the day the Senate reconvened after the August recess. By giving this advance notice, I hoped to prompt the President to take the initiative himself.

By September 12 it was clear that the White House did not intend to act and so I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 159, on which we will act shortly.

In this connection, I might recall a passage in the Federalist Paper No. 75 which has been attributed to Alexander Hamilton, in which he wrote:

> The history of human conduct does not warrant that exalted opinion of human virtue which would make it wise in the Nation to commit interests of so delicate and momentous a kind as those which concern intercourse with the rest of the world to the sole disposal of a magistrate created in circumstance as would be the President of the United States.

Interesting and elegant words by a man so closely associated with the writing of the Constitution and its ratification by the States.

Since September 12, events have moved rapidly. Most importantly, of course, a cease-fire has been announced which, if it can be sustained, will allow the process of political reconciliation to begin anew in Lebanon. For this we owe thanks to Prince Bandar of Saudi Arabia, as well, of course, to our own Ambassador McFarlane and Ambassador Fairbanks.

But we should not let our relief over this new development distract us from the task of thoughtfully examining the resolution and the responsibility that lies before us. The fragile nature of the cease-fire only underlines the importance of our task.

During the debate I have heard, as I did just a moment ago, a number of Senators express reservations about the compromise agreement. I have heard the reservations of Members of the other body who have recently been in Lebanon. I think it is fair to say that all of us are concerned. I, for one, am certainly concerned.

The President's expressed reservations about even the compromise resolution essentially postpone the constitutional questions for another day. In addition, nothing in this resolution brings us to grips with the central issue facing our Nation in Lebanon and in the Middle East.

The resolution offers only partial restrictions on the use of American forces in Lebanon by limiting the number of Marines on shore to 1,200. The level of U.S. air and sea power which can be used is not significantly restricted, but, Mr. President, it would violate both the spirit of the compromise and the general understanding if it were escalated without mutual agreement.

The resolution also leaves unresolved what is rapidly becoming a central dilemma of our evolving policy in Lebanon. For many years, the United States has been the "honest broker" in the Middle East. We have been able to speak to the opposing sides in regional conflicts. Our recent involvement in the hostilities in Lebanon threatens to compromise that unique ability to act as a peacemaker. If that should happen, then one must ask, who will fill the void?

There are, of course, some important strengths in this resolution. Section 2(b) contains a congressional determination that actual or imminent hostilities involving U.S. Forces clearly came into being on August 29, 1983. Having made that determination, the resolution goes on to provide the necessary authority for the President for the continued participation of Marines in the multinational force "consistent with section 5(b) of the war powers resolution."

So, as a matter of principle, we invoke war powers.

By successfully invoking the war powers resolution at the first time troops have been introduced into a potentially hostile environment and kept there more than 60 days, we will have set an important precedent. Our great colleague, long a distinguished Member of the Senate, Jacob Javits of New York, has said—and I will quote his words because I think his words are of such value:

> This course of action establishes the proposition that Congress may set the clock running under the resolution, even if the President does not trigger it, by given the appropriate notice under the proper section of the resolution which U.S. troops are deployed abroad.

I think Senator Javits has correctly assessed the situation.

Notwithstanding the President's expressed reservations, his signature constitutes executive acceptance that the resolution is fully consistent with, and supportive of, the constitutional role of the Congress recognized in the war powers resolution.

On a procedural level, the legislative history of this resolution helps to clarify one of the grey areas of the war powers resolution, where "hostilities" is not defined beyond its "plain meaning." The fact that for 1 year the Congress after hearings and review agreed with the President's assertion that hostilities were not imminent and then, upon observing a change in the situation on the ground, invoked section 4(a)(1) indicates that at some point a threshold was crossed where hostilities occurred.

In effect, the Congress has determined that the exchange of fire with hostile forces would indicate an outbreak of hostilities and a high probability of such exchanges would suggest "imminent involvement". So we have now, through legislative history, provided the definition that the original act did not provide.

These features of the compromise resolution are important and worth preserving. To provide Congress with additional check reins two amendments to this resolution were adopted by the Foreign Relations Committee. Rather than receive reports from the administration every 6 months, as originally proposed, Congress will now receive reports every 3 months. In addition, any joint resolution or bill which is intended to amend the 18-month authorization will receive expedited procedures on the floor of the Senate or the House.

So, Mr. President, we are on the threshold of historic action today. It is action that not only will affect the course of U.S. policy in months and years ahead, but will affect the constitutional relationship between the executive and the legislative branches of the U.S. Government for the unforeseen future. I know that every Member of the Senate views the action that we will take today in that grave and serious light.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MATHIAS. Surely, Mr. President.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator for yielding.

This is a solemn moment, Mr. President, as the Senator from Maryland reflects in the tone of his comments. It is solemn for all of us, for obvious reasons. I am troubled about two things and I should like the Senator's feeling about them in light of what went on in the Committee on Foreign Relations.

My first point is one has been mentioned by other Members today, and that deals with the exchange of letters between the U.S. Government and the Government of Lebanon in September 1982. The text of those letters makes it very clear that our intervention had to do with concern about events within the Beirut area.

As the Senator knows, the language is quite precise in laying out a very limited scope of operations for our forces participating in the international military force.

Now we have come down through time and we have before us a resolution from the committee, authorizing a very dramatically broadened role for U.S. Marines. It has been cited that the language under section 2, items 1, 2, and 3, and so forth, says we now stake out a new objective, namely, the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is essential to the U.S. foreign policy objective in the Middle East, going on to restore the sovereignty and authority of the government in Lebanon, and so forth.

One sees a very sweeping statement of commitment by our Government if we pass this; it has the Senator's name and mine. Whether we vote for or against it, it has the imprint and the stature of the approval of the Senate of the United States to an enormously expanded definition of purpose. I must say that I am really troubled about that. I do not quite understand how we go from that earlier starting point of a narrow definition of purpose to what is now a very sweeping one that seems to leave us wide open to all kinds of potential problems and caveats in terms of future actions that we may be required to take in keeping with that commitment.

The second item has to do with the assurances or lack of assurances given to the committee by the Secretary of State last week, when he was questioned very carefully as to whether or not it was his intention or the intention of the administration to abide by the provisions of the resolution if the resolution is passed. I know the Senator from Maryland himself is a very careful person in the use of words, commitments, and phraseology, who expects and gives precise answers to very important specific questions, I must say, as I read the exchange that took place between Secretary Shultz and members of the committee who were questioning him on the point of whether he intends to be bound by even the provisions of the resolution, it is clear to me his answers were evasive. They were not clear-cut, they were equovical. I am deeply troubled by that. Perhaps the Senator from Maryland is as well.

I am wondering, in both areas, if he can give me some sense of why we have gone from that earlier very narrow purpose to, now, almost the broadest possible purpose and also what I really thought was the evasion by the Secretary of a clear-cut commitment to the precise language of the resolution if enacted.

Mr. MATHIAS. First, let me say that I agree with the Senator from Michigan with respect to the collective responsibility of the Senate. If the resolution passes 100 to 0 or passes 51 to 49, the Senate of the United States is fully committed. I think we have that kind of collegial responsibility. That is what makes it important to have thorough understanding of what we are about as we approach these decisions. The world may view a landslide result slightly differently, but I think we, ourselves, cannot view it differently. The responsibility is ours with a decision that is made in accordance with our procedures, no matter what the vote count may be. So I think the Senator is right that we need to know precisely what we are doing.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator, just at that point, yield briefly?

Mr. MATHIAS. Yes.

Mr. RIEGLE. The Senator and I have served together for a long time. We have served on the same side of the aisle in the other body and on different sides of the aisle in this body. I say to the Senator that I would not agree with what he had just said. If the outcome on this would be something like a vote of 51 to 49—let us say it is 45 to 55, 60 to 40—I would say if we see a vote like that out of this Chamber and in addition, it is lopsided on a partisan basis, with the bulk of votes coming from the party that occupies the White House, that to me, and I think to the country, will demonstrate that this is a fundamentally flawed proposition.

I think this is precisely the kind of war and peace issue where there ought to be broad support, there ought to be a very strong vote, it ought to be fully bipartisan in every sense of the word. I hope that we shall see that eventually. If we do not see that, I would not be prepared to agree that that would be an accurate characterization of the Senate as a whole.

Mr. MATHIAS. That is exactly what I just said: The world would view it differently, but our institutional responsibility would be no different. I think the Senator restated what I said perhaps inadequately and too briefly.

To get to the substance of the Senator's question, let me say I, too, was disappointed with the testimony of the Secretary of State. I felt it was not a generous response to what had been a generous position taken by Congress in trying to meet the concerns and difficulties which were perceived by the administration. However, I think the letter from the President of the United States dated September 27 goes a long way toward providing some remedy, because the President said that it "would be my intention to seek congressional authorization as contemplated by the act if circumstances require any substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. forces in Lebanon."

As the Senator says, he and I have served together a long time, and there are some bitter memories, not between ourselves, but of the history through which we have lived. One of the bitterest of those memories is to recall the expansion of military operations, the growth of military forces on foreign shores almost overnight, almost without perceptible signals given. That, I think, is prevented by the language I have just read from the President and by the terms of the Resolution which is before us.

That is extremely important. If we leave the question of the time out of it for the moment, just for the moment, we now have the assurance that we will not have a kind of mushroom growth of forces or a radical alteration of roles in Lebanon. That is, to me, a significant advance.

We are better off with that than we are without that. Just taking that one provision and isolating it for the moment, that is an enormous safeguard for the American people, and I think it is a proper role for Congress, given our responsibilities under the Constitution.

It is sometimes said that we are and should be a part of this area of decision because Congress holds the ultimate decision on the question of war and peace. But, of course, the constitutional authorities of Congress go far beyond the power to declare war. Under the Constitution, we have the responsibility to make rules and regulations for the Armed Forces. We must make the rules, in the 18th century term, as to captures on land and water, and other associated powers. That kind of limitation is appropriate and necessary, and I think that will be provided within the terms of this agreement.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's response. As he knows, I have enormous regard for him and for his opinion.

Let me ask this: As I read the President's letter of September 27, to which the Senator has just referred, he makes this statement in the second paragraph:

> My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act.

So, starting from that basic point, everything that follows comes off that reference.

Going back to the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, the President signed that and made a statement, and the statement includes the following:

> Section 4(a) of the act confirms this administration's announced intention with respect to congressional authorization concerning any future substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. forces in Lebanon.

Then these very significant words are given to us by the President:

> As indicated in its legislative history, that section does not prevent the initiation of such actions, if circumstances require it while Congress is considering a request for statutory authorization; nor, of course, is it intended to infringe upon the constitutional authority of the President as Commander in Chief . . .

It goes on in that vein.

It seems to me that what has happened here, at every turn, is that not just one but a series of side doors have been built into these steps we have taken legislatively to give the President an opening to do pretty much whatever he decides he may want or need to do at some future point.

I am deeply troubled by the tone and the specific verbal response of the Secretary of State, the Senator suggests, those comments have been set aside by the President's most recent letter. But the Secretary's comments are on record, and that was a chance for give and take.

It seems to me that we are caught with a defective document, in the first instance, where we have bent over, to begin with, to try to be accommodating, and we have been left with what is very loose language and subject to all kinds of possible misuse down the line. Second, we have the situation where the administration, itself, has made it quite clear that they do not intend to be bound by it, if they find themselves in circumstances in which they would want to take actions that are not contemplated or addressed directly.

So I must say—and I thank the Senator for yielding to me; he may have something to say in response—that I feel an enormous sadness about this, because I think we are revisiting issues that we have seen before, in a different geographic area.

If one takes the language of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, an essential starting point was to provide the President with the authority to take all necessary measures to repel armed attack against the forces of the United States. It came off that essential point of defending our own troops that 10 years later led us to the conclusion we are all aware of, with the 55,000 lives lost and billions of dollars spent.

I have to say to the Senator that I think what the committee has done here falls tragically short of what we should have. I sadly acknowledge it, and I will speak to it at greater length later.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I make no point about the fact that I am disappointed with the administration's response. I make no point that I think it was a mistake on the part of the administration not to welcome the war powers resolution and to seek the partnership of Congress. I think the President's hand would have been stronger, both domestically and in dealing with the parties in the Middle East. He has not chosen to do that.

However, I think that we may look at one precedent in this administration that I hope will be followed in this case in connection with the SALT II Treaty. President Reagan expressed extreme reservations disapproving of certain provisions, and yet he has complied fully with the terms of SALT II.

I think this is a somewhat analogous situation, where the President is being bombarded by differing opinions within the administration, and we can observe the visible pulling and hauling that is going on within the White House. So the President has adopted this expedient, which I think is not the best but is one which will serve us better than going without the invoking of the war powers resolution.

Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EAST). The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

I thank the Senator from Illinois for yielding.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, our former colleague, a very distinguished Senator from New York, Mr. Javits submitted a statement to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee concerning this issue. That statement has been quoted from by several people and in some respects on different sides of the issue. I should like to include in the RECORD, for Members to review for themselves, the entire statement which Senator Javits submitted to the committee. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JAVITS, SEPTEMBER 22, 1983

The Administration and the Congress have each gained a major point in the proposed compromise on the War Powers Resolution. Congress has established the proposition that it may set the clock running under the resolution even if the President does not trigger it by giving the appropriate notice under the proper section of the resolution when U.S. troops are deployed abroad into hostilities or the imminent threat of them. The President has gained the point that for the situation in Lebanon the authority Congress gives him to continue their involvement must be by joint not concurrent resolution, thereby, requiring the President's signature. This compromise avoids a constitutional crisis at this juncture. Though it may not settle the issue, it is an important step along the way.

The length of the time which is covered, 18 months, within which time the President in effect continues his exclusive control over the incidence of "war" notwithstanding the exclusive grant of power to declare war to the Congress under Article 1, Section 8 of the Constitution, is excessive in so perplexing a situation, such as Lebanon, and disappointing, but there are some countervailing elements in the other terms of the compromise. The Congress may (again by joint not concurrent resolution) direct a sooner withdrawal of the Marines and the Marines continue in Lebanon only as part of a multinational force and in their present numbers.

The political question will still remain before the country as to the exclusivity of the power of Congress to deal with war. I believe the force of public opinion would back the Congress and heavily influence the President's decision whether or not to veto any such joint resolution for the earlier withdrawal of the Marines or would sustain the Congress in an override or in acting by concurrent resolution. The constitutional issue is and will continue to be very much the question until the division of these powers as defined by the Constitution is finally accepted.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, there was a report in this morning's New York Times about the statement delivered by Senator Javits yesterday in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee room, defending the war powers resolution. In the course of that article, it states:

Mr. Javits delivered what, in effect, was a lawyer's brief in defense of the War Powers Resolution, which President Reagan has resisted having invoked.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the full article reporting on the appearance of Senator Javits yesterday at the Foreign Relations Committee.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 28, 1983]

JAVITS, FRAIL BUT ELOQUENT, DEFENDS WAR POWERS ACT

(By William E. Farrell)

WASHINGTON, September 27.—Former Senator Jacob K. Javits returned today to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing room to defend the War Powers Resolution, which he drafted 10 years ago as a member of the committee.

The 79-year-old New York Republican, who is suffering from a degenerative neurological disease, looked frail seated in a high-backed wheelchair before a battery of microphones.

But his voice was firm and his blue eyes were bright as he delivered to an attentive gathering of reporters a primer on the separation of powers between the Executive and Legislative branches of Government.

"It'll be a pleasure for me," he said as he began to speak, his eyes roving about the room, "because this has been my life." Several Senate aides looked on solemnly as he spoke, describing the War Powers Resolution as crucial to determining whether "the Congress will be a partner with the President in running the show" when American forces are threatened by hostilities.

He was referring specifically to the marines now based on the fringes of Beirut, Lebanon, and he gently chided those of his former colleagues who he felt were surrendering some of their perogatives to the President.

Congress, Mr. Javits said, "has got to get up on its hind legs and fight for its right to join in the awesome decisions of a war, and no fancy-pants idea ought to divert it."

"Ladies and gentlemen, this is extremely serious business because my purpose in crafting this law was that those who suffer and die, those who pay the price for war, shall have an equal interest in what happens respecting war," he said. "There's nothing holy about the Commander in Chief," he added.

Mr. Javits delivered what, in effect, was a lawyer's brief in defense of the War Powers Resolution, which President Reagan has resisted having invoked. Under the act the President must notify Congress when American troops face a combat situation, and he must remove them within 60 to 90 days unless Congress authorizes him to keep them where they are.

There is pending in Congress a compromise that would permit the President to keep the troops in Lebanon for 18 months.

"I am not one of those former senators who is around here to tell my colleagues how to vote," Mr. Javits said, "That would be egregious."

But, he added, "I am a former Senator who had a pretty decisive hand in this law and I'm deeply convinced of its importance to our people."

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, there is an article in this morning's Baltimore Sun by William E. Jackson, Jr., who is a senior fellow at the Fulbright Institute of International Relations at the University of Arkansas. He is known among people on the Hill because he formerly worked on the Hill. The article is entitled, "Let's Not Compromise, It's Surrender." It discusses the War Powers Act and the administration's proposal here, which he sees as emasculating the War Powers Act.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THAT'S NOT COMPROMISE, IT'S SURRENDER

(By William E. Jackson, Jr.)

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.—In agreeing to the war powers compromise on U.S. troops in Lebanon, congressional leaders have traded the legislature's constitutional birthright for a mess of porridge.

A subterfuge is being substituted for legislation that maintains the power of Congress to declare war and make laws governing the armed forces.

While spokesmen for the executive branch make clear that the compromise resolution will not limit the president's inherent powers as commander-in-chief, Representative Stephen J. Solarz (D., N.Y.) of the House Foreign Affairs Committee sees the resolution as a significant step in establishing the "legitimacy" of the 1973 War Powers Act. Clearly there is some misunderstanding.

Key legislators have shown themselves willing to accept form in the place of substance. Consider:

The War Powers Act states that "the constitutional powers of the president as commander-in-chief to introduce United States armed forces into hostilities, or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances, are exercised only [emphasis added] pursuant to a declaration of war, specific statutory authorization, or a national emergency created by an attack on the United States, its territories or possessions, or its armed forces."

The compromise resolution now before Congress mentions no such limitation. In fact, Secretary of State George Shultz told Senator Paul Sarbanes at hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that the president would be reluctant to agree that he could "only order U.S. forces to do something or other after the Congress had authorized it." When the president informed Congress of the latest fighting in Lebanon on August 30, he said he had originally sent the Marines to Lebanon "pursuant to my constitutional authority with respect to my conduct of foreign relations and as commander-in-chief." He avoided reference to the War Powers Act.

The War Powers Act requires the president to submit a written report to Congress within 48 hours after exposing troops to combat. Such a report is to set forth the circumstances and the legal authority for the action as well as the estimated scope and duration of the commitment.

The president has not done so. Nor does the compromise resolution even note that the president needed to submit such a report by August 31—48 hours after the first Marines were killed near Beirut. Instead, Congress on its own declares that American troops are "now in hostilities requiring authorization of their continued presence" under the War Powers Act. President Reagan is thus spared direct acknowledgment of the law's validity.

The War Powers Act provides that within 60 days after the president's formal report is due, he must "terminate" the use of U.S. forces unless Congress specifically authorizes their commitment.

While the compromise resolution states that the requirements of the War Powers

Act became "operative" on August 29, nowhere is there a recognition that the death of the Marines started the 60-day clock. And there is no explicit reference to the president's responsibility to "terminate" the involvement of U.S. forces. Instead, the compromise states that "consistent with" (as opposed to "pursuant to") the War Powers Act, Congress intends to authorize the president by joint resolution to continue participation by U.S. Marines in the multinational peacekeeping force for 18 months. It does not even require the president to withdraw the troops if certain conditions are met in Lebanon. There is, however, a throwaway line stating that nothing precludes Congress from directing the withdrawal of the troops by joint resolution—which of course would require presidential signature.

There is no specific reference in the resolution to the deployment of U.S. troops independently of the multinational force. Only their participation in the multinational force is authorized and limited. There is a reference to the withdrawal of U.S. troops from the multinational force, but not from Lebanon. What the president did not ask for Congress does not deny. The resolution does not appear to prohibit the commitment of additional U.S. troops in Lebanon apart from the multinational force.

Thus Congress is being drawn into the emasculation of the War Powers Act. It is assenting to the weakening of the most important check placed in the last decade on the imperial presidency.

There are two honorable courses: either to declare that the 60-day clock is ticking, or put teeth into the compromise through amendments and face the president with an up or down choice: If he vetoes it because of changes he doesn't like, so be it. Then Congress can pass it over his veto, as President Nixon's veto was overriden on the War Powers Act 10 years ago. It remains the law of the land.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I was interested in hearing the remarks of my friend, the distinguished senior Senator from Maryland, a few moments ago. For those who were not paying close attention to what he said, I remind them that Senator MATHIAS was expressing his concern about the fact that the failure of the President to comply with section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Act ultimately required him to introduce his resolution on September 12.

In that connection, and for the purpose of the record, I invite the attention of the Senate to a discussion that took place on yesterday, which can be found in the RECORD at page 25862 and goes on for several pages, in which I question the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. DURENBERGER) concerning some remarks of his in which he represented to us his satisfaction with the fact that the President had fully complied with the war powers resolution.

At the time the Senator from Maryland, Senator SARBANES, the Senator from Michigan, Senator LEVIN, and myself were engaged in a dialog with Senator DURENBERGER and ultimately with the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, my distinguished senior colleague from Illinois, Senator PERCY.

It is interesting to note that some would like us to accept the letter of August 30 that was discussed yesterday as some kind of a compliance by the President with the War Powers Act. It is clear he does not so regard it, and I point out that Senator MATHIAS has stated to us on this floor today that he does not believe there was compliance as of September 12 when he introduced his resolution, so he certainly did not regard the letter of the President of August 30 as a compliance. There is other testimony here in the RECORD of Monday, September 26, in which Senator BIDEN, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, in response to a question from the distinguished Senator from Florda, Senator CHILES, indicated that he did not believe that the President had complied with the War Powers Act. That is on page 25761 of the September 26 RECORD.

So I think it is clear that we all believe that the President has not complied. And that, of course, is the very point of the amendment now being offered by the distinguished minority leader, Senator BYRD, and a number of Members on this side, among whom I am honored to count myself.

This amendment expresses exactly, Mr. President, what I had indicated I felt should be done in prior amendments that I have laid down. Those other amendments, which I will not now take up, called on the President to comply with the War Powers Act.

What are the facts with respect to that? The facts are that the resolution itself recognizes that hostilities took place on August 29, 1983. That is a fact set forth in the resolution offered by the majority leader and the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

And I presume that everyone on the other side who will support that resolution supports the concept that hostilities did in fact take place on August 29 of this year.

I suggest to this body that the President accepts that fact because he has said in any number of public places that he will sign this resolution, which includes in it as part of the text the fact that hostilities did take place on August 29, 1983.

I suggest to my colleagues here, that being the case that the President is subject to a clear-cut idea, as a matter of law, not as a matter of choice, not as a matter in which he will indulge his own judgment, not as a matter of administration policy. I would say to my friends and colleagues, the law of this Nation says "Upon it being found that hostilities have taken place," and every Member who votes for this resolution declares that hostilities took place on August 29, then what happens? Here is what the law says must happen: The President shall submit within 48 hours to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the President pro tempore of the Senate, a report in writing setting forth the circumstances necessitating the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces, that is (a); the constitutional and legislative authority, under which such introduction took place, that is (b); the estimated scope and duration of the hostilities or involvement, that is (c); and then in section 4(b), "The President shall provide such other information as the Congress may request in the fulfillment of its constitutional responsibilities with respect to committing the Nation to war and to the use of United States Armed Forces abroad."

Now, one might say, so what? One might say we do it in this resolution. Congress will do it. We will relieve the President of his obligation. It will still be done. That is an argument.

I suggest to you that the importance of this language is recognized by the distinguished minority leader, by the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia, Senator NUNN, the distinguished senior Senator from Florida, Senator CHILES, and others, who worked on this language because they recognized that the reason for this language in the War Powers Act is so that the President will come to us with his blueprint for what is taking place involving the use of our Armed Forces in hostilities.

And what does our amendment offered by the distinguished minority leader say? It says that he should submit that report according to the War Powers Act and that he should include the information I have already read to you that comes from the War Powers Act; and further these facts: A description of the specific goals of U.S. policy in Lebanon, a description of the specific roles and the missions of the U.S. Armed Forces participating in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon, including the governing rules of engagement for fulfilling the goals of U.S. policy in Lebanon, and finally a description of the specific criteria that are being applied to determine when U.S. Armed Forces participating in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon have successfully accomplished the roles and the missions described.

Mr. President, I suggest that with that kind of a blueprint, those of us in Congress can intelligently come to a sensible judgment about whether we want to extend the time for our forces to be there. So let me say this in conclusion:

The time requested in the resolution of 18 months is too long. I refer the membership to the eloquent remarks the senior Senator from Hawaii made here last Friday concerning what happened in an 18-month period in World War I and World War II. The time is too long. The fact that we excuse the President from his responsible duties is unacceptable.

I urge upon the membership their careful consideration of this amendment, which in my judgment is the wise solution to this problem and requires the President to follow the law now on the books and to comply with section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Act.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON) for his remarks and I commend him on those remarks.

Mr. President, this amendment is very simple and straightforward. First of all, it contains a finding by Congress that our troops in Lebanon were introduced into hostilities or into a situation where imminent involvement in hostilities was clearly indicated by the circumstances as of August 29, 1983. That was the date on which the first two of our Marines were killed by hostile fire.

Second, it contains a finding by Congress that by August 31, 1983, the President was required by law, section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution, to send a report to Congress which contained, among other things, the legislative authority for the introduction of troops into hostilities.

In his letter which he sent he cited his constitutional authority as Commander in Chief, but he cited no legislative authority and there is ample legislative authority which he could have and should have cited.

Third, the amendment requires that, within 48 hours after this resolution is enacted, the President should send Congress the required report and he should describe the specific role and mission of our troops in Lebanon. He should also include a description of the criteria he will use in deciding when the day has arrived that the mission of the troops has been accomplished.

Finally, if the President sends that report, the original 60-day period, which began on August 31, 1983, will be extended for 60 days from the date this resolution is enacted.

What we are saying here is that the President has another chance to do what the law requires him to do. It was a law passed during the tenure of one of his predecessors. That predecessor vetoed the law and Congress overrode by a two-thirds vote, a supermajority—4 to 1 in the Senate, 2 to 1 in the House of Representatives. Now it is the constitutional right of any President to veto any measure sent to him by Congress and he can state on his own that he thinks it is unconstitutional if he wants to. He has the right to do that. He has the right to give that as his reason for vetoing a measure. But this act was not passed during the administration that is now in power. It was already the law. It was already the law on the books, and the President under the Constitution is bound to see to it that the laws are faithfully executed.

He should send to Congress the required report, and he should tell Congress what the role and the mission of our troops are, with precision and with specificity.

What the law requires that the President do, and what this amendment requires that the President do, is just commonsense. The Congress should have that information to make an informed judgment—an informed judgment—about what kind of authorization Congress should extend for the continued deployment of American troops.

These are American men and women, and the American people have a right to know why their sons and their daughters and their grandsons and their granddaughters are being sent to Lebanon. They have a right to know.

How would any Senator in this body like to have his son or his grandson sent there to fight and possibly die. No Member of this body stands above the average citizen on the street in this regard. I have grandsons. My advice to him would be to register when the time comes, and, if he is called, go. I for one would ask no special favors.

But I do ask what the average citizen out there on the street has a right to ask. And that is: Why? Why will they send my son? Why will they send my grandson? What is the mission? What is the strategic interest that requires that my son go or my grandson or my neighbor's son go?

So it is just commonsense. How can Congress make an informed judgment about what kind of authorization we should extend for the continued deployment of our troops?

It is very difficult, very difficult, for me as one Senator—and I know there are others—it is difficult to vote to permit the present situation to continue for another 18 months unless we have the information to which Congress and the people are entitled.

How do we know how long the cease-fire will last? Can any Senator in this body today say that it is not being broken right now? Who knows? There have been scores of cease-fires, only to be broken. I hope this one stands. But we have no assurance that it will.

How can I answer the parents of this land? I cannot answer those in West Virginia, the parents of young people who are sent to fight in that far-off land, unless I can responsibly explain to them precisely why our troops have been sent there, what their mission is; what it is they are supposed to be doing.

I had someone ask me that question a few days ago. I said, "You should address your question to the White House, because I don't know."

So we are giving the President, and ourselves, another 60 days to make this decision by this amendment. And this is the most awesome kind of decison that a government can be called upon to make or will ever be called upon to make—whether our sons and daughters, our grandsons and granddaughters shall be sent to fight and perhaps to die on foreign soil. We will all get that additional time, 60 days, if, but only if, the President fulfills the requirements of the war powers resolution and tells us what kind of authorization he is seeking and why he needs it.

It is not my desire to pull the rug out from under the President. It is my desire to support him if he can justify that support.

Once again—the mission and the role. What is the mission? I would assume that someone, someplace in this Government knows what the role is and what the mission is. We are only asking that we be let in on the secret.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I will vote against the Baker resolution.

I am strongly opposed to this resolution because I believe it would give a carte blanche authorization to a President who has not complied with the law and who has not defined a specific mission for our Marines to fulfill in Lebanon.

I believe it would be a tragic error for Congress to authorize these deployments until we have a firm commitment by President Reagan to abide by the terms of the War Powers Act and until we receive and assess a clear administration statement of the military objectives governing the Marines' deployment.

I came to the Senate after a campaign of opposition to the Vietnam war.

I was elected to the Senate as one firmly committed to the proposition that American soldiers should never again be sent to fight in a foreign war without the express support of Congress and the American people. Congress enacted the war powers resolution over the veto of President Nixon expressly to insure that we will never again force our young men to put their lives on the line in foreign military skirmishes to achieve vague diplomatic purposes.

We enacted this war powers law to insure that in any future conflict the United States would uphold the essential first rule of war for any democracy—that our aims, our goals, and the justness of our cause enjoy the full support of the Congress and the American people. Without such support, our efforts will be predestined to fail.

The war powers resolution grew out of the bitter experience of the Vietnam conflict, a battle ultimately fought—without any declaration of war—throughout Southeast Asia at the cost of more than 50,000 young American lives in Vietnam and trauma and controversy and division within our country.

Now, for the first time since Vietnam, American soldiers have been systematically involved in combat without the approval of Congress. And the Senate is asked today, as it was asked on August 7, 1964, with the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, to give the executive branch a blanket authorization to expand our involvement in a foreign civil war.

Let us not fool ourselves on this point. Let none of my colleagues labor under the false impression that the Reagan administration will feel in any way constrained by the verbiage in the resolution before us. The Secretary of State has made absolutely clear to the Senate that the Reagan administration reserves the right to increase the size, to expand the mission and to lengthen the duration of the Marines deployment without any congressional authorization as required by the law of the land, the war powers resolution. The President's letter sent to congressional leaders yesterday in an effort to clarify this fact did not even mention the War Powers Act and does not change the situation fundamentally.

And the fact is that the administration has already expanded the mission, size, and duration of the Marines deployment, and expanded it methodically without congressional approval.

Let us look at the record:

As of August 1982, the Marines were to be deployed for less than 3 weeks to help supervise the withdrawal of the PLO;

On September 25, 1982, the Marines reentered Beirut under an agreement with Lebanese authorities "temporarily to establish an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area." Later that week President Reagan assured Congress that the limit of the Marines mission was "to provide an interposition force at agreed locations and therefore, provide the multinational presence requested by the Lebanese Government;"

By August 30, 1983, President Reagan was reporting to Congress that the Marines role in the multinational force was "designed to facilitate the restoration of the Lebanese Government's sovereignty and authority" * * * a mission he no longer confined to "the Beirut area";

On September 21, 1983, Secretary Shultz spelled out even broader goals for the Marines: * * * "to help provide a sense of security that will help the legitimate Government of Lebanon pursue its goals of national sovereignty, unity, and independence", and he stated far-reaching goals for American efforts in Lebanon, including the withdrawal of all foreign forces, establishment of a Lebanese Government "able to exercise its authority throughout its national territory," and provisions for security of Israel's northern borders;

And then last Saturday, the Secretary told the news media that "we've always had in mind that if withdrawal of foreign forces could be brought about and the Lebanese Armed Forces, which we've been helping train, can move in and take charge in those areas, that the multinational force, not just our Marines, might occupy some strategic position in Lebanon." The Baltimore Sun account of this television interview with Secretary Shultz notes that "a senior official said that there has been planning for the Western forces to be stationed in such key areas as the Beirut-Damascus highway to insure that Syrian or PLO forces do not reenter Lebanon. They also might be sent to port areas and other regions to serve as a political support to the Lebanese."

Mr. President, it is clear to me that we have gone from talking about a Marine force deployed in Beirut to protect civilians for a matter of weeks to an authorization before us today which could be used to provide the foundation of long-term U.S. military occupation of strategic points at the center of fighting among Israelis, Arabs, Christians, and Moslems in the volatile Middle East.

This is a very, very momentous step we are considering. This is what we should be talking about when we consider giving the type of vague, carte blanche authorization this resolution would provide.

But we are not having such a debate over the fundamental policy questions.

We are not having this debate because the President is not fulfilling the law.

The overriding issue facing us today is a question of the constitutional balance of power between the legislative and executive branches.

The issue transcends the question of the duration that our troops shall remain in Lebanon. For if we do not uphold the war powers resolution today in Lebanon, we may not have its protection tomorrow in Central America or in any other part of the globe.

The purpose of the war powers resolution is to prevent the occurrence of undeclared wars. The Constitution vests in Congress—and not in the President—the decision of whether or not our Nation shall go to war.

The war powers resolution codifies the procedures insuring this constitutional process. Section (4)(a)(1) of the resolution stipulates that whenever American forces are introduced into hostilities or into an area where hostilities are imminent, the President must report to Congress within 48 hours to justify the troop deployments and to estimate the scope and duration of their involvement in hostilities.

This is the explicit language of the resolution.

The war powers resolution is law. It does not have to be legitimized and it cannot be compromised, ignored, or violated.

The President has no choice as to whether or not he will abide by this law.

No one is above the law in this country, least of all the President, as Richard Nixon learned. Our democracy is in danger, and our freedoms are undermined and threatened if a President, of all people, seeks to put himself above the law and beyond the law.

And yet President Reagan has not complied with the clear requirements of the war powers resolution. And he has not accepted the provisions of the resolution which mandate termination of military deployments in this type of situation unless the President obtains the express approval of Congress within 60 days.

It is self-evident that U.S. Armed Forces are engaged in hostilities in Lebanon. How many Marines must be sacrificed before the Reagan administration acknowledges this reality and complies with the terms of the law?

The legal issues before us are fundamental ones.

Are we going to ignore the requirements of the war powers resolution and permit the President to get American troops bogged down in a foreign civil war without congressional authorization?

Are we going to pass a resolution which purports to circumscribe the President's authority in deploying troops abroad when his Secretary of State has told us clearly that the President will ignore the limitations in this resolution if he sees fit?

I do not believe we should do so.

I do not think we should give carte blanche to a President who flouts the law and who fails to spell out clearly the mission for which our men will fight.

For this reason, when the resolution before us was considered in Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I led the effort to limit its text to a statement that the requirements of the war powers resolution now govern U.S. military involvement in Lebanon.

My amendment failed by just one vote when all the members of the majority party opposed it. This was a narrow-sighted action. In taking this step, members of the majority party were simply choosing to ignore reality. There are very few Members of Congress who do not agree that the terms of the war powers resolution have been triggered by the hostilities involving our troops in Lebanon; there are few who do not recognize that this law should apply under the prevailing circumstances.

The purpose of my amendment—which won unanimous support from Democratic Members—was not precipitously to withdraw U.S. Marines from Lebanon. The purpose was to uphold the fundamental provision of the war powers resolution to provide a sharing of decisionmaking responsibilities for the commitment of U.S. forces into a war. The purpose was to force the President to spell out in detail how he proposes to use our Marines to pursue our Nation's goals in Lebanon. Only with this information in hand can Congress act responsibly to make an informed judgment on this vital matter.

Because this step has not been taken, we are proceeding in the dark today.

I have listened to members of the President's own party express grave reservations about where President Reagan's current course could lead.

We must make clear that Congress will hold President Reagan to the spirit and the letter of the war powers resolution and will insist that Congress have a full explanation of the Marines mission before we authorize any extended deployment of forces in a combat zone.

Mr. President, I have expressed reservations about U.S. troop deployments in Beirut since President Reagan first proposed sending them last year.

I do not believe it aids America's cause to deploy our troops as neutral, peacekeeping forces when few in the area regard us as neutral.

I do not believe it aids America's cause to move provocatively close to a confrontation with the Soviets and their Syrian proxies deployed just down the Beirut-Damascus highway from Beirut.

We have already seen the danger of using American forces in a neutral peacekeeping force.

The substantial U.S. military forces in Lebanon are not viewed as neutral peacekeeping forces by the combatants in Lebanon.

The U.S. peacekeeping forces have recently been ordered by President Reagan to initiate military strikes against Lebanese factions fighting the narrowly based Gemayel government.

The emergence of a sovereign pro-Western government in a Lebanon free of outside forces is certainly highly desirable.

Toward this end, I believe the United States and our allies should insist that the Gemayel government proceed with negotiations that will produce a government of national conciliation involving fair representation for all religious and ethnic groups. If the Gemayel regime cannot or will not do so, Lebanon is in for a continuation of the bloody civil war that will rage on for years—perhaps decades—and we must not condemn American Marines to die in a senseless, open-ended conflict.

I have heard the argument that "if Congress insists on legalisms and questions the Marine deployments, our men will face greater dangers."

I reject this argument totally.

First of all, were we to withdraw our Marines sooner rather than later, it should be clear that they will face less rather than more danger. An announcement that they would leave at a certain time would decrease—not increase—the likelihood that they would be attacked. It is a seemingly endless stay that will increase the military stakes and run the highest risk of drawing the Marines deeply into fighting.

Second, if Congress gives the Reagan administration and the Gemayel government a blanket approval for a vague, ill-defined Marine combat role, I believe it is less likely that the Gemayel government will produce the consensus compromise essential to reunify Lebanon.

Finally, I reject the argument that Congress should walk away from the law of the land, should abandon the war powers resolution, just because President Reagan has shoved ahead without regard to the law. The purpose of the law is to unify the President and Congress in support of specific military and diplomatic goals. This can be used to advance the national good if the President will only comply with the law's terms.

Mr. President, in conclusion I want to say that I regret that some have suggested that the widespread opposition to the Baker resolution is driven by partisan considerations.

The Baker resolution had been advertised as a "bipartisan compromise" that would avoid a wrangle over legalisms.

As should be clear, this was not a bipartisan compromise. Senate Democrats have consistently opposed it, as have some of our Republican colleagues, and have members of both parties in the House.

These issues of war and peace, of constitutional law and obligations are not partisan issues. Many of us who have led the fight against an open-ended commitment of U.S. forces in Lebanon under the administration of Ronald Reagan, a Republican, also stood together in our opposition to the ever-deepening involvement in Vietnam under the Presidency of Lyndon Johnson, Democrat.

The Senate has an opportunity today to reunite in bipartisan agreement to uphold the requirements of the War Powers Act. If we vote to adopt the amendment offered by Senator BYRD, we will have the opportunity to sustain the war powers provisions and to assess the mission of our forces in a foreign civil war.

Therefore, I strongly urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to consider the Byrd amendment on its merits and to give it the support I believe it deserves.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I want to strongly endorse the Byrd resolution and congratulate the minority leader, the Senator from West Virginia, for his leadership, not only in establishing the institutional prerogatives of the Congress and the constitutional responsibilities of the Congress under the War Powers Act, but also, once that has been established, in playing a responsible role and in having Congress play a responsible role in asserting its own power.

Whenever we vote on the Byrd amendment and subsequently the Percy-Baker amendment, we will go a long way toward establishing whether Congress knows what to do with the war powers that we have.

Mr. President, I cannot support the Percy-Baker resolution. I do support the Byrd resolution. There are many reasons I cannot support the Percy-Baker resolution. The essential ones can be found on page 3 of the resolution. I want to just quote this so everyone will understand what we are going to be voting on. Section 2(a) states:

> The Congress finds that—
> (1) the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East.

I have no quarrel with that objective. I think it is a laudable objective. The question is: Are we going to keep our military forces there until that objective is achieved? Implicitly—not explicitly, but implicitly—this resolution indicates that we will. I submit that that is a very, very broad delegation of authority to the President of the United States to use military forces to achieve an objective that I believe is going to be very difficult to achieve.

But even more to the point, section 2(a)(2) of the Baker-Percy resolution says:

> In order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory, the United States is currently participating in the multinational peacekeeping force.

Now that is the purpose. That is the closest thing to a purpose you can find in this resolution as to why we have our marines in Lebanon.

I will repeat it:

> In order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory, the United States is currently participating in the multinational peacekeeping force.

Mr. President, I submit this goes further even than the administration has gone in describing the explicit mission of the Marines. In fact, the administration is very vague on this. All they do is point out the broad diplomatic missions, but they do not ever say what the Marines' mission is. This resolution says what the Marines' mission is. And I do not believe this is a commitment that the people of this country and the Congress of the United States are willing to knowingly undertake.

I hope everyone concentrates on the wording of this resolution, because what we are saying today is that we are going to keep those marines there until and for the purpose of restoring the full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory.

I am not a student of Lebanese history. We have been close to an awful lot of the people in Lebanon for a long time. It certainly is an area that is within our foreign policy interests. But from my cursory reading of Lebanese history, this condition has never existed from the very beginning of Lebanon.

We have never had a Lebanon with a government that had total control and sovereignty over its own territory. We certainly have not in the last 8 or 9 years, even before the Syrian forces were injected into Lebanon. In fact, as I recall the history, there was a lot of encouragement by our Government in asking the Syrians, or behind the scenes encouraging them to go into Lebanon because of the chaos that existed there before they went in. So we are really describing a condition as the goal and mission of our military forces in Lebanon that did not exist prior to the Syaian occupation of Lebanon and that did not exist prior to the Israeli occupation of Lebanon. I hope my colleagues will consider this carefully.

After describing this broad goal and mission of the U.S. Marines that has not been the condition of Lebanon at least for the last 8 or 9 years, and I think most would say the last 40 years, what we are doing is limiting the time with which the President has to carry out that broad mission. What the Baker-Percy resolution is stating is a broad, open-ended, probably unachievable commitment, and we are limiting the President to 18 months to carry it out. It seems to me that is the worst of all worlds. We have a broad, open-ended, probably unachievable commitment and we limit the time to the President has to achieve these goals.

I know that some of my colleagues will be introducing an amendment later in this process that will set a more limited timeframe.

I understand where they are coming from on that. I, myself, cannot support that because it creates a further absurdity as I see it. It intensifies a mistake that is already very clear to anyone who carefully reads the Baker-Percy resolution. You would be amending the same resolution; you would be amending the resolution by keeping the same missions that are set forth in the resolution; but you would be cutting down the time to achieve those from 18 months to 6 months.

I find that unacceptable. I think the only way we can deal with this in a logical way is to examine the mission itself, and that is precisely what the Byrd resolution is doing. It recognizes the President of the United States has never come forth and told the American people what our forces are doing there in terms of the specific mission.

I share the frustration of the Senator from West Virginia when people ask me, "What are the U.S. forces doing in Lebanon? When are they going to leave? At least tell us what is the mission they are supposed to accomplish. When can we declare success? When will we be able to say the Marines have fulfilled their role and mission?"

I cannot answer those questions because the administration has not given us any answers and the Baker-Percy resolution does not furnish any clarification. In fact, the resolution itself sets forth goals and missions that are so broad that I think most reasonable people who have studied the history of that area of the world, particularly Lebanon, would conclude it is "mission impossible."

If those are our diplomatic goals, that is fine. I endorse those. We have a lot of diplomatic goals that we know are going to be very long term. Some of them we know may not be fulfilled in our lifetime. But we do not normally declare that U.S. military forces are going to be there to try to achieve those goals. That is an entirely different thing. It is an entirely different thing to have diplomatic goals and to declare that you are going to use military forces to back those goals up.

Mr. President, the Byrd-Nunn-Chiles resolution says that the President of the United States shall comply with the war powers resolution and the President shall also furnish to the American people and to the Congress of the United States a description of the specific goals of the U.S. policy in Lebanon. That is the first thing.

The second thing it requires is a description of the specific role and mission of the U.S. Armed Forces participating in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon, to include the governing rules of engagement for fulfilling the U.S. policy in Lebanon, and to include a description of the specific criteria being applied to determine whether U.S. Armed Forces participating in the multinational peacekeeping forces in Lebanon have successfuly accomplished the role and mission so described.

Would the Senator from West Virginia like me to yield briefly to him? I seem to be taking some time to express my views on this matter.

Mr. President, several days ago a cease-fire went into effect among the principal warring factors in Lebanon. I welcome this agreement and I applaud the administration's diplomatic efforts to achieve it. I think we need to pay special thanks and tributes to Special Envoy McFarlane and Ambassador Fairbanks. I think they deserve a geat deal of credit and thanks in undertaking a very, very difficult mission under extremely dangerous circumstances. This is one step on the long road to the reconstitution of Lebanon. It should provide an additional margin of safety for our own forces stationed there.

It is imperative, however, that we not allow the optimism generated by the cease-fire agreement to blind us to the serious issues we face. During the Lebanese civil war of 1975 and 1976 no less than 50 cease-fire agreements were negotiated. The present cease-fire could be just as fragile. So long as U.S. troops remain in Lebanon we must not evade our responsibility to oversee the situation and thoroughly debate the implications of the administration's policies.

I firmly believe that the role of our forces in Lebanon has been hastily conceived for over a year now. The Marines first entered Lebanon in August of last year to help insure order during the evacuation of the PLO and Syrian forces from Beirut. They remained only 3 weeks and then left. Their mission was narrowly defined; their mission was accomplished. It is generally agreed they played a useful though limited role the first time around. The redeployment of the marines to Lebanon only 3 weeks later after the massacre was a serious mistake. The decision to reintroduce the marines was made hastily with little thought given to long-term implications. The ostensible mission of the marines was to act as a peacekeeping force, yet an effective peacekeeping force should be neutral and acceptable to all parties as neutral. This is not the case with our forces. Ever since they reentered Lebanon, the mission of the marines and other U.S. personnel has continued to grow.

Mr. President, I think one of the fallouts of the Marines being in Lebanon was that we did not protest the continuing buildup of Soviet advisers in Syria. They have hundreds, perhaps even thousands, of Soviet advisers in Syria that are very close to any kind of action if it did occur, whether it was between the peacekeeping forces and the Syrian forces or the Israelis and the Syrians.

We now have U.S. Marines and Soviet military personnel that are not separated by many miles in one of the most volatile areas of the world. I think we should have vigorously protested the injection of Soviet forces in Syria. I know we did not condone it but I do not think we took that issue to the court of world opinion.

Additionally, our Marines were there to maintain a presence that would contribute to order and provide training for a reconstituted Lebanese Army which in time could maintain order. Increasingly, however, they have, in the eyes of many people in that part of the world, become de facto allies of the Gemayel government. This puts our country in the untenable position of becoming directly involved in Lebanon's historic and bloody internal disputes. I think we ought to ponder whether we think we can accomplish, with less than 2,000 marines, what Israel did not accomplish with 10,000 troops. After occupying the southern half of the country for nearly a year, Israel began to withdraw, indicating that it was not prepared to remain in an exposed military position until all foreign forces withdrew and until Lebanon's complex and deep internal disputes were settled. Israel, moreover, had numerous advantages we do not have: Intimate knowledge of Lebanon's culture and ethnic groups, widespread ability in the local language, superior intelligence resources, and close ties with numerous minorities in Lebanon.

I believe, Mr. President, that we should learn from this experience.

One of the problems of bad policy is that there is no easy way to escape its consequences. It will not be easy to extricate ourselves from Lebanon in a manner that does not harm our national interests. We need to pursue a course that will eventually enable us to disengage militarily from Lebanon at the earliest feasible date in a manner that will not upset the delicate balance there or be seen by the world as a retreat on our part. In disengaging our forces from Lebanon we must act with prudence and foresight, a prudence and foresight that was not evident when they were introduced.

The issues and problems we face in Lebanon are of grave import. They will not go away by simply extending the administration's authority 18 months. It is imperative that the Congress not shrink from its responsibility to explore and debate our policy in Lebanon thoroughly.

I do not believe this kind of thorough debate can take place until the administration comes forth with its goals and with the missions or the mission of the U.S. Marines. Therefore, I cannot support the Percy-Baker resolution. I have already given, I think, ample reasons why on that.

The fundamental questions I think we should demand to be answered, and I think the Byrd amendment accomplishes this, are:

First, what are the overall goals of our policy in Lebanon? Second, what are the specific military missions of our forces committed to Lebanon both onshore and offshore and how do these missions relate to the overall goals? I would also ask what the rules of engagement for these forces are.

Finally, I think we ought to ask the specific conditions which must be fulfilled in order for the administration to declare that their mission is accomplished and to permit our forces to withdraw. The administration has not answered these questions satisfactorily, and I suspect that it is because the administration itself has not yet thoroughly thought through these questions and their answers.

One purpose of the Byrd amendment is to assist the administration in defining its basic goals and in examining the implications of its policies.

Mr. President, there are other questions that we should have answered before we make these crucial decisions. Among them: Are we now allied with the present Lebanese Government? If so, are we committed as a nation to maintaining that Government against all threats? If so, is this tantamount to an alliance? What are the conditions, boundaries, and implications of the relationship? How will we respond if the Gemayel government is suddenly toppled either by a seriously supported radical Moslem offensive that neither the Government of Lebanon nor we can stop or by mutiny within the ranks of the Phalange?

Will the multinational force be withdrawn if the Government falls and we have no ally that we can clearly support? Will the size of our marine force be increased if necessary to sustain the present Government? If so, are we not on the slippery slope leading to a very broad commitment?

If the Government survives, Mr. President, what are the criteria for the marines departing from Lebanon? What specific conditions must be fulfilled before the administration will declare that their mission is accomplished and withdraw them?

Another crucial question, I think, that has not been answered—I have no information on this—are efforts now being made or are efforts contemplated to encourage the formation of a U.N. peacekeeping force to take the place of the multinational force? If so, under what timeframe; if not, why not?

What are our training objectives for the Lebanese forces? Congress, when it passed the aid bill last year, made it explicitly clear that we were endorsing training of the Lebanese forces. Do we have a timeframe in mind when the Lebanese forces would be able to replace the U.S. Marines and the allied forces in Lebanon?

Mr. President, if the administration cannot answer these questions, then I submit it has not explored its own policy to the extent necessary for our own national security. I think it is time that these questions be asked and I believe it is time that they be answered to the American public and to the U.S. Congress.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the amendment by Senator BYRD, our minority leader, and others to Senate Joint Resolution 159, causes me to introduce into the debate and discussion something that might be considered extraneous. But Mr. President, it is not extraneous. It is a historic footnote to the discussions that we are having on the War Powers Act.

I wish to recall, as statements unfold here, the concern of the American people for coming into actual conflict without, really, the knowledge that we are doing just that.

The America of today is different from the America of 20 years ago or 40 years ago in our relationship to countries of the Earth. Time and distance are no more; we understand that. We know that in a matter of seconds or minutes an action in one part of the world can cause an action or reaction in another part of the globe. I am referring to the concern of the American people, which is continuing, regardless of the type of world in which time and distance are no more. The American people were intensely interested and concerned then, the date to which I shall draw attention, as they are concerned today.

I served in the House of Representatives for 14 years with a very able Representative from the State of Indiana, Louis Ludlow. He served there for 20 years, from 1929 to 1949. I recall him so very well—tall, and not too precise in his walk, but precise in his thinking.

At that time, Louis Ludlow had had a very distinguished record as a political writer from Indianapolis, Ind. He served from the 71st Congress to the 81st Congress. During his congressional service he proposed an amendment to the Constitution of the United States asking for a referendum on war, applicable except in the case of attack or invasion of a country in the Western Hemisphere by a non-American country.

I realize that that was a long time ago, Mr. President. But what Louis Ludlow was attempting to do, as I think in memory, very clear in my mind are those attempts he made, was trying to have the American people feel that they understood what was taking place in any part of the world. He felt it was important that they should have an input into the matter.

We could not wait for that today, a referendum of the American people. Certainly not. I recognize that. But the President, the Chief Executive of this Republic, must understand, as I am sure he does understand, that there is an underlying sentiment among the American people that they want to be fully informed of the steps that are being taken or proposed in reference to the possible entrance of the United States into any conflict in any part of the world.

So Louis Ludlow, in another day, was presenting what we call a very slow process for the American people to make the decision directly themselves. He was not thinking even of Congress declaring war. He was not thinking of the President moving ahead and bringing this Nation into war. What he was thinking then, in all of his proposals, year after year, was that the American people must be fully informed. That they wanted to understand in some way or another what is intended from the standpoint of possible participation of this Republic in conflicts, no matter where they may occur.

At that time Louis Ludlow, and others, including myself, were intensely interested and concerned about whether the American people understood what was happening and whether we were slipping into war in Europe or the Pacific. Whether we were being dragged into war, or whether we were entering into war before we could do anything to stop our entrance into conflict.

Mr. President, the American people must, insofar as possible, understand why the marines are in Lebanon or any other country; why the advisers are sent to one part of the globe or another. The American people, fathers and mothers, the people as a whole, regardless of party, Democratic or Republican in membership—the people of the United States demand now as then to know exactly what we are thinking about in these very troubled times. Times in which we could move into actual warfare and it could happen in a matter of seconds or minutes. We must continue the process of trying to know as much as we can about what we are doing in these matters.

I have cosponsored the pending amendment because of my concern that the War Powers Act is not being complied with by the administration.

I am frightened so often by advisers being sent to one country or another. Soon, the advisers become those who are in the field. Soon they become combat forces that are there representing this country.

We want a world of peace and understanding. America wants to make its contribution to the establishment of that peace and understanding. But we must be very careful, as I raise this warning hand, about how and when and under what conditions the United States of America commits itself to war.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I remember very well when we were voting on the War Powers Act. After that vote had taken place, as I went home to explain that vote, my feeling and my explanation was that I thought the War Powers Act was the most important piece of legislation that I had voted on. I thought maybe it would be the most important piece of legislation I would vote on during my Senate career. I still believe that in the almost 13 years I have been here, it was of unparalleled importance.

That is why I think this is a very important occasion, because this is our first clear opportunity since the adoption of the War Powers Act to face a situation in which the act now clearly applies and where our actions will determine, did Congress really accomplish something in that act?

I have never viewed the War Powers Act as an attempt to limit the President's powers. We cannot do that by virtue of the stature and powers he has under the Constitution. Instead, I always viewed that act as a gun we were putting to our own head to insure that we, the Congress, carry out our constitutional duties. We had not done that in Korea; we had not done that in Vietnam. It certainly is on my conscience that, during my first few years in the Senate, the Vietnam conflict was still going on and we were trying to wind that down. I recall how agonizing that was, knowing we had to get out, trying to determine how to do that and save face, and trying to explain to some mother whose son had already been killed over there that now we were saying we were coming out.

I remember saying over and over again, goodness knows I do not want to do that again; I do not want that on my conscience again.

To my dismay, we are literally in the same trap again—not yet as far, but we have already had five marines killed and several injured. We are already in a situation in which there is no happy way out. There is no way to win and get out. Whether the Congress totally follows the flag and votes for the 18-month blank check that is the Baker resolution, whether we try to limit that some way, or whether we try to adopt the Byrd amendment which I am here to speak for, there is no happy way out.

The question we have to ask ourselves is this: Are we going to face our responsibility now? Are we going to act in a firm and reasoned manner? Or are we going to say that we hope for the best case situation, that we want to just follow the flag again, that by our actions we shirk our responsibility again, and then maybe allow our involvement to escalate, and maybe allow it to get much worse? There is no way I can support that.

So, whatever the problems we face in trying to carry out our role under the War Powers Act, whatever the consequences of that, I am ready to accept them. I hope Congress will be willing to act responsibly, because we are talking about a precedent. We are not talking just about this situation. We are talking about what is the next Vietnam going to be after this, and the next Lebanon.

Then will we again say that this is not our role, that we only have to provide the money? Will we say that because the President sent the troops in—and regardless of the fact that in Vietnam we lost 58,000 boys killed—that we will not face the situation? I cannot do that, and I hope that, as a Congress, we cannot do that.

One option before us is the Baker-Percy resolution. Everyone has to say it is open-ended when it specifies that the mission or goal is for all foreign forces to leave Lebanon and for the Lebanese Government to have total sovereignty and control over all the territory of Lebanon. Well, that has never happened in their history.

Can you see all the foreign troops being put out? Is that why our marine contingent is there? If that is the mission, how in the world can we do it with 1,200 marines? If that is our role, are we willing to make the commitment it would take to say to Syria, "You had better get your troops out"; to say to Israel, "You had better get your troops out"; to say to Druze and the Shi'ites, "Don't raise any gun against the Gemayel government; it is the sovereign government, and we are here to protect them"? There are not enough marines to do that. Maybe we had better call out a lot of other troops, and provide a lot of other forces. The marines are tough fighters, and I hate to say there is anything they cannot do, but I think we had better suit up some more if that mission is really what we are talking about.

What is our alternative? Our alternative is the Byrd amendment which is before us. It does not say, "We are here to pull the rug out from under you, Mr. President." It does not say it is going to be for 6 months or 3 months or 18 months. But it is to say that we believe in what we did in that debate on the War Powers Act and all we went through in overriding a Presidential veto. This is a classic example. Hostilities have occurred. What we say to the President is, "Submit to us your report under the War Powers Act and tell us what the mission is, what the role is, what the goal is, what we can say to a mother as to why were sending her son, what we can say to those troops, what we can say to them as to when we can declare victory, and when we can come out of there. Tell us that, and we will give you ample time."

The Byrd resolution would extend the time. Senator DODD thought we should not run that 60 days from the time of hostilities because the administration and Congress have wasted much of that time. We would not make that just 30 more days, but would make it 60 days. Let us give the American people a chance to see what the President, as the Commander in Chief, says our purpose is there. Let us give Congress the chance to debate. Let us get something we can get behind.

When some say that they are totally behind the Percy-Baker resolution, my goodness, they say that for 18 months we are accepting another Gulf of Tonkin resolution. I cannot believe that that is something we should do and that those are the goals and the missions.

How can you explain to a marine that this is why he is there? He is 1 of 1,200, but he is there to put all those foreign forces off Lebanese soil.

We have said that, but we have also said that we are not supposed to shoot unless we are shot at. We are in a valley, and we have guns looking down on us. It is clear, if you ask any military man, that any time any of the opposing factions want to bloody us more, they can do so. If the Syrians wanted to, if the Druze wanted to, if any of the other opposing factions wanted to, given the terrain, given where we are, in exposed positions, they could bloody us more.

So, literally, we have put our troops into a shooting gallery, and we are sort of saying, "We dare you. You had better not shoot at them. If you do, we'll shoot some Navy shells at you."

Is that what we are committing troops for? Goodness knows, we all thought we had a role and a purpose when we went in 1982, to allow the PLO to get out. There was a general commitment and acknowledgement on all sides. The Israelis were glad for us to come; the PLO was glad for us to come; the Lebanese were begging for us to come. We went in, and the PLO embarked. The job done, we got back on the boat. But our tragic error was when we got back on the soil a few weeks later, because that was not a mission in which everybody was in agreement on which was ever very clear.

Did Congress really think about that our know about that, or did we talk about that? I look back, and I am kicking myself. Why did we not start the debate there? Now suddenly the role has changed. We originally committed troops to allow the PLO to leave. Where did we jump from there to the position that all foreign troops have to leave Lebanese soil? How in the world did we get from the short role we had our troops there for to this other role? How did a diplomatic objective become a military mission? Was there ever a debate here? There was not. Did the American people ever really know that? They did not.

Now we have an opportunity to say, in the Byrd amendment: "Mr. President, hostilities have occurred. That is so clear. Report to us, as the War Powers Act requires. Let us begin the debate; and let us, together with you, shape how we go forward now and what we do."

I think we have to share the role. We need it for the country, we need it for ourselves, we need it for the constitutional process, and we need it for future events.

This debate is of great importance. I hope that what we are talking about now is not purely partisan—I do not think it should be—but I hope very much that we will have everybody look at the opportunities they have and look at these two choices they are going to have.

One choice is the Byrd amendment, which says let us narrow this role; let us find out what we clearly should be there for; let us determine how we do that, or whether we want to say once more—after Korea, after Vietnam, after all the debate on war powers—"Well, we are just going to follow the flag, and we are going to hope for the best. We are going to sign this little check that says, 'Do what you think is right, Mr. President, over 18 months.'"

Can we say: "Dear Mom, we didn't send your boy over there. It wasn't our fault; we didn't do it"? Or: "Dear John Q. Citizen, we didn't commit the troops. We're just having to sort of vote the money, and we're hoping this thing will work out."

There is no way I can ever look myself in the mirror again if we vote for that.

To my way of thinking, the debate should not be on whether it should be 6 months, or 3 months or 18 months. The debate clearly should be on the choice we have before us now: Are we, the Congress, going to carry out the role that the Founding Fathers set? They wanted the separation of powers. They were tired of a king who committed troops to battle. They looked back on the history of Europe where, time after time, kings would send people off to die, thousands and thousands. The Founding Fathers were saying, "Don't let one man have that total power. Make the elected representatives have to answer for that."

That is what is in this amendment, and I hope we will step up and answer the way we should.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I shall ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess so that we might bring in the Chamber the distinguished Foreign Minister of Sweden and members of his party.

I ask unanimous consent that I be recognized to make a comment regarding our distinguished visitors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY SWEDISH FOREIGN MINISTER BODSTROM AND HIS PARTY

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, today it has been my pleasure as well as honor to welcome to the Committee on Foreign Relations His Excellency Lennart Bodstrom, Foreign Minister of the Kingdom of Sweden.

Our nations have long and close ties, and so many people from Sweden have contributed their skills and solid values to this country, not least to my own native Midwest.

Not only do we have no outstanding bilateral issues in dispute between Sweden and the United States—a rare enough claim in these times—but we are united on so many international issues and endeavors, first and foremost in our mutual commitment to control the spread and destructive potential of nuclear weapons. We Americans value Sweden's arms control work, and we also value her diplomatic skills, in the person here in Washington of Sweden's outstanding Ambassador, Count Wilhelm Wachtmeister and his brilliant and beautiful wife and partner, Vlla.

I take comfort in noting that the foreign minister's past experience has been heavily in economic and foreign trade matters. I say comfort, because it is my firm conviction that unless we in the West can get our economies in order and sustain economic growth, we cannot meet the urgent international challenges facing us all.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the biography of His Excellency Lennart Bodstrom.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LENNART BODSTRÖM—MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS OF SWEDEN (SINCE OCTOBER 1982)

Before his appointment to the Cabinet Lennart Bodström had served since 1970 as president of the Central Organization of Salaried Employees (TCO), Since he assumed his present post, the Swedish press has commented favorably on his administrative skills and his ease in meeting people. In January 1983 Bodström relinquished his responsibility for foreign trade matters, which had been transferred in October 1982 from the abolished Commerce Ministry to the Foreign Ministry, when a Minister of Trade was appointed.

Bodström received a master's degree in political science from the University of Göteborg in 1953 and a Ph.D. from Uppsala University in 1961. He taught political science at Uppsala during 1961–63. Bodström joined the TCO in 1964 as director of research. He became assistant director in 1966 and president four years later. As TCO president, Bodström dealt with various international issues and made many political and commerical contacts throughout Europe. Along with his TCO duties, he served on the Labor Market Board, the Economic Planning Committee, and the European Free Trade Association advisory committee. Bodström has also been an executive board member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and of the European Trade Union Confederation. During 1974-75 he was chairman of the Nordic Trade Union Council.

Bodström enjoys traveling and has made several trips to the United States: in 1972 on a State Department grant and in 1975 as an International Visitor Program grantee and later as a guest of the AFL-CIO executive council in Miami. He visited the Soviet Union as a member of Scandinavian labor delegations in 1972 and 1974. He speaks English. Bodström, 55, is married to the former Vanje Rundgren, who also holds a graduate degree.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I join with the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee in extending a formal welcome to foreign Minister Bodstrom. We have been honored by his presence here today and have benefited from meeting with him, particularly in hearing his views on superpower relations.

RECESS

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess for 3 minutes so that Members might meet our distinguished guests from Sweden.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 5:11 p.m. recessed until 5:15 p.m.; whereupon the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. DANFORTH).

AUTHORIZATION FOR FURTHER U.S. PARTICIPATION IN MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN LEBANON

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolutin (S.J. Res. 159).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the minority leader would take advantage of the provision of section 5(b)(2) of the war powers resolution, which allows the Congress to extend the deadline otherwise required for a specific authorization. The amendment would restart the 60-day clock provided in the resolution, require another report from the President and begin again the process of considering an authorization. The message sent to Lebanon will be that we have simply provided a new deadline of 60 days rather than 18 months.

In 60 days, we will be right back where we are now. The President and his advisors, in meetings, in testimony, and in the briefing today for all Senators, have described their objectives in Lebanon. The President did provide a report, as required by section 4 of the war powers resolution on August 30. It contained, in abbreviated form to be sure, the information called for by section 4. The Secretary of State in his testimony before the committee last week further outlined the policy of the administration. A copy of that testimony is before every Member.

The sponsors of this amendment are returning to the argument that the objectives and the mandate of the multinational force are not spelled out with sufficient precision. They are not satisfied with the description of their mission as set out in the agreement of September 25, 1982, and they contrast the present mission of U.S. forces with the earlier mission in August 1982, when PLO fighters were evacuated from Beirut.

I can only say that the mission is now a different one. It was initiated at a time when Lebanon seemed headed for a bloody civil war which would only enhance the dangers of Syrian control and bring Israel into renewed jeopardy. For many months, the mere presence of the multinational force did serve to prevent such a deterioration and, I would suggest, its presence has contributed in vital ways to the present cease-fire and the initiation of negotiations.

As I said earlier, the mandate of the force is not to stop the civil war in Lebanon or to take control of territory for the Government of Lebanon. It is much more limited, and we have recognized and insisted upon such limitations in section 3 of this authorization.

Some Members may not be comfortable with such a limited role for U.S. forces. We have even heard suggestions that our forces should either be turned loose to take control of the Chouf Mountains or withdrawn. But such suggestions misconceive the role and the value of the kind of peacekeeping presence we have undertaken there. We have no reason to declare war on any country in the area; we are not fighting against another country and such an action would only exaggerate the problem.

In effect, then, this pending Byrd amendment says to the President: You did not do well enough in our first go-around on this issue. We will extend the deadline and give you a chance to do better the second time around. I think such a message would be unfair, the procedure is unnecessary, and we would not be accomplishing anything but delay, and sending no message but indecision and disarray.

Furthermore, I would not expect the President to sign this amendment. In fact, I would strongly recommend that he not sign it. We would therefore be in a position of operating on the original deadline of October 30 and no farther along in meeting it. It cannot be in the interest of those of us who want to reaffirm the operation of the war powers resolution to fail to take action at this time and to leave the situation ambiguous and uncertain beyond the deadline set for congressional action.

Let us not forget that the proof is virtually indisputable that passage of the 18-month authorization by both the House Foreign Affairs Commitee and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee materially helped bring about the present cease-fire in effect in Lebanon. A 60-day extension would send exactly the wrong signal.

Mr. RIEGLE and Mr. MATSUNAGA addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

Does my colleague wish to make a unanimous-consent request? If so, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I will seek recognition after the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, this is a momentous decision that faces the Senate and the Nation.

If the Baker resolution is passed I think we will be making a profound mistake.

I strongly support the Byrd resolution and rise now as a cosponsor of that resolution.

I must say to the senior Senator from Illinois who just spoke that I found his statement very disappointing, profoundly disappointing, and I will try to address why in the course of my remarks here now.

First of all, this resolution brought forward by the Foreign Relations Committee clearly evades the strict legal requirement of the War Powers Act, and there is no excuse for that, and in fact the President and the Secretary of State are both active parties to this evasion of the law as it is written and as it stands today.

The 18-month authority in the resolution is deliberately loosely drawn to allow the administration almost limitless latitude in terms of future military actions in Lebanon.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks the minority views that are expressed in the Foreign Relations Committee report which lay this out in very important detail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, the testimony of Secretary of State Shultz, as I commented in an earlier colloquy from Maryland, last week before the Foreign Relations Committee this week was evasive in the extreme. He made it clear that the administration would not be bound by this resolution.

Some now will point to the letter from the President. I will address that in a minute. But that also is evasive.

But the statements of the Secretary of State, which were in response to precise questions from the junior Senator from Maryland were clearly designed, in my view, to put us on notice that this administration will not be bound by this resolution, regardless of the fact that it is drawn in a way I think very much to their benefit.

Again, the Secretary's comments are in the RECORD and can be referred to as is the letter from the President that I have just referred to.

But I wish to make a reference now to the letter that we have received, that Senator PERCY as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has received from the President, dated September 27, 1983, because this goes right to the heart of the issue of what this purpose or mission may be in Lebanon which we are having such a hard time understanding because it has not been clearly spelled out. If one follows the written text of the President's letter in the second paragraph he says this: "My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act," and if one tracks back to what that referred to and goes back to the exchange of letters on September 25, 1982, and Senator GLENN earlier in the day covered some of this material, time and time again in the exchange of letters from the Deputy Prime Minister of Lebanon to the United States it was crystal clear that we were being invited in to try to provide security only in the Beirut area.

On a number of occasions, in the text of that letter, it specifically makes reference only to the Beirut area and goes on in that vein.

In the response by Ambassador Dillon to this letter from the Lebanese officials, that limited requirement and that limited commitment is restated in precise language. And I quote from the letter: "To carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area." Then again in this short letter from our Ambassador, "to assist the Lebanese government's sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area." And then again it refers to "safety to persons in the area."

So time and time again it was made clear we were not talking about the sovereignty of this particularly government border to border. We were not talking about some broad notion of the kind we are now being asked to consider. We were talking about a very narrowly, specifically drawn purpose.

Listen now to what is in this Foreign Relations Committee resolution before us, because this is what we are about to commit this country to with whatever spending and serving in the armed services and dying may be required.

The removal of all armed forces from Lebanon is an eventual United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East.

This is the initial language in the resolution, the Baker-Percy resolution, before us.

In order to restore full control by the government of Lebanon over its own territory.

It goes on to say that we are participating on that basis in the multinational force to enable the Government of Lebanon to establish "its unity, independence, and territorial integrity." And it goes on in this vein.

We are talking here about a fundamentally changed purpose. It bears absolutely no relationship to what was stated and what the President himself, in his letter of yesterday, referred to as what he understands our original purpose to be in Lebanon.

So this thing now is so deliberately, I think, broadened out that anything may well happen. And the President, I think, and those around him, will find themselves in a position basically to defend any initiative they want to take by referring to the loose language that is represented here.

I mentioned earlier in a colloquy with another Senator on the floor that if one refers to the text of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, the initial starting point of the language of that resolution has to do with defending American troops in that particular theater and the connection of that to this situation where we start out with the notion that any military actions we take are, first of all, driven by the notion of protecting our own troops is exactly the same logic chain that we saw back in the days of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution.

Others have pointed out that was a 10-year episode with over 55,000 Americans killed and 300,000 wounded. We spent in excess of $200 billion. The damages and the scars of that go on to this very day.

Yesterday, the senior Senator from Mississippi, Senator STENNIS, made a profound speech on the Senate floor. I think it was one of the most important speeches that probably has been made in a very long time in terms of a reflection of years of wisdom and experience here by a senior colleague, reflecting precisely upon this matter. Anyone who may not have heard his speech or have not had a chance to read it ought to read it before they cast a vote on this resolution and understand why it is that he, with as much service as anybody in this body, has come to the conclusion that he cannot support this resolution that has been reported out of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Finally, I have been astonished and appalled by the argument advanced by some that the country would be well served with an 18-month limit here, an 18-month grant of authority, because that would take this issue out beyond the next election in November of 1984.

If we think about that and ponder what that means, what, in effect, we would be saying is that we are prepared to put the marines out there today and to let them duck the bullets—if they are lucky enough to be able to duck the bullets; many have not been—while the Congress and the President deliberately take themselves out of the line of fire until after the elections of 1984.

Well, the reason we have elections in this country is so people can make judgments as to who they want sitting here in the Congress and who they want sitting in the White House. We have an obligation, on an issue of this gravity, where war and peace is involved and where we are sending people out to risk their lives in the name of the purposes of this country, to see to it that not only the facts are known but that those facts are known on a timely basis so the country has the opportunity to make a judgment and to decide how they feel about that policy and decide how they feel about positions that we and administrations have taken. We owe that to the country and, more than that, we owe it to the marines that are out there in the field today.

The Senator from Georgia, Senator NUNN, has made that crystal clear. If we are going to embark on this sweeping mission that is stated word for word in this resolution to send 1,200 marines out there in this restricted circumstance it is an absolute contradiction. It is a disservice to them. It is a disservice to the country and it is a disservice, I think, to ourselves if we are willing to be party to this kind of a travesty.

So my hope would be that we will support the Byrd amendment. It tracks the law precisely. Let us implement the law.

Why should we be inventing new law here when we have the War Powers Act designed to deal with this precise situation? That is the route we ought to take. I think the country is hoping and praying that we will take that step and to do it the way it ought to be done. I hope that will be the decision of the Senate.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

MINORITY VIEWS

We strongly oppose the joint resolution on Lebanon sponsored by Senators Baker and Percy and approved in the Foreign Relations Committee by a vote of 9-7. In our judgment, its enactment would constitute (1) a dereliction of Congressional responsibility to uphold the principles and procedures of the War Powers Resolution of 1973; (2) a failure to require of the Administration a clearly articulated and persuasive statement of the mission which U.S. Marines have been deployed in Lebanon to implement; and (3) an 18-month "blank check" under which the Administration could pursue hitherto unspecified military objectives in Lebanon while asserting that it is operating with full Congressional sanction. These gravely serious flaws warrant elaboration:

(1) Dereliction of congressional responsibility relating to the War Powers Resolution.—The Baker-Percy language has been presented as a "bipartisan compromise" which, in the interest of avoiding a dispute over "legalisms," would allow Congress and the executive to affirm principles which are in conflict. This would present, it is argued, a united front regarding U.S. policy in Lebanon.

We do not believe that the issues surrounding proper implementation of the War Powers Resolution are mere "legalisms." At issue are constitutional questions of immense gravity. The War Powers Resolution is law, a law passed over President Nixon's veto by overwhelming majorities in both houses. The reservations expressed by the executive branch about the resolution's constitutionality do not diminish or compromise its legal standing. In the absence of a Supreme Court ruling, only Congress can change or nullify that law. But by failing to demand adherence to obligations prescribed in the Resolution, Congress would abdicate its responsibility to uphold the law. In any event, Congress must not concede to the executive branch the contention that the War Powers Resolution is not binding in all of its particulars.

One approach, first proposed by Minority Leader Byrd and advocated in Committee by Senator Cranston, would have limited any joint resolution to a simple declaration that key provisions of section 4(a) of the War Powers Resolution were triggered by hostilities in Lebanon on August 29, 1983, which resulted in the deaths of 2 Marines. Enactment of such a resolution would not entail a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Lebanon. It would, however, achieve the essential result of affirming unmistakably the applicability of War Powers Resolution procedures, including the requirement for Congressional authorization for the maintenance of U.S. forces in Lebanon beyond 60-90 days. Unfortunately, this proposal was defeated in Committee by a vote of 9-7.

The determined unwillingness of the administration to recognize that the procedures stipulated by the War Powers Resolution are now in fact required became starkly evident during the Secretary of State's testimony before the committee. Under questioning on September 21 about the relationship between the Baker-Percy resolution and future U.S. actions in Lebanon, Secretary Shultz was assiduously careful to reserve for the Commander in Chief a full range of options—regarding the scope of operations, the number of U.S. forces, and the duration of the involvement—even in disregard if necessary of the War Powers Resolution framework the Baker-Percy resolution would purportedly impose on the U.S. presence there. Congress cannot ignore what this means. The Administration is prepared to participate in a procedure which would give some appearance of creating a War Powers Resolution framework without really conceding that any such framework exists.

Not only is the War Power Resolution the law; its applicability to the situation in Lebanon is manifest. Acordingly, we believe strongly that any resolution passed should allow no ambiguity as to whether the procedures set forth in the War Powers Resolution are required. By intentionally side-stepping the issue, the Baker-Percy resolution fails to meet that test.

(2) The absence of a clearly defined policy.—The constitutional ambiguity of the Baker-Percy resolution is paralleled by an alarming vagueness concerning the mission of the U.S. forces whose presence in Lebanon the resolution would purport to authorize. One year ago, on August 25, 1982, when U.S. Marines were first introduced into Lebanon, their mission was limited and precise: to provide a temporary buffer that would allow the evacuation from Lebanon of elements of the Palestine Liberation Organization within a specified period of time. Shortly thereafter, when the Marines were reintroduced into Lebanon, they were deployed to perform, as part of a Multinational Force, the less precisely-worded mission set forth in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters betwen the United States and Lebanese Governments. That agreement did, however, make clear that the U.S. military role would be confined to "the Beirut area" and would preclude involvement in combat.

While citing the September 25 agreement, the Baker-Percy resolution is drafted so as to be susceptible to an extremely broad—almost infinitely elastic—interpretation of the mission associated with the presence of the U.S. forces in Lebanon. The "purposes" cited in Section 2 include "the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon" and the restoration of "full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory." Thus, over the period of 1 year, the stated mission of U.S. forces in Lebanon has expanded from a limited role, the feasibility of which Congress could evaluate, to a role too nebulous for Congress to evaluate and too far-reaching for U.S. military forces alone possibly to accomplish. Consequently, the effect of the resolution is to provide congressional acquiescence in a policy involving American soldiers in a commitment the scope of which has yet to be defined even by its proponents.

A major advantage of the Byrd-Cranston proposal to invoke section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution is that it would require the Administration to submit for Congressional evaluation a clear statement of military mission. This the Baker-Percy resolution would not do. It is not an example of any "Vietnam syndrome" to find in that resolution a disturbing similarity to the "Gulf of Tonkin" resolution of 1964 which, being comparably vague and invoking the necessity of protecting American forces, was used by a different Administration to assert that it possessed Congressional support for an Indochina policy which proved to be one of ever-widening involvement.

(3) An 18-month blank check.—Since we take as serious the Administration's patent unwillingness to be bound by the stipulations of the War Powers Resolution, the duration of the Baker-Percy "authorization" is technically a moot point. Practically, however, a shorter "authorization" would at least require that Congress face again the issues—constitutional and policy—which Congress faces now but which the Baker-Percy formulation would allow it negligently to defer. Accordingly, we supported—but failed in a 9-8 vote to achieve—the substitution of a 6-month "authorization" period, after which these issues would again necessarily be joined if U.S. forces remain in Lebanon. We reject the argument that a time period shorter than 18 months will endanger the lives of American soldiers by inviting hostile action against them intended to sway U.S. public opinion against a continued U.S. presence. If the Administration had offered a clearly-defined mission in Lebanon for the U.S. Armed Forces and had also acknowledged its legal obligations under the War Powers Resolution, such a limited "authorization" might be unnecessary. But if the Baker-Percy formulation is to be adopted, it should certainly stipulate a duration short enough to require Congress to review soon the crucial questions surrounding the United States involvement in Lebanon. We believe in any case that to pass this resolution would represent a grave abdication of congressional responsibility.

SUPPLEMENTAL VIEWS OF SENATOR BIDEN

I concur with the basic arguments against the Baker-Percy resolution expressed in the Minority Views. I want to emphasize, however, that I would not support any authorization for troops in Lebanon of any duration absent much more clearly defined goals and a reasonable prospect of attaining those goals.

JOSEPH R. BIDEN, Jr.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, when great issues are debated here on the floor, there inevitably comes a time when a collective decision of this body must be made, lest the rush of events external and processes tangential to this Chamber decide the issue for us. This point is now at hand in regard to our participation as part of the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

I commend my distinguished colleagues—the majority leader, Mr. BAKER, and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. PERCY—for their efforts in attempting a legislative compromise to a constitutional issue between the executive and legislative branches. Their objective in doing so is a worthy one. Accommodation in the pursuit of a national position toward the achievement of peace in the Middle East is a goal devoutly to be wished. However, Mr. President, I cannot support Senate Joint Resolution 159 in its present form, and I say this with great regret.

I would very much prefer to support the President in this matter as one of foreign policy to keep the peace. But we know from the price of our own blood, Mr. President, that peace has already been violated and, despite the current cease-fire agreement, hostilities could be renewed at any time and continue indefinitely, as the past experience in Lebanon has shown. To divorce the constitutional issue raised by the administration in regard to the War Powers Act from the immediacy of the situation in Lebanon may prove to be a historical disservice to our Nation; Mr. President. I have become convinced that the two are irretrieva-bly linked, and must be resolved jointly.

I say this from my experience in Congress dating back to the early days of our engagement in Vietnam and my vote in support of another President's leadership in foreign affairs as expressed in the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. I have come to regret that vote. That resolution was hardly the vehicle upon which to expend such vast national treasure for so long in a land war in Asia. Senate Joint Resolution 159 giving the President an 18-month leash could prove equally fateful.

If anything, the recent exchange of correspondence and the testimony of Secretary of State Shultz have made me even more concerned regarding the wisdom of the committee-reported resolution. Mr. President, it is apparent that the administration is not recognizing the War Powers Act or giving it any standing. Nor is it otherwise defining the objectives for deploying our troops and placing them in a combat situation. What representatives of the administration have said suggests an indefinite commitment of our forces and a vastly different role for the marines than had previously been expressed.

The give-and-take between the executive and legislative branches on this matter up to this point appears to be this: Senate Joint Resolution 159 recognizes the War Powers Act but reverses the process it calls for, by having Congress initiate a request to the Executive. The administration, for its part, ignores the existence of the act and instead offers its interpretation of an entirely different piece of legislation, the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act.

Mr. President, the War Powers Act must be explicitly recognized at this time, not skirted in the interest of a timely response to the events in Lebanon.

The language of the act is clearcut in its application to our participation with the multinational force in Lebanon. It assumes no powers not specifically given the legislative branch in the Constitution and curtails no powers reserved to the Executive in that great document. It merely codifies and enunciates the procedure by which the power of the Congress along to declare war is balanced against the constitutional responsibility of the President to act as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces.

There is no inconsistency in the Constitution on this score, Mr. President. It was contemplated that only after a congressional declaration of war would the President assume an active role as Commander in Chief and deploy troops into combat.

The administration cannot have it both ways—our stamp of approval on its course of action, without a willingness to observe our laws. And I would think the administration itself must recognize that a foreign policy, absent the consent of the governed, is not likely to last very long and certainly not for 18 months. History has told us this, Mr. President, the history of our own lifetime.

The provisions of Public Law 93-148, the War Powers Act, must be observed. As one of the original cosponsors of the House version of that legislation, I can say from personal knowledge that it was forged on the anvil of bitter experience, Mr. President. Its intent was to cover just such incidents as Lebanon, where we can become drawn into a major conflict without a full public accounting for the national course of action at the very beginning.

I doubt very much, Mr. President, that responsible Members of Congress will be opposed to our Marines' presence there if they are a part of an international peacekeeping force where mission and objectives are clearly delineated and subject to periodic public review.

But this resolution turns inside out the process by which two constitutional powers are exercised in tandem, while observing the Executive's lead role in the conduct of foreign affairs.

Far worse, it postpones a resolution of the issue into the future, a future bearing all the earmarks of repetition and national divisiveness.

For the reasons I have stated, Mr. President, I have joined the distinguished minority leader, Mr. BYRD, and others in offering the pending amendment, which in effect would implement the War Powers Act.

If the Byrd amendment fails, I intend to vote against Senate Joint Resolution 159, and urge my colleagues to do likewise, and thereby maintain the option of consent of the governed toward any future course before us.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, we are considering a matter of great importance for the conduct of our Nation's foreign policy. It is important not only because it will have a direct, perhaps decisive, effect on the prospects for peace in Lebanon and the Middle East, but also because it bears directly on the powers and prerogatives of the branches of our Government, including the ability of the executive branch and the President to fulfill their constitutional functions and mandate.

I support the President's conduct of our policy in the Middle East. I also support the quick and unamended passage of the resolution before us. I commend the majority leader for his initiative and success in finding a compromise between the White House and the Congress that represents a bipartisan approach to the conduct of our policy in a difficult area.

Mr. President, President Reagan believes, and believes strongly, that he has already complied with the requirements of the War Powers Act to date. Moreover, we know that he questions, with justification, in my opinion, whether the act itself is a wise piece of legislation. I have no quarrel with an attempt to insure that Congress takes part in decisions about deployment of our men into hostilities. However, the precise wording of the act, I think, requires much further study. Nonetheless, the President is apparently willing to accept a compromise that includes congressional determination of hostilities under the act and an authorization consistent with the act for the maintenance of the forces in Lebanon.

Many in the Congress would prefer that Congress simply declare that the marines are in a hostile situation and start the clock on the 60-day period provided in the act. But many of those Members have acquiesced, as I have noted, to granting the President a period of 18 months. I applaud that bipartisanship, which I think is essential to foreign policy.

I consider it vital that we return to and sustain bipartisanship in the conduct of our entire foreign policy, and I am therefore encouraged by the number of my colleagues who have approached their consideration of the resolution in that way. For example, I was particularly impressed by the position taken by the senior Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) during his appearance on "Meet the Press" on Sunday last. I commend him for standing up and pointing out that the President is, after all, the Chief Executive and should take the lead on these matters. And I share most of the concerns that Mr. NUNN voiced about the Middle East situation.

I fear, Mr. President, that others in the Congress have taken a different approach to the problem and may be wrestling with an inclination to make the consideration of the resolution a political issue, without regard for the constitutional separation of powers and the best interest of an effective foreign policy. The argument that the President should be authorized to keep the marines in Lebanon for only 6 months, or even less, whether motivated by a personal effort in objective analysis of the situation or by partisan political desires, has the same injurious effect.

How does the period provided for in the resolution affect the President's ability to conduct foreign policy? Clearly, the action that the Congress takes will send a message to all those parties involved and interested in the situation in Lebanon, for such action, setting a date, sets a "drop dead" date.

It is a fundamental rule of diplomacy, of negotiations, of international politics, not to telegraph your punches, not to tell your adversary what you are going to do. If the Congress gives the President only 6 months, or even less, with the clear implication that our marines will be withdrawn after that date, then those who may see profit from chaos and conflict in Lebanon, will know that they have only to wait and to act more determinedly. They know that, if the United States pulls its forces out, the rest of the participating Western powers in the multinational force for peace—France, Italy, Britain—will probably follow.

The immediate prospects, then, for building peace in Lebanon and the longer range prospect for Middle East stability will both suffer drastically. But in all of our deliberations about this particular situation, in all of our debate about the War Powers Act, I pray that we never let our eyes stray from the big ball in this game. The United States and the entire free world have a vital interest in the Middle East. That interest is the oil that fuels Western Europe, Japan, much of the so-called Third World, and a good part of our own economy.

It is in the interest of survival that we must insure that this vital source of oil not fall under the control of those whose goal is the extirpation of democracy, liberty, and human rights.

As we attempt to deal with Lebanon's internal problems, with Israel, with Syria, with the Soviet Union, with other countries in that area, we cannot afford to do anything or fail to do anything that threatens our vital interest.

Such a threat is what will result if we act in a way that would, for example, leave policing the Middle East only to the Israelis.

That is just what will happen if we are unwilling to act in a reasonable way to protect our vital interests. We must act in reasonable concord with Israel, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, and many other nations to protect our common vital interest in the oil.

In my view, therefore, the nature of the international situation is such as to mandate the minimum formal limitation on the President's power and ability to fulfill U.S. commitments in Lebanon and to respond to the situation there. Developments during the past few days, notably the conclusion of a cease-fire and the provision of first steps toward political reconciliation in Lebanon, testify to the wisdom of the policy that we and our partners in the multinational force have followed in Lebanon. Let us in the Congress refrain from undercutting the success already achieved, the prospects for success in the future, and the conditions that make success possible.

Finally, I must argue to my colleagues that the situation on the ground in Lebanon is not such as to justify all the hue and cry. We certainly are not in danger of the bete noire of another Vietnam that serves as a substitute for rational evaluation on the part of many. Our forces in Lebanon are an integral part of a multinational force, with a limited mission in a peacekeeping role.

President Reagan has witnessed Vietnam. We have all witnessed Vietnam. Let us not get caught by the hypnotic idea that we are going to be sucked into another situation like that, because we have learned lessons from it. I am assured in my own heart that our President wants the Marines to withdraw if circumstances permit.

I have the deepest respect and admiration for the senior Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS), my colleague and friend, but I must disagree with him on this point. The resolution before us is not another Tonkin Gulf resolution, and I believe that we will do our duty more effectively if we do not let the weight of that controversial chapter in the history of this body lie too heavily upon us now.

That is not to say that I personally do not have a great deal of concern about the level of our commitment in the Middle East and, for that matter, our commitments elsewhere in the world. I am constantly worried about the prospect of overextending ourselves, of getting our troops into a situation that stretches us too thin, of an inability to reinforce our forces on the ground, of our lacking the will or the capability to keep the commitments that we have made when the going gets tough and dangerous. Some have suggested, and I would welcome, Mr. President, a debate on our military commitments throughout the world on the issue of how and how well we could fulfill those commitments in certain situations, what changes may be needed in the commitments or in the action that may be required to strengthen our means to keep these commitments, a debate on the attendant risks if we are unwilling and unable to act effectively in certain contingencies. I have already attempted, with only partial success, to address through legislation one important aspect of our ability to fulfill our military commitments. I believe that my effort requires further consideration in nonpublic forums. It deals with the vital interest that I mentioned earlier.

As to the policy issue facing us today, I maintain that the progress recently seen in negotiations justifies the risk and the cost of our policies to date. The cease-fire reached on Sunday last resulted both from astute diplomacy and from the presence of the multinational force determined to defend itself and fulfill its mission. Let us not lose sight of the contribution that the force has already made to bringing some order to a difficult and confusing situation.

Let us also recognize the valuable role played by some of our allies who have taken greater risks and suffered higher losses.

Given the situation in Lebanon, and at a time when there is so little to be gained by Congress demonstrating its power to constrain the President if it chooses, a power that none of us questions and that has little or nothing to do with the War Powers Act, I hope that my colleagues will join in supporting the policy of the President and of our country by voting for the resolution as laid before us.

This is a time for statesmanship, not partisanship, in Congress.

I sense a growth of statesmanship, a diminution of partisanship, as shown in our unanimous declaration about the KAL tragedy. We all know that we can vote for political reasons. We are, after all, politicans. But history will judge us, and possibilities of peace continue to depend upon our marginal propensity to subordinate politics to statementship when the chips are down and the cards are read.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to reaffirm that this deliberative body can and will act in concert for the good of our Nation.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment.

This is not a theoretical debate—or should not be—about the institutional prerogatives of President versus Congress. It is—or should be—a dialog and decision going to the basic responsibility of Government. We are addressing a matter involving human lives and national commitment—living, and some dying, with the consequences of whatever we do.

American citizens serving in the Armed Forces of this Nation have been interjected into a hostile and threatening environment. American citizens are involved in the fighting, the wounding, the dying. The American dead are listed as killed in action, the injured are wounded in action, and our marines are receiving combat pay. Any debate about whether hostilities exist is more than a charade; it is cruel denial of the bravery and the sacrifice of America's finest hunkered down at the end of a runway in Beirut.

The commitment of this Nation to a situation where our soldiers are laying down their lives is not a decision to be lightly taken, in an arbitrary or capricious manner. I, for one, have served in this Chamber long enough to remember the anguish of our experience in Vietnam. It was because of Vietnam, because of the failure of the Nation's leadership to obtain a national consensus for a national commitment, that the Congress passed the War Powers Act in 1973. In passing this law, we were determined that never again would this Nation commit to battle unless there was the collective judgment of the people—acting through their elected representatives—that the goals of such an undertaking were worthy of the potential sacrifice. We felt that only by acting in concert—people, Congress, and the President—would we have the resolve to carry through on the commitment of the Nation.

The War Powers Act established a procedure for reaching national consensus. The President would report to the Congress and the people before committing the resources of the Nation. Rather than overcoming a hurdle, a visionary President would seize the opportunity to develop and lead a national consensus. He would report not sketchily and reluctantly, but fully and freely, on the situation the Nation confronted. What is the situation? What are the challenges and opportunities? What are the risks and the potential costs? A leader would find it an opportunity to lead, to use the pulpit of his high office to communicate his information and his judgment.

Then, instead of the people's representatives standing down here in the well with inadequate information, with every driblet of information literally wrenched out of an administration afraid to communicate it freely—then, my colleagues, we could have a debate about substance and not just procedure. A debate about commitment, and not just concern.

As it is, neither the people nor their representatives have made a commitment to involve our forces in the fighting in Lebanon. A year ago, the President went on television to announce that he was sending our Marines into Lebanon as peacekeepers, and that "the Lebanese Government will be the ones that tell us when they feel that they're in charge and they (the Marines) can go home." He spoke optimistically about "a unified Lebanon with a Lebanese army that will then be able to preserve order in its own country."

We waited for 10 years in Vietnam for that kind of order, at the sacrifice of 57,000 Amercian lives. Nothing in the history or situation in Lebanon indicated it would be so simple to accomplish there that which we have had such difficulty establishing in Southeast Asia or Central America.

And where, please tell me, does the President find any authority to not only commit our troops—but to give the authority to another government to keep them there howsoever long it may wish to do so?

If all this were not bad enough, there come some with proposals to permit this travesty to continue another 18 months or who knows how long—if only the President will reluctantly and backhandedly admit that, well, yes, maybe there is such a thing on the books as the War Power Act. He could wait 3 months to do that and still get months more after that for the involvement and the killing to continue—all without a national commitment—all without the kind of support any President should realize he must have to discharge the responsibilities of office.

Let us sober up. We have been down this road before and it does not work. This is not a difficult lesson to learn. It has been only 10 years since we lived day in, day out with the consequences of just this kind of thinking—we live with them still today.

The solution is clear. Without a doubt, the provisions of the War Powers Act are triggered. Now it is the duty of the President to come forward with the information necessary for the people and their representatives to make an informed judgment on our involvement in Lebanon. With the President's persuasiveness, it may well be that he will obtain full national backing for his actions. But to ask the people to give that backing without knowing the facts, or the reasons, or the potential cost is asking what no leader of a democratic nation should ever ask—an uninformed, and therefore unformed, support devoid of staying power when the going gets rough. Give us your trust and we will give you a decision you can count on. That is the whole purpose of the amendment I rise in support of today.

Before this Nation commits to the idea that 1,200 marines can keep the peace amidst 50,000 Syrians, 30,000 Israelis, and dozens of warring religious and political factions within Lebanon, let us all—people, President, and Congress—talk about it as mature and responsible individuals—self-respecting citizens of a self-governing republic—capable of acting for the common good by appealing to the good that is within us as a people and free society.

THE WAR POWERS ACT AND LEBANON

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise as a cosponsor of the Byrd resolution concerning the War Powers Act and our Marine force in Lebanon. On Monday, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee reported Senate Joint Resolution 159 to the Senate. This resolution would acknowledge application of the War Powers Act, authorize the Marines in Lebanon for 18 more months and require Presidential reports to the Congress every 3 months. But it has become clear that this could mean an open-ended congressional commitment to Marines in Lebanon. Such a commitment would not accomplish the objectives of the War Powers Act and it could keep our forces in jeopardy for reasons that remain unclear to millions of Americans. I urge the Senate instead to adopt the Byrd resolution, which is clearer and more direct in its requirements that both the law and the circumstances in Lebanon be respected.

Mr. President, the War Powers Act was passed by the Congress over the veto of President Nixon in 1973. It was a time when our Nation was deeply divided over an undeclared war in Vietnam that had raged for almost a decade. It was a time when the elected representatives of the people in Congress were determined to join in exercising judgment where there was a long-term commitment of military force to a hostile environment.

There have been consultations and reporting under provisions of the War Powers Act in the years since it became the law of the land. The commitment of U.S. Marines to the multinational force in Lebanon 1 year ago is the latest example of Presidential consulting and reporting obligations under the act.

When our marines first went to Lebanon, there were expectations that the Marine role would be temporary. Now it appears that more than a short-term commitment may be required. Where there was hope that our marines could avoid hostilities, there is now the fact that hostilities have occurred. Four marines are dead. At least 38 have been wounded. Our artillery batteries and warships have pounded the hills outside Beirut.

It is time for the President to acknowledge that hostilities now exist for our men in Lebanon. The proper thing for the administration to do now is make its best case for keeping the marines there within the requirements of the War Powers Act. The Congress, in turn, must rigorously and thoroughly review the case made and then exercise the collective judgment it has under the Constitution and this act.

The Byrd resolution meets the requirements of the act in a responable way. It requires the President to acknowledge specifically that circumstances have triggered the application of the War Powers Act. The President would have to meet his responsibilities under the act by reporting to the Congress and including a description of our current goals, the current mission of the marines, and current expectations of success.

The Congress, in turn, would authorize the continued presence of our forces in Lebanon for 60 days from the enactment of this resolution. The President and the Congress together would use that time to conduct an ongoing review of our policies and our prospects for peace during that time.

The questions surrounding U.S. policy in Lebanon are distinct from the procedural considerations of the War Powers Act, itself. There has been discussion about whether the marines should stay in Lebanon for another 6 months, or 12 months, or 18 months. I am confident that we will come to a realistic and responsible decision about a time limit. But we should do this openly, in full public debate.

For myself, I think it would be a mistake for us to withdraw our participation in the multinational force before we have exhausted our diplomatic and political efforts to bring peace and unity to Lebanon. A united and peaceful Lebanon is in the national interest of the United States.

Our goals include assisting in the arrangement of a cease-fire among all armed elements in Lebanon, providing security to the people of Beirut, and furthering the attemps of the Lebanese Government to broaden its base and the unity of its people. These steps toward national reconciliation must be accompanied by the withdrawal of all foreign military forces.

Certainly, Mr. President, peace in the Middle East is a commitment that has always commanded a bipartisan majority in our Government and among our people. We have been actively involved in seeking peace in this region for years because it is in our national interest. I believe this commitment will only be strengthened by respecting the procedures set out in the War Powers Act.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the Democratic alternative to the otherwise fatally flawed Senate Joint Resolution 159. This alternative is easily explained. It requires the President to obey the terms of the War Powers Act. It provides that he must submit the report mandated by section 4(a)(1), triggering the 60-day period in section 5(b) of the war powers resolution. Simply stated, what we are pursuing here is a Presidential statement that section 4(a)(1) has been triggered, and that the President will abide by the law.

As everyone in this Chamber knows, representatives of the White House have engaged in some incredible verbal gymnastics these past few weeks in their attempts to explain that section 4(a)(1) does not apply to the situation in Lebanon.

We all know that this simply is not true. We all know that our Marines were introduced into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances.

We all know that section 4(a)(1) covers the Marines in Lebanon.

And yet, unless the Byrd alternative is adopted, we will be sanctioning the President's failure to comply with the War Powers Act.

That act requires the President to send to Congress a report within 48 hours after section 4(a)(1) is triggered. Yet, the President has not provided us with any such report. Nowhere in Senate Joint Resolution 159 is there mention of the fact that the President has not—I repeat, not—complied with the law.

The Baker-Percy resolution says that Congress determines that section 4(a)(1) is triggered. Now, if Congress wants to do that, that is fine, but it is not the way the War Powers Act was meant to work. That law clearly contemplates that it is the President who should make the 4(a)(1) determination.

As far as I am concerned, this compromise resolution is inadequate. It invites the President to disobey the law, and because of that, will serve as poor precedent for the future.

We are talking about every world trouble spot, now and forever, not just Lebanon. Central America, Chad, you name it. If the President escapes the confines of the war powers resolution now, then we might as well write that law off the books, because there will not be much of a possibility that any future President will abide by its terms.

Once the war powers resolution is laughed at, then we should just say goodbye to any congressional involvement in shaping policy when members of the Armed Forces are called to a troubled spot.

It is as if we are prepared to forget the lessons of the Vietnam war in the name of expediency. The message we are sending is that we are ready to go back to the period of the imperial Presidency, where a President acting precipitously has the power to get us involved in a war we do not want and a war we do not need.

So, we are saying a simple thing with this alternative: The President must submit the required 4(a)(1) report. That is the only way to get him to faithfully execute the law—that is the only way to get him to admit that the War Powers Act applies to the situation in Lebanon—that is the only way to maintain the role of Congress in making decisions about sending troops abroad.

This is the right position, and anyone who has even glanced at the war powers resolution will recognize that fact. It is the law, and it must be accorded the respect it deserves. Anything short of full compliance, mark my words, will come back to haunt us.

By then, it may be too late.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a quick comment?

Mr. EXON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. PERCY. I should like to report to the Senate that the House is not in the process of having a final vote. The vote will give the Speaker considerable leeway, not only to accept the House version but accept also whatever Senate version we adopt or any combination thereof, so that it does give them maximum leeway. The major test vote that has already been taken in the House was a vote of 158 to 272 on a bipartisan basis to defeat the Obey-Long amendment to the leadership resolution. Under that amendment, funds for U.S. Marines in Lebanon would have been cut after 90 days unless, one, the President reported to Congress under 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Act or, two, a cease-fire continued in effect in Lebanon.

Mr. President, I think that bipartisan vote is extremely important. I think that on that test vote, it was defeated rather overwhelmingly. It is a good indication that the House has thought thoroughly about this matter. I think it is a step forward toward the adoption, I hope, of the Baker resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a brief moment?

Mr. EXON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is 12 minutes to 6, and so our colleagues can get some idea of what the schedule is for today, may I inquire of the Senator from Nebraska how long he intends to speak?

Mr. EXON. I am glad to respond. I have been on the floor for 1½ hours and I intend to speak for 6 or 7 minutes.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will yield for just a moment for me to answer that same question, I hope to be able to follow the Senator from Nebraska and have waited for that purpose. I can assure the leadership that I shall not take more than 4 or 5 minutes.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further for a moment, the reason I asked is this: I have about decided in my own mind that we are not going to get a vote on this amendment tonight. If that is the case, I wonder if Senators would be willing to go out and come in very early in the morning to get started on this matter? It does not make a particle of difference to me; I shall be here in any event. I think that might help with the plans on both sides of the aisle.

I do not want to force that issue, but could I ask either the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from Vermont and all other Senators to withhold their statements until tomorrow? We shall start early. I shall try to get an order for the Senate to come in at 8:45, be on this bill at 9 o'clock and we will be off and running.

Mr. EXON. Since I have the floor, may I ask the majority leader, I assume we are going to have a vote on the Byrd amendment tonight, are we not?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is fine with me, but it had been suggested by many Members that there are important engagements to be kept tonight, Senators who are not here, and the better part of discretion seemed to be to do this vote in the morning. I am perfectly willing to do it now, but I suggest to the Senator, if I may, that a number of Senators on both sides of the aisle suggest it is important that we leave to keep other commitments.

Mr. PERCY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. EXON. Mr President, I thank the majority leader for his explanation. If we are not going to vote tonight, I am perfectly willing to come to the floor tomorrow with the hopes that I have more success in being recognized when I come on the floor tomorrow than I was when I came on the floor today.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator yield to me now?

Mr. EXON. I will be happy to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, just to make sure the Senator knows we are grateful for this accommodation and to be sure that he will be recognized, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate returns to the consideration of this matter tomorrow, the distinguished Senator from Nebraska be first recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. EXON. Yes, there is an objection. It just so happens that the Senator from Nebraska has a previous commitment from between 9 and 9:30, and so it would not be possible for me to be on the floor if the majority leader brings in the Senate at the time he previously outlined.

I ask for no special consideration other than that at some convenient time when I come on the floor sometime after 9 o'clock, in view of the fact I am yielding now, if the Chair could be instructed to possibly give some due consideration to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, while you are considering that, I am usually in here between 6:30 and 7 every morning, and I am wondering if the majority leader's gratitude would extend to the Senator from Vermont. I would like to be heard soon after we come in on this matter in the morning.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I think I am in a mess. I withdraw the request, first of all. Let me say, if the minority leader will permit me just for a moment, the ordinary course of affairs would be to recognize the two leaders if they are seeking recognition, the two managers certainly, and I can give my assurance to the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Nebraska that they will have no difficulty being recognized and, indeed, they have a due bill out to be recognized early on. So we will take care of it in that manner.

Mr. President, does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. EXON. I did.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if I may be recognized, I yield to the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I should like to gain the floor in my own right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, since the distinguished Senator from Vermont gets here at 6:30 is it?

Mr. LEAHY. About 6:30 to 7:30 every morning.

Mr. BYRD. I would hope that the majority leader would ask unanimous consent, when I give up the floor, that Mr. LEAHY be recognized at 9 o'clock. That will assure us of getting somebody on the floor.

Mr. PERCY. Will the Senator yield? Does the Senator have the floor?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I apologize to the minority leader. He has the floor.

Mr. PERCY. Will the minority leader yield for an announcement?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. PERCY. I would like to now update the report to the Senate of the action of the House. The House has taken a final action on the resolution. It adopted the House resolution, which is comparable, except in one respect, to the resolution put in by the majority leader (Mr. BAKER) by an overwhelming bipartisan vote of 270 to 161.

AMENDMENT NO. 2231, AS MODIFIED

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I send a modification to the desk, a modification of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator yield the floor?

Mr. BYRD. I ask the clerk to read the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 2231, as modified. At the end of section 3 of amendment numbered 2231, add the following: Upon receipt of the report required by section 2 of this resolution, Congress shall, pursuant to procedures set forth in section 6 of the War Powers Resolution, give expedited consideration to any resolution relating to U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon.

Mr. BYRD. I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past 6 p.m. in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATIONAL HISTORICAL PUBLICATIONS AND RECORDS COMMISSION AUTHORIZATION

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I was pleased to join in cosponsoring S. 1513 and urge its passage. This bill will continue authorization of the National Historical Publications and Records Commission [NHPRC].

Since its establishment in 1934, the Commission's goal has been to collect, edit, and publish manuscripts and records of historical significance. Many influential papers have been assembled in collections, including writings of the Founding Fathers as well as other distinguished Americans. Records documenting events intrinsic to the Nation's birth—the development of the first Congress, the Supreme Court, and the Constitution—have been gathered and analyzed.

In 1974, the Commission's functions were enlarged to include, along with acquisition and publication, the preservation, classification, and description of historical records. The NHPRC also provides advice and assistance to State and private foundations to aid them in designing their own archive systems. With Federal grants provided through the National Historical Publications and Records Commission, most States now have facilities and programs to collect and display their documents.

In the State of Alaska, these funds have provided for an ongoing program of collecting and preserving records which chronicle the development of 22 Alaska Native organizations. In addition, there are currently two projects being funded by NHPRC. They are: A project by the Anchorage Historical and Fine Arts Museum to preserve the museum's nitrate and glass-plate negatives documenting early twentieth century life in several diverse areas of Alaska, and a project by the Alaska Historical Records Advisory Board in Juneau to assess the historical records needs in the State and draft comprehensive action plans.

The House recently passed legislation authorizing $3 million annually for the next 5 years for the Commission. S. 1513 would increase that figure to $4 million in 1984 and 1985, and to $5 million for fiscal years 1986-88. All funds authorized for the NHPRC are used to finance the records and publications projects which constitute the major function of the Commission.

As a nation, we must doubly acknowledge the value of these written works—tools for learning of events in the past and guides for shaping our future. It is vitally important that we maintain and enhance our repositories of historical documents so that we may not lose sight of the rich history of our Nation. Toward that end, I strongly support S. 1513.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a number of items in my routine folder to be disposed of at this time. If the minority leader is prepared to do so, I would like to go through them.

AMERICA'S CUP YACHTING SERIES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I say to the minority leader that there is one matter that I would like to address at this time, and that is Senate Resolution 229 offered by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE). He is here and the matter is cleared on this side and is on the calendar.

I inquire of the minority leader if he is prepared to consider that item at this time.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this side is ready to proceed.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate Calendar No. 412, Senate Resolution 229.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 229) relating to the America's Cup yachting series.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, this is a resolution on behalf of Senator PELL and myself, congratulating the Australians and the Americans for their performance in the America's Cup races.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I commend the Senator for his good sportsmanship. I trust that it will not be a close vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am delighted to join with my distinguished colleague from Rhode Island in presenting this resolution congratulating the Australians on their victory in the seventh and deciding race of the America's Cup competition yesterday off of Newport, and in commending the crew of the American defender, Liberty, for a skillful and valiant defense of the cup.

The America's Cup challenge this year was an absorbing and thrilling contest between two superb vessels and two outstanding crews. The intense competition evident in this series brought home to the entire Nation, as never before, the beauty, the compexity, and the sheer joy of sailing competition. For this great pleasure we are all in debt to the Australian challengers to the U.S. defenders, and to the New York Yacht Club for its excellent running of the competition.

We all look forward with anticipation to the next cup competition with the hope that it will match the 1983 series for excellence and drama, and with confidence that a U.S. challenger will return the America's Cup to the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 229

Whereas the America's Cup series was won on Monday, September 26, 1983, by Australia's intrepid challengers; and

Whereas the courageous American defenders demonstrated great skill in a defense requiring for the first time in the history of the Cup series a seventh race; and

Whereas the just completed series was the most exciting in the history of cup competition: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States:

Applauds the performance of the Australian challengers;

Commends the skill of the American defenders; and Anticipates that the next series will be just as exciting but hopefully with a different result.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFEE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I intend to proceed to the consideration of the military construction appropriations conference report, if the minority leader is agreeable.

Mr. BYRD. Yes, Mr. President, this side is agreeable.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

MILITARY CONSTRUCTION APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 3263 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3263) making appropriations for the military construction for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by all of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of September 22, 1983.)

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the conference report on H.R. 3263 making appropriations for military construction for fiscal year 1984.

The conferees have agreed to provide $7,104,237,000 in new budget authority for fiscal year 1984 to meet the requirements for military construction and the military family housing construction and operations accounts.

The conference agreement reflects a decrease from the Senate-passed bill in the amount of $136 million and an increase to the House-passed bill in the amount of $142.8 million.

Further comparisons show the conference agreement is $1.5 billion below the President's original budget submission and $118 million below the amounts enacted for fiscal 1983. In addition, the conference agreement is within the budget allocations for both new budget authority and outlays.

While this bill is significantly below the President's request and below last year's appropriations, the conferees believe that adequate funding has been approved to provide the Department of Defense with the essential facilities to support their various requirements. A great amount of the reduction from the budget request was based on program changes and inflation reductions.

Mr. President, I believe that the Senate conferees have agreed to a bill which provides an excellent, well-rounded program for military construction in fiscal year 1984. I urge my colleagues to support this conference agreement.

Mr. President, I now yield to the distinguished ranking minority member of our subcommittee, the junior Senator from Tennessee, Mr. SASSER, for any comments he may wish to make with regard to this conference report.

Mr. President, at this point, I would like to briefly highlight some of the conference agreements.

As my colleagues are well aware, the House did not provide funds for several major programs. Facilities in support of the deployment of the MX were among those projects deferred by the House. I am pleased to report to the Senate that the conferees have provided $31.2 million for these varied projects. This amount was carefully worked out with the Air Force to allow for all the major facilities to be obligated in fiscal year 1984 if they were ready. I believe that getting the House to support funds for the MX facilities—many of which are just beginning design—is a major victory. Further detail on the MX construction program can be found in the conference report.

On another matter, the Senate receded to the House on the rescission of the $91 million provided in fiscal year 1983 for facilities in support of the Rapid Deployment Force at Ras Banas, Egypt. This was the most heated issue discussed during the conference. As many of my colleagues will remember, this issue has been controversial for several years. In each case, there has been considerable doubt on the part of the House that this is a valid requirement. The Senate has continually supported the need and does so at this point again. However, in order for this program to go forward, the Congress must have the full cooperation of the Departments of Defense and State in providing us with every detail on the project.

I strongly believe that until this detail is provided and every question answered, particularly those raised by the House, that this project will continue its present course. I believe that in light of the spirit of cooperation expressed by the Government of Egypt on this matter, that Defense and State must do a better job in justifying the requirements to the Congress.

The conferees agreed to fund all projects in the normal manner and not through savings as was done for some projects last year and suggested by the Senate this year. The conferees deferred projects which were not at the design status which our committees use as the basis for projects which can be obligated during the coming fiscal year. However, the conferees are in agreement that projects deferred might be ready during the coming fiscal year and therefore options are available to the Defense Department in seeking funds. I plan to discuss this issue further when the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, and I have a colloquy.

The Senate was successful in having the House recede to the funds provided for a contingency airfield improvement project at La Ceiba, Honduras. The conferees agreed, however, with the language included in the Senate report which requires a complete report on facility construction planned in the Central America region prior to obligation of the funds.

In other important overseas projects, the conferees provided funds for minimum essential facilities at locations in Europe and Turkey to support the NATO mission. Funds for the beddown of F-16 aircraft at Misawa AB, Japan, were also provided.

All in all, I believe that the conference agreement provides the vast majority of the projects which the Defense Department requested. These projects vary from those facilities which will meet new mission requirements to those in support of quality of life needs. The bill contains over 1,500 individual line items of which nearly 400 were considered by the conferees. Whether it be a dormitory or a maintenance facility, each project was given careful consideration based on the stated justification.

Mr. President, as we near completion on this military construction appropriations bill I want to express my thanks to the distinguished ranking minority member, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. SASSER, for his support on this legislation. The cooperation between the majority and minority on this bill makes for a very pleasant working relationship.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of the conference report on H.R. 3263, the fiscal year 1984 military construction appropriations conference report. This is the companion bill to the fiscal year 1984 military construction authorization bill which was sent to the President for signature earlier this week.

I congratulate the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia, Senator MATTINGLY, for his handling of this highly important bill. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Military Construction of the Senate Armed Services Committee, I am quite familiar with the scope of this bill and its complexity. Every aspect of our defense policy must be understood to be able to make judgments about the necessity for supporting construction projects.

Mr. President, some uncertainty has been generated within the Defense Department as to what has been described by some within the Department as conflicts, between the military construction authorization and the appropriation bills for fiscal year 1984. I think this uncertainty stems from a lack of understanding of the legislation and I think these misunderstandings can be resolved by a colloquy between myself and the distinguished Senator from Georgia.

Let me first ask the Senator, in your view, are there any conflicts between the military construction authorization and appropriations bills for fiscal year 1984, as reported by the respective conference committees?

Mr. MATTINGLY. In my view, there are no conflicts. I think most of the misunderstanding arises from the category of projects that the authorization bill referred to as savings projects—or projects to be accomplished with prior year appropriations.

The appropriations conference chose to selectively provide appropriations for some of those projects which we considered high priority and which could be put under contract early in the fiscal year.

Mr. THURMOND. The Senator is correct in that most of the confusion in the Defense Department has developed around the "savings" projects. As far as I am concerned, the appropriations conference acted well within its jurisdiction by providing fiscal year 1984 appropriations for some of those projects. In fact, the language of the authorization bill provides that the savings projects can be funded from "other sources" and fiscal year 1984 appropriations can certainly be considered as an "other source." The appropriations conferees simply elected to provide appropriations for some savings projects and then to take a general reduction for a portion of the anticipated savings.

Let me clarify the situation with regard to those savings projects for which the appropriations conference report did not provide fiscal year 1984 appropriations. In your view, does the fact that a savings project did not receive a fiscal year 1984 appropriation in any way override the language in the authorization bill that permits these projects to proceed with savings?

Mr. MATTINGLY. The answer to that is clearly "no". Nothing that we did in the conference report on the appropriations bill precludes the services from proceeding with the savings projects in accordance with the authorization bill. We could have objected to that approach, but we did not. If sufficient savings are realized from good bids or project cancellations, then these "savings projects," for which no fiscal year 1984 appropriations were provided, may be awarded just as we have handled the same category of projects in the fiscal year 1983 military construction program. Normal procedures require that the services provide notification to the Armed Services Committees of their intention to proceed with savings projects before any such project is put under contract; in addition, approval for appropriations in this category should be requested through the normal reprograming process. In the event that savings do not accrue, these projects may be funded through a supplemental appropriations bill or in the normal fiscal year 1985 military construction appropriations bill.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the distinguished chairman for engaging in this colloquoy which I know will be an important part of the legislative history surrounding the fiscal year 1984 military construction program. We have worked together well during the last 2 years as chairman of our respective Military Construction Subcommittees, and I would not want any confusion to develop within the Department as to the intent of our respective bills.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to thank the chairmen of the Committee on Armed Services, Military Construction, Senator THURMOND and Committee on Appropriations, Military Construction Subcommittee, Senator MATTINGLY for their statements. I, too, have a military construction project which I believe falls into the same category as described by the two chairmen. The project is the base civil engineering building at Pease AFB, N.H. This project is proceeding very well and should complete design requirements and be ready for a building contract during fiscal year 1984. The base has too long been without the storage and maintenance facilities which will be provided by this construction project. I would like to get the two gentlemen to confirm two points for me. First, does the Pease AFB project fall in the category of projects discussed and the actions of this appropriations bill should in no way adversely affect securing funds for the project? Second, is the project fully authorized and when the design requirements are met, the project is ready for contract, and savings funds are identified, can the contract be awarded after the Appropriations and Armed Services Committees have been notified?

Mr. MATTINGLY. The Senator from New Hampshire is totally correct.

Mr. THURMOND. I agree with the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank both Senators.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I join the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee in urging that the conference report be adopted. And I want to take this opportunity to commend Chairman MATTINGLY for his diligence and dedication in bringing this bill in under the budget.

This conference report is more than $1.5 billion under the President's budget request and is $136 million under the Senate-passed bill. The agreement for fiscal year 1984 is $118 million under the appropriation for fiscal year 1983. And Mr. President, the conference agreement is $400 million under the budget resolution allocation.

So, this is a very responsible product. The conferees have exercised their best judgment on more than 1,500 items.

I urge the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments en bloc.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendments agreed to en bloc are as follows:

Resolved, That the House agree to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3263) entitled "An Act making appropriations for military construction for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes".

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7 to the aforesaid bill, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment, insert: Provided, That none of the funds made available for airfield improvements in Honduras may be obligated until the Committees on Appropriations have been notified as to the complete U.S. construction plan for the region, $1,501,993,000

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15 to the aforesaid bill, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment, insert: $67,620,000

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21 to the aforesaid bill, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment, insert: $30,605,000

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53 to the aforesaid bill, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the matter stricken by said amendment, and insert:

Sec. 120. None of the funds appropriated in this Act for F-16 beddown projects at Misawa, Japan, may be obligated or expended unless there has been notification to the Committees on Appropriations that the approved Government of Japan budget for fiscal year 1984 includes projects associated with the F-16 beddown as an additive over the level of funding provided in Japanese fiscal year 1983 for the facilities improvement program.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55 to the aforesaid bill, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment, insert:

Sec. 121. It is the sense of the Congress that the Administration should call on the pertinent member nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and on Japan to meet or exceed their pledges for at least a 3 per centum real increase in defense spending and furtherance of increased unity, equitable sharing of our common defense burden, and international stability.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56 to the aforesaid bill, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment, insert:

Sec. 122. (a) None of the funds appropriated in this Act may be available for any country if the President determines that the government of such country is failing to take adequate measures to prevent narcotic drugs or other controlled substances cultivated or produced or processed illicitly, in whole or in part, in such country, or transported through such country, from being sold illegally within the jurisdiction of such country to United States personnel or their dependents, or from being smuggled into the United States. Such prohibition shall continue in force until the President determines and reports to the Congress in writing that—

(1) the government of such country has prepared and committed itself to a plan presented to the Secretary of State that would eliminate the cause or basis for the application to such country of the prohibition contained in the first sentence; and

(2) the government of such country has taken appropriate law enforcement measures to implement the plan presented to the Secretary of State.

(b) The provisions of subsection (a) shall not apply in the case of any country with respect to which the President determines that the application of the provisons of such subsection would be inconsistent with the national security interests of the United States.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57 to the aforesaid bill, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment, insert:

Sec. 123. Of the total amount of budget authority provided for fiscal year 1984 by this Act that would otherwise be avilable for consulting services, management and professional services, and special studies and analyses, 10 per centum of the amount intended for such purposes in the President's budget for 1984, as amended, for any agency, department or entity subject to apportionment by the Executive shall be placed in reserve and not made available for obligation or expenditure: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any agency, department or entity whose budget request for 1984 for the purposes stated above did not amount to $5,000,000.

NATIONAL SCHOOLBUS SAFETY WEEK—SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 172

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I propose to put a joint resolution on the calendar by unanimous consent. I refer to Senate Joint Resolution 172, introduced by Senator DOLE, Senator BAUCUS, and others, if the minority leader will agree with that.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution I now send to the desk be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, on behalf of 26 other Senators and myself, I introduce Senate Joint Resolution 172, which designates the week of October 2 to 8, 1983, as "National Schoolbus Safety Week." This resolution is identical to House Joint Resolution 137, which passed the House of Representatives yesterday.

It is only fitting that we honor the Nation's largest transportation system and recognize it as an integral part of the entire educational process. There are more than 375,000 schoolbuses used daily which travel over 3 billion miles annually. Though the schoolbus is considered the world's safest mode of transportation, it is all too often taken for granted. For example, more fatalities occur in loading and unloading zones outside the bus than in the bus. Motorists who fail to stop while a bus is stationary, account for these needless deaths and injuries.

Schoolbus transportation maintains the most highly respected motor vehicle safety record on the road. Per billion passenger miles, there are 0.49 fatalities, compared to automobiles, in which there are 13.2 fatalities per billion passenger miles. As our safest vehicle, it also provides the most economical and dependable transportation service.

In designating the week of October 2 to 8 "National Schoolbus Safety Week," we would be recognizing this all important vehicle and, hopefully, be reminding the public that schoolbuses are the safest form of transportation our children can enjoy. It would also help students become more aware of how to live in our mobile society safely and effectively.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary (Mr. THURMOND) and the distinguished ranking minority member (Mr. BIDEN) have given their consent to allow this resolution to be held at the desk without the necessity of referral to the Judiciary Committee. The Senator from Kansas is most appreciative of their cooperation.

NATIONAL SCHOOLBUS SAFETY WEEK—HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 137

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that House Joint Resolution 137, a House joint resolution with respect to National Schoolbus Safety Week, be placed on the calendar, if the minority leader has no objection.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RESOLUTION COMMENDING CARL YASTRZEMSKI OF THE BOSTON RED SOX

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to receive a resolution on behalf of myself and my colleague from Massachusetts (Senator TSONGAS), commending Carl Yastrzemski for his brilliant career as one of the truly outstanding heros in the history of baseball, and as one of the finest athletes of our time. I hope that the Senate will have the opportunity to act on this resolution tomorrow. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be placed on the calendar, and that its text may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution reads as follows:

S. RES. 232

Whereas Carl Yastrzemski will soon complete his twenty-third and final season as a baseball player for the Boston Red Sox;

Whereas Carl Yastrzemski has played in more major league baseball games than any other player in the history of the sport;

Whereas "Captain Carl" won baseball's honored triple crown and led his Cardiac Kids to the "Impossible Dream" of an American League Pennant in 1967;

Whereas Yaz will be remembered always as one of the finest players in baseball history and a leader of great compassion and ability both on and off the field.

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States of America joins with the people of Massachusetts and sport fans throughout the world in honoring Carl Yastrzemski for his outstanding career, his outstanding sportsmanship, and his outstanding contribution to baseball and the Nation.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I propose to proceed to the House message on S. 461; and if the minority leader has no problems with that, I will ask that the Chair lay that message before the Senate.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection.

OFFICE OF GOVERNMENT ETHICS AUTHORIZATION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 461.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate (S. 461) entitled "An Act to extend the authorization of appropriations for the Office of Government Ethics for five years", do pass with the following amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

AMENDMENTS TO ETHICS IN GOVERNMENT ACT OF 1978

(d)(1) Any rules or regulations issued under section 402 of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978 which are in effect immediately before the effective date of the amendments made by this Act shall remain in effect according to their terms until modified, superseded, set aside, or revoked on or after such effective date.

(2) The responsibilities of the Director of the Office of Governmental Ethics under paragraphs (6) and (12), respectively, of section 402(b) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978 with respect to rules and regulations issued by the Office of Personnel Management before the effective date of the amendments made by this Act shall not be affected by this Act or any of the amendments made by this Act.

SEPARATE BUDGET LINE ITEM FOR OFFICE OF GOVERNMENT ETHICS

SEC. 3. Title IV is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SUBMISSION OF BUDGET

"SEC. 407. (a) In the budget submitted to the Congress pursuant to section 1105(a) of title 31, United States Code, the President shall include estimated expenditures and proposed appropriations the President decides are necessary to support the Office of Government Ethics in the fiscal year for which the budget is submitted and the four fiscal years after that year.

"(b) In the statement of changes submitted to Congress with respect to the budget pursuant to section 1106(b) of title 31, United States Code, the President shall specify the effect of such changes on the information submitted pursuant to subsection (a) of this section.".

REVIEW OF FINANCIAL DISCLOSURE REPORTS OF HIGH LEVEL WHITE HOUSE AIDES

SEC. 4. Section 203(c) is amended by inserting after "designated agency officials," the following: "employees described in section 105(a)(2) (A) or (B), 106(a)(1) (A) or (B), or 107 (a)(1)(A) or (b)(1)(A)(i), of title 3, United States Code,".

LIMIT ON OUTSIDE EARNED INCOME FOR HIGH LEVEL WHITE HOUSE AIDES

SEC. 5. Section 210 is amended to read as follows:

"OUTSIDE EARNED INCOME

"SEC. 210. Except where the employee's agency or department shall have more restrictive limitations on outside earned income, all employees coverd by this title—

"(1) who are compensated at a pay grade in the General Schedule of grade GS-16 or above and who occupy nonjudicial full-time positions appointments to which are required to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or

"(2) who are described in section 105(a)(2)(A) or (B), 106(a)(1)(A) or (B), or 107(a)(1)(A) or (b)(1)(A)(i), of title 3, United States Code, may not have in any calendar year outside earned income attributable to such calendar year which is in excess of 15 percent of their salary.".

REPORTS BY PRESIDENTIAL NOMINEES

SEC. 6. Section 201(b) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" immediately after "(b)";

(2) by inserting after the first sentence the following: "Such individual shall, not later than the date of the first hearing to consider the nomination of such individual, make current the report filed pursuant to this paragraph by filing the information required by section 202(a)(1)(A) with respect to income and honoraria received as of the date which occurs five days before the date of such hearing."; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) An individual whom the President or the President-elect has publicly announced he intends to nominate to a position may file the report required by paragraph (1) at any time after that public announcement but not later than is required under the first sentence of such paragraph.".

ETHICS AGREEMENTS

SEC. 7. Title II is amended—

(1) by redesignating section 211 as section 212; and

(2) by inserting after section 210 the following new section:

"NOTICE OF ACTIONS TAKEN TO COMPLY WITH ETHICS AGREEMENTS

"SEC. 211. (a) In any case in which an individual agrees with that individual's designated agency official, the Office of Government Ethics, or a Senate confirmation committee to take any action to comply with this Act or any other law or regulation governing conflicts of interest of, or establishing standards of conduct applicable with respect to, officers or employees of the Government, that individual shall notify in writing the designated agency official, the Office of Government Ethics, or the appropriate committee of the Senate, as the case may be, of any action taken by the individual pursuant to that agreement. Such notification shall be made not later than the date specified in the agreement by which action by the individual must be taken, or not later than three months after the date of the agreement, if no date for action is so specified.

"(b) If an agreement described in subsection (a) requires that the individual recuse himself or herself from particular categories of agency or other official action, the individual shall reduce to writing those subjects regarding which the recusal agreement will apply and the process by which it will be determined whether the individual must recuse himself or herself in a specific instance. An individual shall be considered to have complied with the requirements of subsection (a) with respect to such recusal agreement if such individual files a copy of the document setting forth the information described in the preceding sentence with such individual's designated agency official, the Office of Government Ethics, or the appropriate committee of the Senate, as the case may be, within the time prescribed in the last sentence of subsection (a).".

BLIND TRUST AMENDMENTS

SEC. 8. (a) Sections 102(e)(7), 202(f)(7), and 302(f)(7) are each amended to read as follows:

"(7) Any trust may be considered to be a qualified blind trust if—

"(A) the trust instrument is amended to comply with the requirements of paragraph (3) or, in the case of a trust instrument which does not by its terms permit amendment, the trustee, the reporting individual, and any other interested party agree in writing that the trust shall be administered in accordance with the requirements of this subsection and the trustee of such trust meets the requirements of paragraph (3)(A), except that in the case of any interested party who is a dependent child, a parent or guardian of such child may execute the agreement referred to in this subparagraph;

"(B) a copy of the trust instrument (except testamentary provisions), a copy of the agreement referred to in subparagraph (A), and a list of the assets held by the trust at the time of approval by the supervising ethics office, including the category of value of each asset as determined under subsection (d) of this section, are filed with such office and made available to the public as provided under paragraph (5)(D) of this subsection; and

"(C) the supervising ethics office determines that approval of the trust arrangement as a qualified blind trust is in the particular case appropriate to assure compliance with applicable laws and regulations.".

(b) Sections 102(e)(5)(A), 202(f)(5)(A), and 302(f)(5)(A) are each amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "This subparagraph shall not apply with respect to a trust meeting the requirements for being considered a qualified blind trust under paragraph (7) of this subsection.".

APPLICATION OF FINANCIAL DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS TO STAFF OF FEDERAL ADVISORY COMMITTEES

SEC. 9. Section 201 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(j)(1) Any individual who performs staff functions in support of an advisory committee which is composed, in whole or in part, of special Government employees shall be subject to the provisions of this title as if that individual were such a special Government employee.

"(2) For purposes of paragraph (1)—

"(A) the term 'advisory committee' means any committee, board, commisssion, council, conference, panel, task force, or other similar group which is established—

"(i) by statute or reorganizaiton plan,

"(ii) by the President, or

"(iii) by one or more agencies,

in the interest of obtaining advice or recommendations for the President or one or more agencies or officers of the Federal Government; such term includes any subcommittee or other subgroup of an advisory committee, but does not include the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations and the Commission on Government Procurement;

"(B) the term 'staff functions in support of an advisory committee' means such activities as the Director of the Office of Government Ethics by regulation prescribes which are carried out with respect to those functions for which the advisory committee was established as described in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;

"(C) the term 'special Government employee' has the meaning given that term by section 202 of title 18, United States Code; and

"(D) the term 'agency' has the meaning given that term by section 551(1) of title 5, United States Code.

"(3) The Director of the Office of Government Ethics shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out this subsection.".

EXTENSION OF AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 10. Section 405 is amended in paragraph (2) by striking out "four" and inserting in lieu thereof "nine".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 11. The amendments made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1983.

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to amend the Ethics in Government Act of 1978 to make certain changes in the authority of the Office of Government Ethics, and for other purposes.".

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments with a further Senate amendment, which I send to the desk on behalf of Mr. COHEN and Mr. LEVIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), on behalf of Mr. COHEN and Mr. LEVIN proposes an amendment numbered 2236.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In lieu of the language inserted by the House insert the following:

AMENDMENTS TO ETHICS IN GOVERNMENT ACT OF 1978

SECTION 1. Except as otherwise expressly provided in this Act, whenever an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978.

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) An individual whom the President or the President-elect has publicly announced he intends to nominate to a position may file the report required by paragraph (1) at any time after that public announcement but not later than is required under the first sentence of such paragraph.".

ETHICS AGREEMENTS

SEC. 10. Title II is amended—

(1) by redesignating section 211 as section 212; and

(2) by inserting after section 210 the following new section:

"NOTICE OF ACTIONS TAKEN TO COMPLY WITH ETHICS AGREEMENTS

"SEC. 211. (a) In any case in which an individual agrees with that individual's designated agency official, the Office of Government Ethics, or a Senate confirmation committee to take any action to comply with this Act or any other law or regulation governing conflicts of interest of, or establishing standards of conduct applicable with respect to, officers or employees of the Government, that individual shall notify in writing the designated agency official, the Office of Government Ethics, or the appropriate committee of the Senate, as the case may be, of any action taken by the individual pursuant to that agreement. Such notification shall be made not later than the date specified in the agreement by which action by the individual must be taken, or not later than three months after the date of the agreement, if no date for action is so specified.

"(b) If an agreement described in subsection (a) requires that the individual recuse himself or herself from particular categories of agency or other official action, the individual shall reduce to writing those subjects regarding which the recusal agreement will apply and the process by which it will be determined whether the individual must recuse himself or herself in a specific instance. An individual shall be considered to have complied with the requirements of subsection (a) with respect to such recusal agreement if such individual files a copy of the document setting forth the information described in the preceeding sentence with such individual's designated agency official, the Office of Government Ethics, or the appropriate committee of the Senate, as the case may be, within the time prescribed, in the last sentence of subsection (a).".

BLIND TRUST AMENDMENTS

SEC. 11. Sections 102(e)(7), 202(f)(7), and 302(f)(7) are each amended to read as follows:

"(7) Any trust may be considered to be a qualified blind trust if—

"(A) the trust instrument is amended to comply with the requirements of paragraph (3) or, in the case of a trust instrument which does not by its terms permit amendment, the trustee, the reporting individual, and any other interested party agree in writing that the trust shall be administered in accordance with the requirements of this subsection and the trustee of such trust meets the requirements of paragraph (3)(A); except that in the case of any interested party who is a dependent child, a parent or guardian of such child may execute the agreement referred to in this subparagraph;

"(B) a copy of the trust instrument (except testamentary provisions) and a copy of the agreement referred to in subparagraph (A), and a list of the assets held by the trust at the time of approval by the supervising ethics office, including the category of value of each asset as determined under subsection (d) of this section, are filed with such office and made available to the public as provided under paragraph (5)(D) of this subsection; and

"(C) the supervising ethics office determines that approval of the trust arrangement as a qualified blind trust is in the particular case appropriate to assure compliance with applicable laws and regulations.".

(b) Sections 102(e)(5)(A), 202(f)(5)(A), and 302(f)(5)(A) are each amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "This subparagraph shall not apply with respect to a trust meeting the requirements for being considered a qualified blind trust under paragraph (7) of this subsection.".

APPLICATION OF FINANCIAL DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS TO STAFF OF FEDERAL ADVISORY COMMITTEES

SEC. 12. Section 201 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(j)(1) Any individual who performs staff functions in support of an advisory committee which is composed, in whole or in part, of special Government employees shall be subject to the provisions of this title as if that individual were such a special Government employee.

"(2) For purposes of paragraph (1)—

"(A) the term 'advisory committee' means any committee, board, commission, council, conference, panel, task force, or other similar group which is established—

"(i) by statute or reorganization plan,

"(ii) by the President, or

"(iii) by one or more agencies,

in the interest of obtaining advice or recommendations for the President or one or more agencies or officers of the Federal Government; such term includes any subcommittee or other subgroup of an advisory committee, but does not include the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations and the Commission on Government Procurement.

"(B) the term 'staff functions in support of an advisory committee' means such activities as the Director of the Office of Government Ethics by regulation prescribes which are carried out with respect to those functions for which the advisory committee was established as described in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;

"(C) the term 'special Government employee' has the meaning given that term by section 202 of title 18, United States Code; and

"(D) the term 'agency' has the meaning given that term by section 551(1) of title 5, United States Code.

"(3) The Director of the Office of Government Ethics shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out this subsection.".

EXTENSION OF AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 13. Section 405 is amended in paragraph (2) by striking out "four" and inserting in lieu thereof "nine".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 14. The amendments made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1983.

Amend the title so as to read "To amend the Ethics in Government Act of 1978 to make certain changes in the authority of the Office of Government Ethics, and for other purposes.".

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I urge that the Senate concur with the House amendment with a further amendment to S. 461, a bill to extend the authorization of the Office of Government Ethics for 5 years and to make other changes in the Ethics in Government Act of 1978. To insure a timely reauthorization, the Senate passed S. 461 on April 6. Last week, the House substituted the language of the Senate bill with provisions of its own bill, H.R. 2717, which shares many of the same goals of the Senate-passed bill. Although the two bills are similar in scope, some provisions differ. The amendment that I and Senator LEVIN are offering today includes important provisions from both bills and represents an effort to reach a compromise before the authorization of the Office expires on September 30.

The Senate and the House agree that the Office of Government Ethics performs a vital role in identifying, correcting, and preventing conflicts of interest by officials and employees of the executive branch and that it must be retained. In 7 days, however, the authorization of the OGE will expire. I urge the Senate and the House to act promptly to accept this compromise so that the existence of this crucial Office will not be jeopardized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER PLACING THE CONTINUING RESOLUTION ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, next I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate receives from the House of Representatives the continuing resolution, it be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER PLACING HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 366 ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that House Joint Resolution 366, a joint resolution providing for the temporary extension of certain insurance programs relating to housing and community development, be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER PLACING H.R. 3962 ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 3962, an act to extend the authorities under the Export Administration Act of 1979 until October 14, 1983, be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FUR SEAL ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1983

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the minority leader does not object, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 2840.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2840) entitled "An Act to provide for the orderly termination of Federal management of the Pribilof Islands, Alaska", with the following amendment:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert:

That this Act may be cited as the "Fur Seal Act Amendments of 1983".

SEC. 2. The Act of November 2, 1966 (Public Law 89-702; 16 U.S.C. 1151-1187), known as the Fur Seal Act of 1966, is amended to read as follows:

"(b) 'Convention' means the Interim Convention on the Conservation of North Pacific Fur Seals signed at Washington on February 9, 1957, as amended by the protocol signed in Washington on October 8, 1963; by the exchange of notes among the party governments which became effective on September 3, 1969; by the protocol signed in Washington on May 7, 1976; and by the protocol signed in Washington on October 14, 1980, by the parties.

"(c) 'Cure' or 'curing' means the performance of those post-harvest activities traditionally performed on the Pribilof Islands, including cooling, washing, removal of blubber, soaking in brine, draining, treating with salt or boric acid, and packing in containers for shipment of fur seal skins.

"(d) 'Fur Seal' means the North Pacific Fur Seal, Callorhinus Ursinus.

"(e) 'Import' means to land on, bring into, or introduce into, or attempt to land on, bring into, or introduce into, any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, whether or not such landing, bringing, or introduction constitutes an importation within the meaning of the customs laws of the United States.

"(f) 'Natives of the Pribilof Islands' means any Aleuts who are permanent residents of the Pribilof Islands, or any organization or entity representing such natives.

"(g) "North Pacific Ocean' means the waters of the Pacific Ocean north of the thirtieth parallel of north latitude, including the Bering, Okhotsk, and Japan Seas.

"(h) 'Party' or 'parties' means the United States of America, Canada, Japan, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

"(i) 'person' means any individual, partnership, corporation, trust, association or any other private entity, or any officer, employee, agent, department, or instrumentality of the Federal Government, of any State or political subdivision thereof, or of any foreign government.

"(j) 'Pribilof Islands' means the islands of Saint Paul and Saint George, Walrus and Otter Islands, and Sea Lion Rock.

"(k) 'Sealing' means the taking of fur seals.

"(l) 'Secretary' means the Secretary of Commerce.

"(m) 'Take' or 'taking' means to harass, hunt, capture, or kill, or attempt to harass, hunt, capture, or kill.

"SEC. 102. It is unlawful, except as provided in this Act or by regulation of the Secretary, for any person or vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to engage in the taking of fur seals in the North Pacific Ocean or on lands or waters under the jurisdiction of the United States, or to use any port or harbor or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States for any purpose connected in any way with such taking, or for any person to transport, import, offer for sale, or possess at any port or place or on any vessel, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, fur seals or the parts thereof, including, but not limited to, raw, dressed, or dyed fur seal skins, taken contrary to the provisions of this Act or the Convention, or for any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to refuse to permit, except within the Exclusive Economic Zone of the United States, a duly authorized official of Canada, Japan, or the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to board and search any vessel which is outfitted for the harvesting of living marine resources and which is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to determine whether such vessel is engaged in sealing contrary to the provisions of said Convention.

"SEC. 103. (a) Indians, Aleuts, and Eskimos who dwell on the coasts of the North Pacific Ocean are permitted to take fur seals and dispose of their skins after the skins have been officially marked and certified by a person authorized by the Secretary: Provided, That the seals are taken for subsistence uses as defined in section 109(f)(2) of the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972, as amended (16 U.S.C. 1379), and only in canoes not transported by or used in connection with other vessels, and propelled entirely by oars, paddles, or sails, and manned by not more than five persons each, in the way hitherto practiced and without the use of firearms. This authority shall not apply to Indians, Aleuts, and Eskimos while they are employed by any person for the purpose of taking fur seals or are under contract to deliver the skins to any person.

"(b) Indians, Aleuts, and Eskimos who live on the Pribilof Islands are authorized to take fur seals for subsistence purposes as defined in section 109(f)(2) of the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972, as amended (16 U.S.C. 1379), under such conditions as recommended by the Commission and accepted by the Secretary of State pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Secretary.

"SEC. 104. The Secretary shall (1) conduct such scientific research and investigations on the fur seal resources of the North Pacific Ocean as he deems necessary to carry out the obligations of the United States under the Convention, and (2) permit, subject to such terms and conditions as he deems desirable, the taking, transportation, importation, exportation, or possession of fur seals or their parts for educational, scientific, or exhibition purposes.

"SEC. 105. (a) The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations with respect to the taking of fur seals on the Pribilof Islands and on lands subject to the jurisdiction of the United States as he deems necessary and appropriate for the conservation, management, and protection of the fur seal population, and to dispose of any fur seals seized or forfeited pursuant to this Act, and to carry out the provisions of the Convention, and shall deliver to authorized agents of the parties such fur seal skins as the parties are entitled to under the Convention.

"(b) The Secretary is authorized to enter into agreements with any public or private agency or person for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Convention and of this title, including but not limited to the taking of fur seals on the Pribilof Islands, and the curing and marketing of the sealskins and other seal parts, and may retain the proceeds therefrom.

"(c) The Secretary shall give preference to the village corporations of Saint Paul and Saint George Islands established pursuant to section 8 of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (Public Law 92-203) for the taking of fur seals on the village corporations' respective islands, and the curing and marketing of the sealskins and other seal parts, and may retain the proceeds therefrom. Any proceeds therefrom will be deposited in a separate fund in the Treasury and will be available to the Secretary, subject to appropriations, for the purpose of this section. All seal harvests will be financed, to the extent possible, from proceeds collected in preceding years or unsold assets retained from harvests conducted in preceding years. In the event that such assets and proceeds are insufficient, as determined by the Secretary, to finance the seal harvest in accordance with the requirements of the Convention, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary for fiscal year 1984, and for fiscal year 1985 and beyond if the Convention is extended by protocol signed by the parties and made effective as to the United States, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the harvest and curing on the Pribilof Islands. Such amounts as are determined by the Secretary to exceed amounts required to carry out this section shall be transferred to the General Fund of the Treasury.

"SEC. 106. (a) Any person authorized to enforce the provisions of this Act who has reasonable cause to believe that any vessel outfitted for the harvesting of living marine resources and subject to the jurisdiction of any of the parties to the Convention is violating the provisions of article III of the Convention may, except within the areas in which another State exercises fisheries jurisdiction, board and search such vessel. Such person shall carry a special certificate of identification issued by the Secretary or Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating which shall be in English, Japanese, and Russian and which shall be exhibited to the master of the vessel upon request.

"(b) If, after boarding and searching such vessel, such person continues to have reasonable cause to believe that such vessel, or any person onboard, is violating said article, he may seize such vessel or arrest such person, or both. The Secretary of State shall, as soon as practicable, notify the party having jurisdiction over the vessel or person of such seizure or arrest.

"The Secretary or the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating, upon request of the Secretary of State, shall deliver the seized vessel or arrested person, or both, as promptly as practicable to the authorized officials of said party: Provided, That whenever said party cannot immediately accept such delivery, the Secretary or the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating may, upon the request of the Secretary of State, keep the vessel or person in custody within the United States.

"(c) At the request of said party, the Secretary or the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating, shall direct the person authorized to enforce the provisions of this Act to attend the trial as a witness in any case arising under said article or give testimony by deposition, and shall produce such records and files or copies thereof as may be necessary to establish the offense.

"SEC. 107. The President shall appoint to the Commission a United States Commissioner who shall serve at the pleasure of the President. The President may appoint one Native from each of the two inhabited Pribilof Islands to serve as Advisers to the Commissioner and as liaisons between the Commissioner and the Natives of the Pribilof Islands. The President may also appoint other interested parties as Advisers to the Commissioner. Such Advisers shall serve at the pleasure of the President. The President may also appoint a Deputy United States Commissioner who shall serve at the pleasure of the President. The Deputy Commissioner shall be the principal adviser of the Commissioner, and shall perform the duties of the Commissioner in the case of his death, resignation, absence, or illness. The Commissioner, the Deputy Commissioner, and the Advisers shall receive no compensation for their services. The Commissioners may be paid travel expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence at the rates authorized by section 5 of the Administrative Expense Act of 1946 when engaged in the performance of their duties.

"SEC. 108. The Secretary of State, with the concurrence of the Secretary, is authorized to accept or reject, on behalf of the United States, recommendations made by the Commission pursuant to article V of the Convention.

"SEC. 109. The head of any Federal agency is authorized to consult with and provide technical assistance to the Secretary or the Commission whenever such assistance is needed and reasonably can be furnished in carrying out the provisions of this title. Any Federal agency furnishing assistance hereunder may expend its own funds for such purposes, with or without reimbursement.

"TITLE II—ADMINISTRATION OF THE PRIBILOF ISLANDS

"SEC. 201. The Secretary shall administer the fur seal rookeries and other Federal real and personal property on the Pribilof Islands, with the exception of lands purchased by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service under section 1417 of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (Public Law 96-487) or acquired or purchased by any other authority after enactment of the Fur Seal Act Amendments of 1983 and, in consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, shall ensure that activities on such Islands are consistent with the purposes of conserving, managing, and protecting the North Pacific fur seals and other wildlife and for other purposes consistent with that primary purpose.

"SEC. 202. In carrying out the provisions of this title, the Secretary is authorized—

"(1) to operate, maintain, and repair such Government-owned property, both real and personal, and other facilities held by the Secretary on the Pribilof Islands as may be necessary; and

"(2) to provide the employees of the Department of Commerce and other Federal agencies and their dependents, at reasonable rates to be determined by the Secretary, with such facilities, services, and equipment as he deems necessary, including, but not limited to, food, shelter, and transportation.

"SEC. 203. The State of Alaska will be responsible for meeting the educational needs of the citizens of the Pribilof Islands.

"SEC. 204. The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall provide medical and dental care to the Natives of the Pribilof Islands with or without reimbursement, as provided by other law. He is authorized to provide such care to Federal employees and their dependents and tourists and other persons in the Pribilof Islands at reasonable rates to be determined by him. He may purchase, lease, construct, operate, and maintain such facilities, supplies, and equipment as he deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this section; and the costs of such items, including medical and dental care, shall be charged to the budget of the Secretary of Health and Human Services. Nothing in this Act shall be construed as superseding or limiting the authority and responsiblity of the Secretary of Health and Human Services under the Act of August 5, 1954, as amended, or any other law with respect to medical and dental care of natives or other persons in the Pribilof Islands.

"SEC. 205. (a) Any provision of law relating to the transfer and disposal of Federal property to the contrary notwithstanding, the Secretary, after consultation with the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating, is authorized to bargain, grant, sell or otherwise convey, on such terms as he deems to be in the best interests of the United States and in furtherance of the purposes of this Act, any and all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the property, both real and personal, held by the Secretary on the Pribilof Islands: Provided, That such property is specified in a document entitled 'Transfer of Property on the Pribilof Islands: Descriptions, Terms and Conditions,' which is submitted to the Congress on or before October 31, 1983.

"(b) The property transfer document described in subsection (a) shall include, but need not be limited to—

"(1) a description of each conveyance;

"(2) the terms to be imposed on each conveyance;

"(3) designation of the recipient of each conveyance;

"(4) a statement noting acceptance of each conveyance, including the terms, if any, under which it is accepted; and

"(5) an identification of all Federal property to be retained by the Federal Government on the Pribilof Islands to meet its responsibilities as described in this Act and under the Convention.

"(c) Within 60 days of the transfer of real or personal property specified in the document described in subsection (a), the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate shall be given a report prepared by the Secretary stating the fair market value at the time of the transfer of all real and personal property conveyed.

"(d) A Memorandum of Understanding shall be entered into by the Secretary, a representative of the local governmental authority on each Island, the trustee or trustees, and the appropriate officer of the State of Alaska setting forth the respective responsibilities of the Federal government, the Trust, and the State regarding—

"(1) application of Federal retirement benefits, severance pay, and insurance benefits with respect to Natives of the Pribilof Islands;

"(2) funding to be allocated by the State of Alaska for the construction of boat harbors on St. Paul and St. George Islands;

"(3) assumption by the State of Alaska of traditional State responsibilities for facilities and services on such islands in accordance with applicable laws and regulations;

"(4) preservation of wildlife resources within the Secretary's jurisdiction;

"(5) continued activities relating to the implementation of the Convention;

"(6) oversight of the operation of the Trust established by section 206(a) to further progress toward creation of a stable, diversified, and enduring economy not dependent on commercial fur sealing;

"(7) the cooperation of government agencies, rendered through existing programs, in assisting with an orderly transition from Federal management and the creation of a private enterprise economy on the Pribilof Islands as described in this Act; and

"(8) such other matters as may be necessary and appropriate for carrying out the purposes of the Act, including the assumption of responsibilities to ensure an orderly transition from Federal management of the Pribilof Islands.

The Memorandum shall be submitted to Congress on or before October 31, 1983.

"(e) The grant, sale, transfer or conveyance of any real or personal property pursuant to this section shall not be subject to any form of Federal, State or local taxation. The basis for computing gain or loss on subsequent sale or disposition of such real or personal property for purposes of any Federal, State or local tax imposed on, or measured by revenue shall be the fair market value of such real or personal property at the time of receipt.

"(f) In carrying out the purposes of this Act, the Secretary is authorized to enter into agreements, including but not limited to land exchange agreements with other Departments and Agencies of both the State and Federal Governments, and with third parties, notwithstanding any provision of law relating to the transfer and disposal of Federal property to the contrary; except that the authority of the Secretary of the Interior regarding exchanges involving lands in the National Wildlife Refuge System on the date of enactment of the Fur Seal Act Amendments of 1983 is not affected by this section.

"(g) The Secretary shall submit to Congress a report, no later than October 1, 1983, providing information on the status of the negotiations for concluding the documents described in subsections (a) and (d) of this section.

SEC. 206. (a)(1) In order to promote the development of a stable, self-sufficient enduring and diversified economy not dependent on sealing, the Secretary shall cause to be established a Trust for the benefit of the Natives of the Pribilof Islands, to be known as the 'Pribilof Islands Trust' (hereinafter referred to as the 'Trust').

"(2) All amounts appropriated to the Secretary under subsection (e) of this section shall be transfered by the Secretary to the Trust within fifteen days after submission of the Trust instrument to Congress in accordance with the requirements of subsection (c).

"(3) Except as provided in subsection (e)(2), none of the amounts transferred to the Trust pursuant to paragraph (2) shall be distributed by the trustee or trustees for the benefit of the Natives of the Pribilof Islands until 30 days after submission to Congress of the documents described in section 205(a) and (d). Such distributions shall be made by the trustee or trustees only after the Secretary has determined that such Trust has been established and will be operated in accordance with a trust instrument, or instruments, approved by the Secretary which further the purposes and policies of this Act.

"(4) Until the termination of the period described in paragraph (3), the trustee or trustees shall invest the amounts transferred pursuant to paragraph (2) in securities with maturities suitable for the needs of the Trust, bearing interest rates at rates determined by the trustee or trustees, taking into consideration average market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United Sates of comparable maturities. The income from such investments shall be credited to, and form a part of the Trust.

"(b) The Trust shall be administered in accordance with such terms and conditions as are prescribed by the Secretary, and as set forth in the Trust instrument. In establishing such terms and conditions, the Secretary shall consult with the Natives of the Pribilof Islands, and other interested parties concerning the conservation, management and protection of the fur seal population.

"(c) There may be one Trust instrument establishing the Trust described in Section 206(a), or two such instruments, each relating to one of the two portions of the Trust as provided in subsection (d), which shall address, but need not be limited to, such matters as—

"(1) establishing standards and procedures for the disbursement by the trustee or trustees of trust assets for purposes of fostering in the Pribilof Islands a stable, diversified, and enduring economy not dependent upon sealing after Federal management of the islands is terminated, which procedures may include formal participation of Pribilof Island Native councils, corporations, or other such entities;

"(2) establishing the Secretary as trustor;

"(3) establishing the procedure for appointment of the trustee or trustees by the Secretary after consultation with the Natives of the Pribilof Islands;

"(4) setting forth the rights, duties, powers and obligations of a trustee who shall act as an independent fiduciary and who shall be a United States citizen having recognized competence in business;

"(5) providing for the management and investment of Trust assets, pending distribution, by an investment manager or adviser, who may be the trustee, having recognized competence in such fields;

"(6) establishing methods and procedures for providing Congress and the Secretary with the annual reports described in subsection (g) of this section;

"(7) establishing Trust purposes in accordance with the purposes described in section 201 of this Act and subsection (a) of this section;

"(8) the duties of the trustee or trustees and the standards of care and diligence that shall govern the exercise of trust powers thereunder;

"(9) compensation of the trustee or trustees;

"(10) the term, termination and final distribution of the Trust estate;

"(11) mandating the applicability of the laws of the State of Alaska to the creation and governance of the Trust; and

"(12) defraying of community expenses; and

"(13) payment of necessary administrative and legal expenses.

The Trust instrument or instruments described in this subsection shall be submitted to Congress on or before October 14, 1983.

"(d) the Trust shall be divided into two portions pursuant to a formula established by the Secretary after consultation with the natives of both Islands, to be accounted for separately for the independent benefit of the community of St. Paul and the community of St. George.

"(e)(1) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary $20,000,000 for the purpose of funding the Trust in accordance with the requirements of subsection (a)(2) of this section.

"(2) Prior to the termination of the period described in subsection (a)(3) of this section, the trustee or trustees may make interim distributions for the benefit of the Natives of the Pribilof Islands, upon approval of the Secretary, of up to five percent of the amounts transferred to the trust pursuant to subsection (a)(2) of this section if, as determined by the Secretary, such interim distributions are required to carry out the purposes of this Act.

"(f) The interest on, and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of, any asset or obligation held in the Trust shall be credited to and form a part of the Trust.

"(g) The trustee or trustees shall submit to Congress and to the Secretary an annual report, the first of which is due on April 30, 1984, and subsequent reports on the same date each year thereafter during the life of the Trust, providing information on expenditures made from the Trust and progress toward achieving the purposes set out in subsection (a) of this section. On April 30, 1986, the Secretary shall also submit a report to the Congress detailing all progress toward achieving these purposes since enactment of this Act. For purposes of preparing such report, the Secretary by regulation may require that the trustee and the State of Alaska submit such relevant information to the Secretary as he deems appropriate.

"(h) The funds appropriated to the Trust and the earnings and distribution therefrom shall not be subject to any form of Federal, State or local taxation: Provided, That this exemption shall not apply to any income from the investment or other use of such distributions.

"SEC. 207. The Secretary is authorized to enter into agreements or contracts or leases with, or to issue permits to, any public or private agency or person for carrying out the provisions of the Convention or this Act.

"SEC. 208. (a) Service by natives of the Pribilof Islands engaged in the taking and curing of fur seal skins and other activities in connection with the administration of such islands prior to January 1, 1950, as determined by the Secretary based on records available to him, shall be considered for purposes of credit under the Civil Service Retirement Act, as amended, as civilian service performed by an employee, as defined in said Act.

"(b) The annuity of any person or the annuity of the survivor of any person who shall have performed service described in subsection (a) of this section, and who, prior to November 2, 1966, died or shall have been retired on annuity payable from the civil service retirement and disability fund, shall, upon application filed by the annuitant within one year after November 2, 1966, be adjusted, effective as of the first day of the month immediately following November 2, 1966, so that the amount of the annuity shall be the same as if such subsection had been in effect at the time of such person's retirement or death.

"(c) In no case shall credit for the service described in subsection (a) of this section entitle a person to the benefits of section 11(h) of the Civil Service Retirement Act.

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this Act or any other law, benefits under the Civil Service Retirement Act made available by reason of the provisions of this section shall be paid from the civil service retirement and disability fund subject to reimbursement to such fund from the Operations, Research, and Facilities Account of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration in the Department of Commerce, for the purpose of compensating said retirement fund for the cost, as determined by the Civil Service Commission during each fiscal year, of benefits provided by this section.

"SEC. 209. Chapter 83 of title 5, United States Code, is amended as follows:

"(a) by deleting 'Credit' in section 8332(b) and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'Except as provided in paragraph (13) of this subsection, credit';

"(b) by adding in section 8332(b) after paragraph (12) the following new paragraph:

'(13) one year of service to be credited for each year in which a Native of the Pribilof Islands performs service in the taking and curing of fur seal skins and other activities in connection with the administration of the Pribilof Islands, notwithstanding any period of separation from the service.';

"(c) by adding in section 8332(b) after 'paragraph (3) of this subsection.' the following sentence: 'The Office of Personnel Management shall accept the certification of the Secretary of Commerce or his designee concerning service for the purpose of this subchapter of the type performed by an employee named by paragraph (13) of this subsection.';

"(d) by adding in section 8332(f) after 'postal field service' the words 'and service described in paragraph (13) of subsection (b) of this section,';

"(e) by adding in section 8332(l)(1) the word 'or' at the end of clause (v) of subparagraph (B) thereof and by adding the following new subparagraph:

'(C) is of Aleut ancestry and while a citizen of the United States was interned or otherwise detained in, or relocated to any camp, installation, or other facility in the Territory of Alaska which was established during World War II for the purpose of the internment, detention, or relocation of Aleuts pursuant to any statute, rule, regulation, or order;'; and

"(f) by amending paragraph (4) of section 8334(g) by striking 'January 1, 1950' and substituting the words 'October 29, 1983,' and adding after 'the Pribilof Islands' the words 'except where deductions, contributions, and deposits were made before October 29, 1983'.

"SEC. 210. (a) Title I of the Act of January 4, 1975, Public Law 93-638 (25 U.S.C. §§ 450-450m), known as the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act, is amended by adding in section 105(e) after 'to be employed by a tribal organization' the words ', the city of St. Paul, Alaska, the city of St. George, Alaska, upon incorporation, or the Village Corporations of St. Paul and St. George Islands established pursuant to section 8 of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (Public Law 92-203)'.

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any Native of the Pribilof Islands employed by the Federal government on October 28, 1983, shall be deemed to have been covered under chapters 81, 83, 85 and 87 of title 5, United States Code, on such date for the purposes of determining eligibility for continuity of benefits under section 105(e) of the Act of January 4, 1975 (Public Law 93-638), known as the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act.

"SEC. 211. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

"TITLE III—ENFORCEMENT

"SEC. 301. (a) Every vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States that is employed in any manner in connection with a violation of the provision of this Act, including its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores shall be subject to forfeiture; and all fur seals, or parts thereof, taken or retained in violation of this Act, or the monetary value thereof, shall be forfeited.

"(b) All provisions of law relating to the seizure, summary and judicial forfeiture, and condemnation of a vessel, including its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores for violation of the customs laws, the disposition of such vessel, including its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores or the proceeds from the sale thereof, and the remission or mitigation of such forfeitures shall apply to seizures and forfeitures incurred, or alleged to have been incurred, under the provisions of this Act, insofar as such provisions of law are applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

"SEC. 302. (a) Enforcement of the provisions of this Act is the joint responsibility of the Secretary, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating. In addition, the Secretary may designate officers and employees of the States of the United States to enforce the provisions of this Act which relate to persons or vessels subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. When so designated, such officers and employees are authorized to function as Federal law enforcement agents for these purposes; but they shall not be held and considered as employees of the United States for the purpose of any laws administered by the Office of Personnel Management.

"(b) The judges of the United States district courts and United States magistrates may, within their respective jurisdictions, upon proper oath or affirmation showing probable cause, issue such warrants or other process, including warrants or other process issued in admiralty proceedings in Federal district courts, as may be required for enforcement of this Act and any regulations issued thereunder.

"(c) Any person authorized to carry out enforcement activities hereunder shall have the power to execute any warrant or process issued by any officer or court of competent jurisdiction for the enforcement of this Act.

"(d) Such person so authorized shall have the power—

"(1) with or without a warrant or other process, to arrest any person committing in his presence or view a violation of this Act or the regulations issued thereunder;

"(2) with a warrant or other process or without a warrant, if he has reasonable cause to believe that a vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States or any person onboard is in violation of any provision of this Act or the regulations issued thereunder, to search such vessel and to arrest such person.

"(e) Such person so authorized may seize any vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, together with its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores, used or employed contrary to the provisions of this Act or the regulations issued hereunder or which it reasonably appears has been used or employed contrary to the provisions of this Act or the regulations issued hereunder.

"(f) Such person so authorized may seize, whenever and wherever lawfully found, all fur seals taken or retained in violation of this Act or the regulations issued thereunder. Any fur seals so seized or forfeited to the United States pursuant to this Act shall be disposed of in accordance with the provisions of section 105 of this Act.

"SEC. 303. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he deems necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title.

"SEC. 304. (a) Any person who knowingly violates any provision of this Act or of any permit or regulation issued thereunder shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $20,000 for such violation, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

"(b) Any person who violates any provision of this Act or any regulation or permit issued hereunder may be assessed a civil penalty by the Secretary of not more than $10,000 for each such violation. No penalty shall be assessed unless such person is given notice and opportunity for a hearing with respect to such violation. Hearings held during proceedings for the assessment of civil penalties authorized by this subsection shall be conducted in accordance with section 554 of title 5. The Secretary may issue subpoenas for the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of relevant papers, books, and documents, and administer oaths. Witnesses summoned shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid to witnesses in the courts of the United States. In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena served upon any person pursuant to this paragraph, the district court of the United States for any district in which such person is found or resides or transacts business, upon application by the United States and after notice to such person, shall have jurisdiction to issue an order requiring such person to appear and give testimony before the Secretary or to appear and produce documents before the Secretary, or both, and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. Any civil penalty assessed may be remitted or mitigated by the Secretary for good cause shown. Upon any failure to pay a penalty assessed under this subsection, the Secretary may request the Attorney General to institute civil action in a district court of the United States for any district in which such person is found, resides, or transacts business to collect the penalty, and such court shall have jurisdiction to hear and decide any such action.

"SEC. 305. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated to the operations, research, and facilities account of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration in the Department of Commerce, such sums as may be necessary, up to $2,000,000, for fiscal year 1984 for the purpose of upgrading Federal property to be transferred pursuant to section 205 of this Act, $736,000 for fiscal year 1984 for the purposes of sections 104 and 208 of this Act and such sums as may be necessary for each fiscal year thereafter for the purposes of sections 104 and 208 of this Act.

"(b) The contract authority of the Secretary under this Act is effective for any fiscal year only to the extent that appropriations are available for such purposes.".

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, the legislation now before the Senate provides for the orderly termination of Federal management of the Pribilof Islands, Alaska. These islands have been administered until now as a Federal preserve, and their inhabitants have been denied the full measure of self-determination accorded other citizens.

This legislation was requested by the administration in early April of this year. It was introduced by Congressman DON YOUNG as H.R. 2840 on April 28. The House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries held a full hearing on May 19. At that hearing, testimony was received from NOAA, representing the administration, as well as the State of Alaska, the affected Pribilof Aleut communities, and environmental organizations.

The bill reflects extensive consultation with interested environmental organizations, the affected Aleut communities, the State of Alaska, the administration, and others. The bill facilitates the orderly transfer of Federal properties on the islands, the establishment of a trust to assist the islanders in converting to a private-sector economy not dependent upon sealing operations, and the assumption by the State of its responsibilities for the villages on the Pribilofs.

Mr. President, the Federal Government will continue to have important wildlife preservation responsibilities on the Pribilof Islands. The bird cliffs will continue to be managed as part of the wildlife refuge system. The fur seal rookeries will continue to be federally owned and managed by the Department of Commerce.

This legislation maintains and enhances environmental values on the Pribilofs—and it also gives the Aleut people who live there a good opportunity to develop a self-sufficient economy independent of Federal subsidy. There are vast resources in the Bering Sea fisheries. This legislation will permit the Aleut villages of St. Paul and St. George to enter commercial fishing in the waters contiguous to their islands.

H.R. 2840 continues in full force and effect all Federal responsibilities under the Interim North Pacific Fur Seal Convention, as implemented by the Fur Seal Act of 1966. The changes in existing law affect only the people of the islands, and the relationship between them and their government. Instead of providing an annual appropriation of some $6.3 million largely to maintain the Aleut communities, this legislation authorizes a one-time appropriation of $20 million, to be administered as a trust under conditions prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, for the benefit of the Pribilof Aleuts in maintaining essential services and converting to an economy not primarily reliant on sealing.

The bill also authorizes appropriations specifically to meet the Government's responsibilities under the convention, such as conducting scientific research and managing the fur seal rookeries. The House amendment includes a special condition in section 105(c) which makes authorizations beyond 1984 subject to extensions of the fur seal protocol. While the Senate is mindful that funds cannot be appropriated until authorized, it is permissible to provide an appropriation subject to extension of the protocol. It will be necessary to do so if the protocol is delayed during renegotiation to meet the intent of section 105(c).

The intent of section 210(b) is to provide that all natives of the Pribilof Islands who are Federal employees on October 28, 1983, regardless of type of appointment, are eligible to transfer specified benefits should they be hired by designated, qualifying, tribal organizations. This avoids an inequity to temporary employees, some of whom have been hired by the Federal Government regularly for many years.

H.R. 2840 will accomplish a number of worthwhile objectives. Over the coming years, the Government will save millions of dollars because the economy of the islands no longer will be a Federal responsibility. The people will become self-sufficient in the fisheries, tourism, and other industries. The protection of wildlife, as required by convention and Federal law, will be accomplished at substantially less cost.

Mr. President, I am particularly grateful for the cooperation of the administration, the House leadership, the House committee, the Senate Commerce Committee, the State of Alaska, the Aleut people of St. Paul and St. George, the interested environmental organizations, and my colleagues in the development of this responsible and compassionate legislation.

The Aleut people of St. Paul and St. George were transported to the Pribilofs in 1786, as slaves, by their Russian overseers. They were brought to support the fur trade. After 197 years, Congress today will liberate these Aleuts from their near-total dependence upon Government and sealing for survival. The promise made to the Aleuts, under the terms of article 3 of the Treaty of Cession, ratified May 30, 1867—that they shall enjoy within their communities the full rights of citizenship with opportunities equal to other American citizens—today will be fulfilled.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to approve H.R. 2840.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Without objection, the amendments are agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move the Senate concur in the House amendment to the Senate amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the transaction of routine morning business be extended until 6:10 p.m. under the same terms and conditions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

BUDGET RESCISSIONS AND DEFERRALS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 78

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which, pursuant to the order of January 30, 1975, was referred jointly to the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on the Budget, and the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, I herewith report increases to amounts previously deferred totaling $64,119,643.

The deferral increases affect the Board for International Broadcasting and the United States Information Agency.

The details of the deferrals are contained in the attached reports.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, September 28, 1983.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 2:32 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 92) designating the week beginning May 8, 1983, as "Municipal Clerk Week," with amendments, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 3813. An act to amend the International Coffee Agreement Act of 1980;

H.R. 3962. An act to extend the authorities under the Export Administration Act of 1979 until October 14, 1983;

H.J. Res. 137. Joint resolution authorizing and requesting the President to issue a proclamation designating the period from October 2, 1983, through October 8, 1983, as "National Schoolbus Safety Week of 1983";

H.J. Res. 284. Joint resolution commemorating the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration; and

H.J. Res. 366. Joint resolution to provide for the temporary extension of certain insurance programs relating to housing and community development, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

At 5:57 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bills:

H.R. 2972. An act to authorize certain construction at military installations for fiscal year 1984, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 3871. An act to amend the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982 to provide that the figure used in determining hourly rates of pay for Federal employees not be changed before the comparability adjustment in the rates of pay for such employees has been made for fiscal year 1984.

The enrolled bills were subsequently signed by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

HOUSE MEASURES PLACED ON CALENDAR

The following bills and joint resolutions were read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and placed on the calendar:

H.R. 3813. An act to amend the International Coffee Agreement Act of 1980;

H.R. 3962. An act to extend the authorities under the Export Administration Act of 1979 until October 14, 1983;

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-400. A resolution adopted by the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"RESOLUTIONS MEMORIALIZING THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES TO AUTHORIZE THE PRESIDENT TO PRESENT THE CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL OF HONOR TO JAMES L. CADIGAN

"Whereas, on February 26, 1945, 'C' Company of the 20th Armored Infantry Battalion of the 10th Armored Division was advancing on foot with a mission to secure the high ground north of Zerf, Germany, when the point of the company and the 3rd Platoon were attacked by heavy enemy fire from rifle grenades, machine guns and hand grenades; and

"Whereas, Lt. James L. Cadigan, following behind with his platoon, saw that the 3rd Platoon was hopelessly pinned down. Lt. Cadigan refused to expose his men to deadly enemy fire and instead, carrying a machine gun and ammunition, faced the enemy fire alone, repeatedly risking his life and singlehandedly knocking out two enemy machine guns and two enemies armed with automatic weapons, killing fifty enemies and capturing eighty-five; and

"Whereas, these acts of bravery, witnessed by Lt. Cadigan's Army Commanding Officer and at least seven others, saved two platoons, made it possible for 'C' Company to evacuate their wounded, reorganize and continue their attack, and contributed most significantly to the capture of Zerf; and

"Whereas, Lt. Cadigan's commanding officer recommended Lt. Cadigan for a Medal of Honor for his acts of 'Most extraordinary bravery'; and

"Whereas, Lt. Cadigan has been denied the Medal of Honor due to the admitted failure of his commanding officer to recommend Lt. Cadigan for the award within the specified time limitations; and

"Whereas, Lt. Cadigan served his country bravely and honorably and today, as a Major, USAR, ret., is rated permanently and totally disabled by the Veterans' Administration for combat related wounds and injuries sustained during World War II; and

"Whereas, Lt. Cadigan has been trying for thirty-eight years to obtain the decoration which he so clearly deserves and Lt. Cadigan has suffered a great injustice by the failure to award him the Medal of Honor for which he was recommended; and

"Whereas, the United States Congress in 1978 waived the time limitation for Anthony Casamento of West Islip, New York, who, in 1980, was finally awarded the Medal of Honor; Now therefore be it

"Resolved, by the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts that the Congress of the United States is urged to adopt legislation immediately authorizing the President to present the Medal of Honor to James L. Cadigan; and be it further

"Resolved, that copies of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk of the Senate to the President of the United States, the Vice-President of the United States, the Speaker and Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, Members of Congress from the Commonwealth, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and to James L. Cadigan of Hingham."

POM-401. Joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 19

"Whereas, Changes in national policy have evolved in an effort to accommodate competition in the telephone and communications industries; and

"Whereas, This change in policy has resulted in court rulings instituting a process of divestiture for the American Telephone and Telegraph Company which will result in the creation of independent regional telephone corporations such as Pacific Telephone Company with responsibility for providing local telephone service; and

"Whereas, The ability of these local telephone corporations to continue providing quality universal basic telephone service at affordable rates not only presently but also in the future is in question; and

"Whereas, The continued furnishing of quality universal basic telephone service at affordable rates for all Americans is essential in the maintenance of a sound economy and for the safety and well-being of the people; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the President and Congress of the United States are respectfully memorialized to direct the Federal Communications Commission to review the effects of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company divestiture rulings and related policies and decisions upon the ability of local telephone corporations such as Pacific Telephone Company to provide quality universal basic telephone service at affordable rates and to take such action as is necessary to protect the financial integrity of local telephone corporations including their continued ability to provide basic services at affordable rates; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, and to the Federal Communications Commission."

POM-402. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 30—

"Whereas, The Congress of the United States recently passed, and the President signed, the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 (P.L. 97-424); and

"Whereas, Under Title V of the act (known as the Highway Revenue Act of 1982), the federal taxes on trucks and semi-trailers were increased eight-fold and the gasoline, diesel, and special motor fuel tax rates increased five cents ($0.05) per gallon; and

"Whereas, The Legislature of the State of California enacted, and the Governor signed into law, an increase in weight fees on trucks, increasing the weight fee 60 percent, and added two cents ($0.02) per gallon to the fuel tax; and

"Whereas, Truck carriers of agricultural products operate on a seasonal basis consisting of one or two quarters of the year; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to allow the truck carriers of agricultural products to pay the new federal highway fees enacted in the Highway Revenue Act of 1982, Title V of the Surface Transportation Act of 1982 (P.L. 97-424), on an apportioned quarterly basis; and be it further

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Secretary of the United States Department of Transportation, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-403. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 26

"Whereas, In 1969, the Santa Barbara federal ecological preserve and buffer zone were established by then Secretary of Interior Walter Hickel to be reserved for scientific, recreational and other similar uses; and

"Whereas, Pursuant to the Marine Sanctuaries Act of 1977, then Secretary of Commerce Philip Klutznick established, with the approval of President Carter, the Channel Island Marine Sanctuary to protect its ecological, esthetic, and recreational values; and

"Whereas, In 1980, the Congress and President Carter established the Channel Islands National Park to protect its nationally significant natural, scenic, wildlife, marine, ecological, archaeological, cultural, and scientific values; and

"Whereas, Both the Channel Islands Marine Sanctuary and the Santa Barbara Ecological Preserve and Buffer Zone are environmentally sensitive habitat areas, have nationally recognized esthetic and recreational values, and support valuable commercial fisheries; and

"Whereas,The Channel Islands, surrounded by and partially included within the Channel Islands Marine Sanctuary, support 80 species of resident and migrant birds, provide breeding and pupping areas for five species of seals and sea lions, significant foraging and breeding areas for 13 bird species and contain the only stable breeding area for the California Brown Pelican, designated an endangered species by the California Department of Fish and Game pursuant to the California State Endangered Species Act of 1970; and

"Whereas, These sanctuary, preserve, and buffer zone areas are biologically productive areas, contributing to the fisheries of the Santa Barbara Channel, and therefore the California commercial fishing industry; and

"Whereas, Oil development and production within any of these three areas presents serious hazards to the ecological, esthetic, recreational, and commercial values of these areas and greatly increases the portential catastrophic damage to these resources in the event of an oil spill; and

"Whereas, Oil development and production in these areas would have significant adverse impacts on the commercial fishing industry directly from physical interference during all stages of operations and indirectly from reduced biological productivity of the fisheries; and

"Whereas, The installation of oil production platforms in these areas would reduce, on an individual as well as a cumulative basis, the esthetic and therefore recreational values of these areas, particularly the Channel Islands National Park; and

"Whereas, By federal policy and regulation, no leasing or oil development has occurred in any of the areas since their establishment; and

"Whereas, Secretary of Interior James Watt has consistently attempted to reverse this longstanding policy; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the legislature of the State of California strongly urges the President and Congress of the United States to enact legislation which gives permanent, except in case of national need, statutory protection to the Santa Barbara ecological preserve and its adjunct, the buffer zone, and to the Channel Islands Marine Sanctuary; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit suitably prepared copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior of the United States, to each United States Senator and Member of the House of Representatives in the California delegation, and to the chairperson of all committees which will review this legislation."

POM-404. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 65

"Whereas, The area of origin statutes were established by California to protect the future water needs of the areas where water originates in order to allow development and use of waters temporarily or permanently surplus to these areas by distant regions; and

"Whereas, The area of origin statutes consist of the 1931 County of Origin Law, the 1933 Watershed Protection Act, and the 1959 Delta Protection Act; and

"Whereas, Protections for the areas of origin have been included as conditions in all water rights issued by the state to the federal Central Valley Project; and

"Whereas, The federal government, through the Department of the Interior, is now suing the state seeking to repudiate any obligation of the federal government to comply with the state's County of Origin Law, Watershed Protection Act, Delta Protection Act, and area of origin protections included in water right decisions issued by the state to the federal Central Valley Project; and

"Whereas, The federal government is also suing the state on the legal premise that the state's protections for areas of origin are unconstitutional, in that they violate the requirement in the California Constitution that water be used reasonably and beneficially; and

"Whereas, A successful federal lawsuit to invalidate California's protections for areas of origin will have a devastating effect on the future economies and land values in the areas of origin; and

"Whereas, the federal lawsuit to invalidate the state's protections for the areas of origin will eliminate any support in the areas of origin for the construction of any new federal water projects which propose to export water from the areas of origin; and

"Whereas, The federal lawsuit to invalidate the state's protections for the areas of origin will eliminate any trust in California between the areas of origin and the areas of shortage and will therefore greatly impede any solution to California's long-range water problems; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully requests the Department of the Interior to drop its litigation against the State of California which seeks to invalidate the state's area of origin laws; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior, to the Commissioner of Reclamation, to the Attorney General of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-405. A resolution adopted by the Council of the County of Maui, Hawaii opposing the sale of Federal surplus lands; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

POM-406. A resolution adopted by the Board of Supervisors of the County of Nevada, Calif. opposing the Federal litigation attacking the California area of origin laws; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

POM-407. A resolution adopted by the City Council of Yuba City, Calif. requesting the Federal Government to withdraw its lawsuit with respect to California area of origin legislation; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

POM-408. A resolution adopted by the Town Council of the town of Paradise, Calif. relating to the water rights of areas of origin in the State of California; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

POM-409. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 18

"Whereas, Ninety percent of all people on welfare are women and children; and

"Whereas, Sixty-four percent of all families headed by women in California are dependent on the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program; and

"Whereas, A woman, on the average, earns less than sixty cents for every dollar earned by a man; and

"Whereas, Over two-thirds of all the fully employed women in the United States earn less than ten thousand dollars per year; and

"Whereas, The systematic reduction in work incentives hits hardest at the families whose earnings are at or near the minimum wage and whose work efforts should be supported rather than discouraged; and

"Whereas, A recent study has described the reduction of work incentives as counterproductive because the government may ultimately have to increase welfare payments to a mother who curtails her work effort; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, By the Assembly and Senate of the State of California jointly, That the Legislature hereby memorializes the President and Congress of the United States to repeal changes made by the federal Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 which reduce the incentive for mothers who are covered by the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program to work.

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-410. A resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; to the Committee on Finance.

RESOLUTIONS MEMORIALIZING THE CONGRESS TO TERMINATE FEDERAL SUBSIDIES OF CERTAIN DOMESTIC STEEL COMPANIES

"Whereas, The United States Steel Corporation controversially proposes to import some three million tons a year of semi-finished steel slabs from the government-owned British Steel Corporation, thereby causing the closing of domestic steel-making facilities and the loss of three thousand jobs; and

"Whereas, potential dislocation within the domestic steel production industry is compounded by Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Company proposals to import subsidized steel slabs from Brazil; and

"Whereas, with the domestic steel industry just emerging from its worst depression in many years, the achievement of the aforementioned designs would detrimentally affect the American economy and flagrantly discriminate against thousands of laid-off employees in the steel and allied and support industries; and

"Whereas, coupled with recent purchases of construction steel from Japan and Korea, the intended purchases of foreign steel manifestly violate the 1974 Trade Act, which prohibits unfair trade practices for the import of subsidized steel; and

"Whereas, the prospect of the United States corporations faithlessly soliciting foreign steel producers after being given tax breaks to modernize domestic steel production plants is particularly offensive to steel laborers who are cognizant that, in the case of Brazil, the proposed arrangement would be with the state-owned steel company of a military dictatorship which has been widely condemned in recent years for the jailing of leaders of the metalworkers union; therefore be it

Resolved, That the Massachusetts House of Representatives hereby urges the Congress of the United States to terminate Federal subsidies of U.S. Steel Corporation and Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Company unless the said companies cease to purchase steel from Great Britain, Brazil or any other country; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the Presiding Officer of each branch of Congress and to the members thereof from this Commonwealth."

POM-411. A resolution adopted by the Common Council of the town of Superior, Ariz., requesting passage of legislation to aid the copper industry and improve economic conditions in the copper mining communities of Arizona; to the Committee on Finance.

POM-412. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 62

"Whereas, Small business is the backbone of the nation's economy, providing the majority of jobs and product innovations in the private sector, and producing over half of all goods and services; and

"Whereas, Renewed economic prosperity depends upon the strength of the small business sector; and

"Whereas, The economic climate for small business has worsened, resulting in increasing numbers of small business failures, and their increasing difficulty in obtaining financing from traditional sources; and

"Whereas, Small businesses need access to new, alternative sources of capital; and

"Whereas, The Small Business Participating Debenture constitutes a new financing instrument which will promote investment in small business, and provide needed capital to small firms with potential for growth and employment; and

"Whereas, The establishment of the Small Business Participating Debenture was a priority of both the White House Conference on Small Business and the California State Conference on Small Business; and

"Whereas, California's Small Business Participating Debenture tax benefits will be a more effective incentive to investment if there are federal benefits, due to the difference between federal and state taxation levels; and

"Whereas, California has legislation prepared to match the federal Small Business Participating Debenture, pending Congressional action; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact S. 842 by Senator Weicker establishing the Small Business Participating Debenture; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-413. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 25

"Whereas, Eligibility for aid under the federal Supplemental Security Income for the Aged, Blind, and Disabled program is determined in part upon the value of resources held by an applicant for or recipient of aid, excluding the value of the applicant's or recipient's home; and

"Whereas, The proceeds from the sale of a home are similarly excluded from eligibility calculations only if applied within three months of receipt to the purchase of another home; and

"Whereas, These restrictions create an undue hardship by jeopardizing eligibility for aid as to an applicant or recipient who carries a promissory note upon the sale of his or her home as an alternative to conventional financing, in that the total proceeds from such a sale are not immediately available for use in the purchase of another home; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and Congress of the United States, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Commissioner of Social Security to revise the Supplemental Security Income for the Aged, Blind, and Disabled program to exclude from considerations of eligibility for aid the value of any promissory note held by an applicant or recipient upon the sale of his or her home, provided that the proceeds from the note are expended within three months of receipt toward the purchase of another home or for rental of a principal residence; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and to the Commissioner of Social Security."

POM-414. A resolution adopted by the Western States Conference of Machinists and Aerospace Workers relating to Qantas Airlines; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

POM-415. A resolution adopted by the Board of Supervisors of San Mateo County, Calif., urging Qantas Airways and the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers to engage in further negotiations in order to restore jobs to former employees; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

POM-416. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Guam; ordered to lie on the table:

"RESOLUTION No. 291

"Whereas, Henry M. "Scoop" Jackson was elected United States Senator by the people of Washington and began serving on January 3, 1953; and

"Whereas, Senator Jackson served for many years as the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and its successor the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources; and

"Whereas, during his tenure as chairman many significant changes were made in federal laws affecting Guam; and

"Whereas, Senator Jackson was instrumental in the passage of two laws which greatly enhanced self-government by the people of Guam—the 1968 "elected governor" law and the 1972 "Guam's Non-voting Delegate to Congress" law; and

"Whereas, Senator Jackson frequently stood as an advocate for the territories and Guam in particular; and

"Whereas, the people of Guam felt the loss of a true friend when they learned of the untimely passing of Senator Jackson; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, that the Seventeenth Guam Legislature, on behalf of the people of Guam, extends sincere condolences to the family of the late Senator Henry M. "Scoop" Jackson; and be it further

"Resolved, that the Seventeenth Guam Legislature extends its condolences to the people of Washington who have lost one of their finest sons; and be if further

"Resolved, that the Speaker certify to and the Legislative Secretary attest the adoption hereof and that copies of the same be thereafter transmitted to the widow of the late Senator Jackson, Helen Jackson; to the Governor of Washington; to the President of the U.S. Senate; to Guam's Congressional Delegate; and to the Governor of Guam."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following executive reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. PERCY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Michael Novak, of the District of Columbia, to be a Member of the Board for International Broadcasting for a term expiring April 28, 1985 (Ex. Rept, No. 98-18) (together with additional views).

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, from the committee on Armed Services, I report favorably the following nominations: Brig. Gen. William P. Winkler, Jr., U.S. Army, to be major general, Brig. Gen. Tracey E. Strevey, Jr., U.S. Army, to be major general, Gen. Jerome F. O'Malley, U.S. Air Force, to be reassigned to the grade of general, Lt. Gen. Lawrence A. Skantze, U.S. Air Force, to be reassigned to the grade of general, and Lt. Gen. Robert D. Russ, U.S. Air Force, to be reassigned to the grade of lieutenant general. I ask that these names be placed on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. President, in addition, in the Air Force there are 3 appointments to the grade of captain (list begins with Philip N. Brown) and in the Air Force there are 1,588 appointments to the grade of captain and below (list begins with Gary J. Abbate). Since these names have already appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to save the expense of printing again, I ask unanimous consent that they be ordered to lie on the Secretary's desk for the information of any Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The nomination lists appeared in the RECORD of September 20, 1983 at the end of Senate proceedings.)

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. ARMSTRONG (for himself and Mr. WALLOP):

S. 1897. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to assist in lessening the impact on communities of rapid growth resulting from energy or resource development, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. ARMSTRONG:

S. 1898. A bill relating to deposit relief of small business; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 1899. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to permit certain scientific or educational organizations to issue tax-exempt bonds to finance scientific or educational facilities or equipment; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S. 1900. A bill to require the executive branch to enforce applicable equal employment opportunity laws and directives so as to promote pay equity and eliminate wage-setting practices which discriminate on the basis of sex, race, or ethnicity and result in discriminatory wage differentials; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. ARMSTRONG:

S. 1901. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to treat price level adjusted mortgages; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, Mr. STEVENS, and Mr. JEPSEN):

S. 1902. A bill to amend title 39, United States Code, to assure that the 9-digit ZIP Code remains voluntary, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

By Mr. D'AMATO:

S. 1903. A bill for the relief of Winnie M. Tse; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GRASSLEY (for himself, Mr. PRYOR, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, and Mr. MELCHER):

S. 1904. A bill to require that the Department of Defense increase the use of formal advertising in the procurement of property and services, to limit the circumstances under which such department may award contracts by negotiation, to establish additional requirements with respect to the negotiation of contracts by such department, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. BAUCUS (for himself, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BAKER, and Mr. BYRD):

S. 1905. A bill to authorize funds for the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. STENNIS:

S.J. Res. 171. Joint resolution for the designation of July 20, 1984, as "National P.O.W./M.I.A. Recognition Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. DODD, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. NUNN, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. WARNER, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. GRASSLEY):

S.J. Res. 172. Joint resolution authorizing and requesting the President to issue a proclamation designating the period from October 2, 1983, through October 8, 1983, as "National Schoolbus Safety Week of 1983"; read twice and placed on the calendar.

By Mr. JOHNSTON:

S.J. Res. 173. Joint resolution commending the Historic American Buildings Survey, a program of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were reads and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. DOLE, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. EAST, and Mr. SPECTER):

S. Res. 231. Resolution calling upon the Department of Justice and other appropriate Federal agencies to faithfully enforce the Federal antitrust laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and Mr. TSONGAS):

S. Res. 232. Resolution in honor of Carl Yastrzemski of the Boston Red Sox; submitted and placed on the calendar.

STATEMENT ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. ARMSTRONG:

S. 1897. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to assist in lessening the impact on communities of rapid growth resulting from energy or resource development, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

ENERGY COMMUNITY SELF-HELP ACT OF 1983

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, western Colorado has the energy sources America desperately needs—enough gas and coal to keep the United States going for decades.

But how fast these resources can be developed, and at what social, economic, and environmental cost to our State, depends on reversing Federal policies which hinder prudent and orderly development.

In an area smaller than our 13 original States, western Colorado has a trillion barrels of oil locked in shale; at least half is now economically recoverable with a market value of $17 trillion. The State also has 500 billion tons of coal and 500 billion cubic feet of natural gas. Increible though it may seem, every home, car, factory, and office building in the United States could be fueled by Colorado energy at present rates of use, for the next 100 years.

But producing and marketing even a fraction of this immense energy potential will require massive development.

If Colorado's energy is even partially developed, no fewer than 25 new communities would be needed for Colorado and the Rocky Mountain West over the next 10 to 20 years. Colorado's population potentially will increase more than 100 percent; if this happens, at least 40 new schools, 28,000 miles of roads, 71,000 homes must be built; road bridges—once only crossed by schoolbuses—must be converted to support 18-wheel dump trucks. Dozens of municipal buildings, jails, courts, water treatent facilities, hospitals—the list seems endless—must be erected.

Colorado's energy development has had a checkered past. Coal and oil shale development projects have been started, closed and started again at almost a dizzying pace. Even though large-scale energy production has not yet begun, Colorado is already experiencing acute growing pains. Population in western Colorado is already up 25 percent in less than a decade. Demands on water supply are already severe. Where less than a decade ago violent crime was unheard of in some frontier towns, some cities are faced with 400-percent and even higher increases in violent crimes. Housing is scarce; incredibly, there is no measurable apartment vacancy rate. And when housing is found, it is expensive.

Already Colorado's environmental shroud is beginning to tear; the State's renowned lakes and streams are under enormous fishing pressure; dust from mining and construction is sometimes making it difficult for some in Colorado to breathe; traffic congestion is at times worse than that experienced in New York City.

Right now, two major oil shale projects are underway. Union Oil's first commercial-size shale plant will begin production this year. Union is already planning construction for a larger plant that will extract oil from shale in 1988.

The second shale project—Cathedral Bluffs—is now in final negotiations for a $2 billion Federal loan guarantee from the Synthetic Fuels Corporation to begin plant construction.

Just these two projects alone will create 5,000 new jobs in communities that now cannot house or provide the necessary services to its current populations.

These human needs are great, varied and expensive to satisfy. But before any large-scale development takes place, these needs must be met immediately. Hospitals and roads cannot be erected after the population arrives; they must be in place beforehand. The same is true for water treatment facilities, schools, jails, and all the other essentials of urban living.

And so the dilemma: Social chaos will result if needed facilities are not available before, or at least when, the population booms. Yet such facilities are financed by property taxes which become available too late. Indeed it takes at least 2 years from the time that new commercial and residential properties are constructed for them to be assessed and tax payments to begin.

This 2 year "tax lag" is an acute problem in western Colorado. One study shows that the capital needs of Colorado's new and booming towns will exceed revenues by more than a 5-to-1 margin, and it is not inconceivable that this deficit may never be made up.

As it so often happened in the past, Coloradans are meeting these growth problems head-on with creativity and resourcefulness. Elected officials are rewriting their policies to do all they can to insure that development keeps pace with social needs. No less than a dozen citizens commissions are analyzing future energy-related growth, and estimating what facilities are needed where and when.

The State legislature has enacted legislation to allow firms to prepay their State and local property taxes, and these prepaid taxes—the amount an energy firm will owe the State the next 5 to 15 years—will help finance facilities needed today.

The legislature has also enacted severance taxes which will raise money once energy production begins.

To their credit, energy firms are contributing significant energy impact sums in anticipation of future profits. One firm, Union Oil, will invest more than $60 million, including $22 million to house employees and $12 million to help upgrade local roads, increase police protection and water treatment, build a new school, and finance new fire protection and recreation services. Western Energy Corp. just signed an agreement to provide more than $60 million to offset impacts caused by a new coal mine. Another firm will finance a new school with interest-free loans. Other firms are following suit.

Although the sums contributed by energy firms are significant, they do not meet all the needs created by resource development. Fortunately, energy firms want to contribute more, and every impact aid dollar is feverishly desired by local officials.

What hinders energy firms from contributing more money is Federal tax law. Even though the Federal Government has the most to gain from energy development—at least $40 billion in new tax revenues and achievement of its national goal of energy independence—Washington has been strangely silent about the needs created by energy development. Worse, tax policy discourages local initiatives to resolve the problem.

One fact must be made clear. No one in Colorado expects large Federal energy impact aid programs nor, frankly, are such programs wanted. We are aware that, with a Federal budget projecting $200 billion in future deficits, it is unlikely that a costly Federal direct aid program will be created. Moreover, Coloradans oppose traditional Washington solutions that only throw money at a problem. With some exceptions, such programs are uncertain, undesirable, have no return on the original investment and are insensitive to local needs.

But what Colorado rightfully expects is the Federal Government to end those practices that interfere with local energy impact initiatives.

That is the goal of the legislation I am introducing today.

There are two inequities in current tax law that my bill seeks to address. First, the Internal Revenue Service gives energy firms a Federal tax deduction for paying their State and local taxes, but only 1 year at a time. Thus, a company has an incentive not to prepay its State and local taxes, even though Colorado law allows it to do so, because Federal tax law only gives a tax deduction for paying year by year. The bill I am introducing permits energy firms to prepay State and local taxes and get a Federal tax deduction for doing so.

The second obstacle in tax law is that it provides no certainty about the tax treatment of expenses incurred by industry for energy impact assistance. Contributions made by energy firms to local governments that finance community facilities should be a normal business expense, and therefore federally deductible the same year it is made, but it is not. Energy firms lack clear guidance about what constitutes deductible expenses for energy impact assistance. The Internal Revenue Service has made one arbitrary ruling after another in this area. The result? There is no financial incentive—in fact, there is a powerful disincentive—for energy firms to work hand in hand with State and local governments to provide the necessary services.

There are several reasons for the tax uncertainty that is so pervasive in this tax area. First, expenses are only deductible if they are made by a "going trade or business." The problem with oil shale development is that it is a capital-intensive industry with long leadtime necessary before production begins. Thus, the Internal Revenue Service has ruled that energy impact contributions are not deductible in the year made; rather, they are capitalized as a cost of the total project, making tax relief possible only at the sale of the project or at the end of the useful life of the project.

The second problem is section 167 of the Internal Revenue Code, the charitable contributions section. This section provides deductions made for contributions to a civic or charitable purpose. To qualify as a deduction under this section, the contribution can only be for a "benevolent purpose" and cannot benefit the firm making the contribution. Thus, if a firm provides funds to build a school for the children of a community in which its employees will live, the firm cannot deduct these expenses under section 167.

To eliminate any uncertainty, my legislation creates a new section in the tax code providing deductions for energy impact expenditures. My approach is simple. Energy firms whose assessed value exceeds $50 million upon completion will be able to deduct contributions in the year made for facilities or services contributed to State and local areas where there is significant energy development.

Is this legislation necessary? Let me quote from a few of the letters I have received:

. . . the only relief offered for money advanced for mitigation of socio-economic impact is prepayment of future "ad valorem" or severance tax . . . Allowing this (prepayment) to be expensed in the year it was expended would be extremely helpful . . . properly constructed tax benefits to encourage support of community facility development should not have to be limited—they could be planned to give the developers incentive to minimize them.—Roger Loper, President, Chevron Shale Oil Company.

. . . The tax treatment of sums contributed to help finance community development projects designed to mitigate socio-economic impacts varies according to the circumstances of each gift. To encourage impact mitigation contributions, legislation should permit payments credited against future tax liabilities to be deducted in the year paid rather than in the year of tax obligation.—F. D. Dennstedt, Senior Vice President, Exxon Company, U.S.A.

There is no specific provision of the Internal Revenue Code covering amounts contributed to mitigate socio-economic impacts. Depending upon the circumstances surrounding a particular contribution and the nature of the assistance, expenditures incurred may or may not be deductible for federal income tax purposes. This uncertainty quite often causes needless concern in the decision-making process regarding potential impact assistance . . . legislation encompassing a current deduction for such expenditures is badly needed.—John M. Hopkins, President, Union Oil.

(legislation to) encourage the prepayment of state severance taxes and property taxes would encourage the utilization of this method to provide the upfront financing of local facilities and services impacted by such development.—Harry Bowes, Executive Vice President, Colorado Counties, Inc.

Here is how my bill would work once it is enacted: First, if a State allows for prepaid property taxes and the taxes are used for needs related to energy growth, large energy projects—at least $50 million in taxable property or in projected income—can prepay its State taxes, and deduct such payments in the year the payment is made.

Second, my bill creates a new section in the Internal Revenue Code that provides a deduction for energy impact assistance expenditures. Large energy firms will qualify for this deduction if their energy impact contribution is paid to a unit for State or local government to help pay for facilities or services the entire community can use, like hospitals, roads, schools, parks, fire and police protection, water supply, and governmental administration.

Consider a real life example of the current problems, and how my legislation offers a solution.

Union Oil is building a $500 million, 10,000 barrel per day oil shale plant that will be finished by mid-1983. It has contributed substantial sums to impact mitigation, more than $60 million. Let us look at a specific example—a $500,000 cash contribution made to Parachute for fire protection for the town.

They cannot write the cost off as a civic and charitable contribution because they theoretically will make use of the fire services, so they do not meet the benevolence test now required in law. They cannot claim it as a cost of doing business because the principal beneficiary is likely to be the town of Parachute, and not the company.

They are likely to capitalize to include the cost as part of the total cost of the project, and then depreciate it over the useful life. A $500,000 contribution added to a $500 million project will not provide a tax incentive to make this and other types of contributions.

This legislation is consistent with what I believe should be the purpose of both national and local energy policy: To build energy projects that are technically sound, environmentally responsible and financially rewarding—all located in communities whose facilities, services, and infrastructures can support, with minimum stress, the needs of thousands of employees and their families who will be needed to operate and maintain each of these projects.

This legislation accomplishes this goal in three ways:

First, it removes Federal tax obstacles preventing full local government-industry cooperation in jointly planning any large energy projects. Essentially, this bill removes the Federal Government as a negative force in energy project planning and energy impact mitigation. Local governments will be free to negotiate the best deal they can about how much financial help will be required from new developments before the necessary State and local permits will be issued. Both the energy firms and local officials will know that whatever sums are contributed, they will be deductible from Federal tax returns.

The fact remains unchallenged that healthy communities mean increased morale, less turnover, higher productivity, faster construction and lower costs in energy development in the long run. Thus, energy firms will ultimately save vast sums if they pay—as many are willing to do—adequate attention to front-end community impact mitigation measures. It also encourages communities and companies to become allies instead of adversaries in planning for the future.

Second, the bill provides tax certainty and tax simplicity. Energy firms that meet limited criteria will know for certain if they can deduct from their Federal returns their prepaid taxes or energy impact contributions on line faster.

Third, the bill will not, over time, lose revenues from the Federal Treasury. For the most part, this legislation only accelerates Federal tax deduction; it does not create any new Federal tax subsidy. In fact, this bill will likely accelerate revenues for the Federal Government as it will help reduce delays in meeting socio-economic energy impacts associated with large-scale energy production. With these delays, reduced energy production can begin faster, as will Federal revenues.

Fourth, this bill will benefit all communities nationwide feeling the burdens associated with energy development. This is not a bill of special interest in Colorado and the Rocky Mountain West. Whether it is a new coal mine in Pennsylvania, or a major drilling operation in Texas, or a new synfuel plant in Kentucky, energy impacted communities will profit from this legislation.

It has been endorsed by the Colorado Municipal League, Colorado Counties, Inc., National League of Cities, Rocky Mountain Oil and Gas Association, and individual oil and gas firms.

Hearings were held on this legislation in Grand Junction, Colo., and Evanston, Wyo. All of the public witnesses enthusiastically endorsed this legislation.

Mr. President, I urge enactment of this legislation.

For the benefit of my colleagues, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this point in the RECORD letters that I have received endorsing this legislation be inserted, and that an explanation of the bill developed by the Joint Tax Committee be inserted as well.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLORADO MUNICIPAL LEAGUE,
Denver, Colo., March 26, 1982.

Hon. BILL ARMSTRONG,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR BILL: We want you to know of our continuing support for S. 1919 and our willingness to testify when hearings are scheduled. We certainly would encourage and appreciate regional hearings in the state. We commend you for the approach taken towards energy impact mitigation in this legislation. Prepayment deductions will give companies an important incentive to provide the "up-front" financing needed by local governments in dealing with energy development.

Our Energy Impact Committee, chaired by Rangely Mayor Peggy Rector, studies issues regarding energy development affecting cities and towns, and wishes to convey formally several points on S. 1919.

First, the Committee feels some type of state and local government consultation to the Treasury Department ought to be built into the bill. We have a statutory process in Colorado for the review and approval of state severance tax prepayments. Our city and town officials believe that it has worked reasonable well. The Committee feels that such consultation is important as a means of reviewing what impact mitigation plans and policies a company has developed. We believe that the Treasury Department should give consideration to such consultation in acting upon a prepayment request. As municipal officials, however, we are not asking for any type of veto over a prepayment request, merely consultation.

Secondly, the Committee feels that the $50 million threshold for eligible facilities may treat unfairly smaller companies which may be just as willing to prepay taxes as larger companies. Perhaps some revision is necessary here.

Finally, the Committee especially supports the feature in your legislation which allows a company to claim a deduction for the underwriting of any local government bonds or issues used to finance public services or facilities.

As always, we appreciate your consideration of our views and look forward to working with you on enactment of S. 1919.

Sincerely,

KENNETH G. BUECHE,
Executive Director.

COLORADO COUNTIES, INC.,
Denver, Colo., October 15, 1981.

Senator WILLIAM ARMSTRONG,
Senator GARY HART,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATORS ARMSTRONG AND HART: Colorado Counties, Inc. together with the counties in Northwest Colorado directly and indirectly affected by potential oil shale development appreciate your recent announcements to introduce bills that would encourage prepayment of oil shale royalties and taxes. Your proposals to provide tax incentives for such prepayments has the wholehearted endorsement of this organization.

The prepayment of both state severances taxes and property taxes was specifically authorized by the Colorado General Assembly this year. Your bills would encourage the utilization of this method to provide the upfront financing of local facilities and services impacted by such development. Prepayment of federal rentals and royalties would also be encouraged.

The legislature this year also increased the amount of federal mineral royalties for energy impact assistance and distributed the entire balance of the Oil Shale Trust fund in order to deal with energy impacts. We appreciate your efforts at the federal level to address this important issue.

We also believe that pending legislation to amend federal oil shale leasing procedures should also address the socioeconomic impact issue. We encourage your joint support of language to recognize Colorado statute 34-63-104 related to oil shale leasing funds (see attachment). Your assistance to have the federal laws be consistent with Colorado law would be appreciated.

Please let me or Jim Evans of my staff know if you have any questions on this issue.

Sincerely,

HARRY P. BOWES,
Executive Director.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN OIL
& GAS ASSOCIATION, INC.,
Denver, Colo., January 21, 1982.

Hon. WILLIAM L. ARMSTRONG,
Dirksen Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ARMSTRONG: This letter is to offer the support of the Rocky Mountain Oil and Gas Association Committee on Oil Shale for your recently introduced legislation, The Energy Community Self-Help Act of 1981.

Hopefully, with the support of industry and state, county and local governments, this legislation will be enacted in 1982 and provide a means to assist local governments with the financial impacts in energy impacted areas.

If we may be assistance in furthering S. 1919, do not hesitate to contact me or Jess Cooper at our RMOGA office in Washington, D.C.

Again, our thanks for your sponsorship of S. 1919.

Sincerely,

D. ROGER LOPER,
CHAIRMAN,
RMOGA Committee on Oil Shale.

WRITTEN STATEMENT OF PHILLIPS PETROLEUM CO.

Phillips Petroleum Company, an integrated energy and chemicals company headquartered in Bartlesville, Oklahoma, is pursuing oil and gas, oil shale, geothermal, tar sands and other energy and strategic minerals exploration and production activities in the United States and, in particular, areas of the Rocky Mountains and Trans-Mountain West including the states of Colorado, Wyoming, and Utah. Phillips recognizes and understands that large-scale energy development can impose a temporary burden upon communities and local governments during the early stages of such development due to rapid population growth and the resultant demand for public services.

Phillips Petroleum Company supports enactment of S. 1919, the "Energy Community Self-Help Act of 1981," introduced by Senators Armstrong and Wallop. S. 1919 provides a simple and direct method to enable orderly and harmonious energy development to go forward by allowing energy projects to prepay state or local taxes, to make community assistance contributions, and to deduct such payments in the year such payments are made.

The bill addresses one of the major problems faced in achieving the national goal of developing secure and reliable domestic energy sources. This problem is commonly called the socioeconomic impact of energy development, referring to the impact that additional population associated with large-scale energy projects has on essential community facilities and services in largely rural areas. Large-scale energy projects take years to start up. A crucial question facing local governments, where our projects are planned, is how communities will finance the facilities and services necessary to serve the increased population, especially during the construction phase of energy projects. We are directly concerned because our employees will someday work in these communities. A stable, productive workforce is esential to a viable project. We also are aware of the large responsibility local governments have in ensuring the availability of essential public facilities and services when are needed. Our strong desire is to work with the affected local governments to achieve this objective.

S. 1919 will assist affected local governments and us in fostering cooperative planning efforts for our projects. By authorizing current year federal deductions for prepayment of state and local taxes, S. 1919 would allow us to move revenues derived from our future state tax liability to the present when the revenues are needed to finance community expansion and new development.

Colorado and Utah have enacted excellent statutes which authorize prepayment of ad valorem and other taxes. However, under existing federal law, we are faced with the dilemma that prepayment of state taxes does not qualify for federal deduction until the year in which state tax is actually due. The Internal Revenue Service has announced in several Revenue Rulings such as Rev. Rul. 60-133 and Rev. Rul. 63-55 that an accrual basis taxpayer may not deduct more than twelve months' state tax payments in any tax year. This general principal has also been followed in numerous court cases such as U.S. v. Anderson, 269 U.S. 422 (1926) and Budd International Corp., 143 F2d (CCA 3rd, 1944).

For these reasons, federal law actually provides a significant disincentive for prepaying state taxes, even though Colorado and Utah state law auhtorizes such prepayments. S. 1919 would enable local communities to help themselves by providing an incentive for prepayment of taxes. While federal tax deductions would be accelerated, no new federal tax subsidy would be created.

The bill would also clarify an ambiguity in existing law as to the tax treatment of expenses incurred by project sponsors for community development assistance. Currently, the Internal Revenue Code does not contain a specific provision pertaining to community development contributions, although Section 167 addresses deductions made for charitable or civic purposes. The tax treatment of community assistance contributions intended to mitigate socioeconomic impacts varies depending on the circumstances surrounding the contribution and the nature of the contribution. In most cases there is substantial uncertainty, under current law, as to whether a contribution will qualify as a deduction. The prevailing Duberstein Doctrine (see Comm. v. Duberstein, 363 U.S. 278 (1960)) which requires that charitable gifts must be made with ". . . detached and disinterested generosity" disqualifies most community assistance payments because there is, frequently, at least an incidental benefit to the contributor. S. 1919 would remedy this problem by clearly stating that deductions will be allowed for qualified energy impact assistance contributions.

In summary, Phillips feels that S. 1919 treats two substantial stumbling blocks or disincentives to close cooperation between affected communities and energy project developers. We appreciate the opportunity to comment on the proposal and support its passage.

DESCRIPTION OF S. 1919 RELATING TO THE ENERGY COMMUNITY SELF-HELP ACT

INTRODUCTION

The Subcommittee on Energy and Agricultural Taxation of the Senate Finance Committee has scheduled field hearings on S. 1919 on April 16, 1982, in Grand Junction, Colorado, and on April 17, 1982, in Evanston, Wyoming. The bill (introduced by Senators Armstrong and Wallop) would permit taxpayers to deduct currently the prepayment of qualified energy impact assistance expenditures and to deduct energy impact assistance contributions.

This document, prepared in connection with the April 16 and 17 Subcommittee hearings, provides a summary of S. 1919, and a more detailed description of the bill, including present law, issues, and effective date.

I. SUMMARY

Present law

State and local taxes paid in connection with a taxpayer's trade or business are deductible in the year paid or incurred in computing Federal income taxes. Taxpayers who voluntarily prepay deductible State or local taxes before the year to which such taxes relate may not deduct them before the year in which they accrue.

Taxpayers are allowed deductions for contributions made to or for the use of a State, a possession of the United States, or any political subdivision of a State, or the United States or the District of Columbia, but only if the contribution or gift is made for exclusively public purposes. Contributions to a governmental entity which inure to the benefit of the donor are not considered to be made for exclusively public purposes and do not qualify as deductible charitable contributions.

The bill would allow taxpayers to elect to deduct prepayments of State and local taxes in the year of the prepayment, if the proceeds of such tax prepayments are to be used by the State or local government to meet needs incidental to population growth arising out of the operation of major energy and resource development activities.

The bill also would allow taxpayers to deduct energy impact assistance contributions of cash or property to a State or local government to be used to provide certain public facilities and services as a result of population growth arising out of the operation of major energy and resource development activities.

II. DESCRIPTION OF THE BILL

Energy Community Self-Help Act

A. Present Law

Under present law, taxpayers may deduct from their Federal income tax certain State and local taxes paid or incurred in the taxpayer's trade or business. Under general annual tax accounting rules, allowable deductions may be taken by cash basis taxpayers in the year in which payment of the deductible amount is made. Under the accrual method of accounting, an expense is deductible for the taxable year in which all the events which determine the fact of the liability have occurred, and the amount of the deduction can be determined with reasonable accuracy. Deductible State and local taxes may be deducted by cash basis taxpayers in the year payment is made, and by accural basis taxpayers only in the year in which the tax liability accrues.

Taxes are properly deductible as they accrue. Even though some State and local jurisdictions have authorized the prepayment of State and local taxes, taxpayers who voluntarily prepay these taxes before the year for which such taxes are allocable may not take a deduction in the prior year for Federal income tax purposes.

Furthermore, if a taxing jurisdiction changes the time for imposing a deductible tax so that the tax would be deductible in an earlier period under the accrual method, an accrual basis taxpayer may not deduct the tax in the earlier period. Instead, the taxpayer may deduct the tax in the period that the tax otherwise would have been deductible as if the taxing jurisdiction had not changed the time for imposing the tax.

Under present law, taxpayers may deduct contributions made to or for the use of a State, a possession of the United States, any political subdivision of a State, the United States, or the District of Columbia, but only if the contribution or gift is made for exclusively public purposes. Contributions to a governmental entity which inure to the benefit of the donor are not considered to be made with the requisite detached and disinterested generosity necessary to qualify as a deductible charitable contribution.

B. Issues

(1) Should taxpayers be allowed to deduct prepayments of State and local taxes in the year paid, rather than in the year to which such taxes relate, if the prepaid amounts are used by the State or local government to meet needs incidental to population growth in the area arising out of the operation by the taxpayer of major energy and resource development activities.

(2) Should taxpayers be allowed to deduct energy impact assistance contributions to a State or local government to be used for certain public facilities and services, even though such taxpayer receives direct and indirect benefits from such contributions.

C. Explanation of the bill

S. 1919 would add two new sections to the Internal Revenue Code which would allow taxpayers to currently deduct, in computing their Federal income taxes, prepayments of certain State and local taxes, and would also allow a deduction for certain energy impact assistance contributions.

Prepaid Energy Impact Assistance Expenses.—Under the bill, taxpayers would be allowed to elect to deduct prepayments of certain State or local taxes in the year payment is made, if such payment constitutes a "qualified energy impact assistance expenditure." Prepayments of such State or local taxes would normally only be deductible in the later taxable years to which these taxes were properly allocable.

A "qualified energy impact assistance expenditure" would be any expenditure or contribution which (1) represents a State or local tax, fee, rent or royalty, (2) is required or permitted under State or local law to be prepaid in a year prior to the taxable year to which it is allocable, and (3) is to be used by the State or local government to meet needs incidental to population growth arising out of the operation of major energy and resource development activities.

To qualify as an energy impact assistance expenditure, prepayments of State or local taxes must be made in connection with the operation of major energy and resource development activities.

These activities are defined in the bill as the development, operation, and construction of certain types of facilities the capital cost of which exceeds $50,000,000, or the gross income from which will exceed $50,000,000 over the life of the facility. The bill does not explicitly restrict the availability of these deductions for prepaid taxes to the taxpayers who are developing, operating, or constructing these facilities.

The operation of major energy and resource development activities means the development, operation, and construction of (1) any facility used primarily for exploring, producing, extracting, processing, converting, or refining of materials including, but not limited to, a mine, powerplant, mill, retort, or related facility, (2) any facility operated in connection with a synthetic fuel project, or (3) an electric generation facility designed to consume coal located in the immediate area of such facility.

Energy Impact Assistance Contributions.—Under the bill, taxpayers would be allowed a deduction for contributions of payments of cash or property to a State or local government to be used to provide certain public facilities and services as a result of population growth arising out of the operation of major energy resource development activities, as defined above.

A deduction would be allowed for any amount or property paid or contributed to a State or local government to be used to provide qualified public facilities and services, or for any amount or property paid, contributed, or incurred directly for qualified public facilities and services provided to the State or local government, with respect to which a deduction or credit is not otherwise allowable under Federal income tax laws.

Qualified public facilities and services include, but are not limited to, facilities and services provided in connection with roads, schools and education, parks and recreation, housing, governmental administration, fire and police protection, water supply, waste water collection and treatment (including drainage), and hospital and health care.

Under the bill, an amount paid for qualified public facilities or services would include 1) any loss recognized by the taxpayer on State or local government obligations which the taxpayer had purchased if the proceeds of the obligations are to be used to provide qualified public facilities or services, or 2) any amount the taxpayer pays as a guarantor of State or local government obligations used to provide qualified public facilities or services.

D. Effective Date

The provision of the bill would apply to taxable years beginning after June 30, 1980.●

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I join my good friend and colleague from Colorado, Senator ARMSTRONG, in introducing the Energy Community Self-Help Act of 1983. This legislation, which is essentially identical to legislation we introduced during the 97th Congress, is designed to give communities an additional tool in dealing with the problems they face when expansive energy development brings on population growth which could neither be expected nor anticipated.

With a glut of oil on the world market, and a recession within our borders that dampened domestic energy consumption, the United States has found itself in the unusual position of having more energy resources available than it can use. Falling prices and growing reserves have also served to take some of the lustre from Wyoming's glowing energy economy. Over the course of just a very few months, the percentage of unemployed in my home State of Wyoming more than doubled. Active drilling rigs in Wyoming fell from over 200 to 35 percent that amount. Instead of dealing with the problem of finding places for the employed to live, we are working hard to bring an economy back to life and bringing jobs back to the unemployed. But, as this Nation's economy comes back to life, the need for the energy resources of Wyoming will continue to grow. The energy resources are there: the coal; the oil; the natural gas; and the uranium all will be called upon to continue to satisfy this Nation's thrist for energy.

As the need for energy grows, the manpower necessary to extract the resources, process it, and transport it grows as well. In sparsely populated areas of the country, the influx of men, women, and children answering the call of employment put incredible pressure on the existing services and facilities of a typical rural community. And, what is the promise of a new future for some, can turn into what seems to be an endless nightmare for others.

The principal problem faced by Wyoming communities, and other communities which face the same kind of population boom caused by energy development is that of up-front money; the up-front money that is necessary to provide water and a place to store it, additional sewer lines and treatment facilities, streets and streetlights, fire and police protection, and schools and hospitals. It is a problem which is exaggerated when growth demands the need for those facilities and services long before the tax base exists to support them. Eventually the additional community development which must take place to service the growth will pay for itself, but city mayors and town councils find that of little consolation when they must suffer a hostile environment in the short run.

Mr. President, with budget deficits which test the $200 billion threshold, it is evident to all that the amount of Federal dollars which will be spent to mitigate the impacts of these severe influxes of workers and their families will be, at best, extremely limited. But whether it be Kemmerer, Wyo., or Parachute, Colo., or any of a number of other communities across the country, the need for assistance persists. The passage of this legislation can certainly provide those communities with another tool to assist them in meeting the needs of their growing numbers. There is no new Federal bureaucracy created, and minimal revenue loss to the Treasury. It simply recognizes the resources which are already at the communities fingertips, but which it cannot quite reach without the help of this bill.

The first aspect of this legislation recognizes that fact, that at some point, when the tax base has developed, most communities will have the resources to support their new growth. The problem is getting to that base when the money is of the utmost importance—up front. Some States, including Colorado and Utah, have legislation which authorizes companies to prepay estimated taxes and fees so that energy impacted communities will have the benefit of that future tax base at a time when the revenue is sorely needed. In my home State of Wyoming, the Wyoming Legislature continues to struggle with the constitutional problem which prevents such tax prepayments. However, this legislation at least removes the obstacle presented by the Federal Tax Code, by providing that any such prepayment of taxes will be currently deductible instead of deductible only when the taxes are actually accrued and payable.

In addition, this legislation encourages the companies working with the impacted community to use some of their own resources to help mitigate its own impact on the community. In Wyoming, the Overthrust Industrial Association has taken great strides in helping communities fund and plan for the impacts of population growth. For many companies, there is a very strong recognition of the fact that a more pleasant living environment reduces manpower turnovers and maintains productivity. It is very much in their own self-interest to assist communities however they can. But, the Tax Code does not make their job any easier. Under existing law an energy company can never be quite sure whether an expenditure or contribution to or on behalf of a community will be deductible or required to be capitalized and amortized over the life of the project. Whether it be a cost of doing business, a condition of doing business, or pure benevolent behavior, we should not discourage companies from making expenditures which benefit the entire community. For that reason, this legislation makes it clear that payments or contributions of money or property to be used for qualified public purposes shall be fully deductible for tax purposes.

Mr. President, last year Senator ARMSTRONG and I traveled to Colorado and Wyoming to listen to the people who have had to deal with these problems on a day-to-day basis. They are good people who want to do nothing more than provide adequate living conditions for their residents. They face some of the same problems and some very unique problems. But, in the final analysis they are problems they can deal with if we give them the tools to do it. They view, and Senator ARMSTRONG and I view, this legislation as one tool that will make those problems that much easier to handle.●

By Mr. ARMSTRONG:

S. 1898. A bill relating to deposit relief for small business; to the Committee on Finance.

DEPOSIT RELIEF FOR SMALL BUSINESS

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, the strength of American economic recovery is rooted in the ability of American businesses to tend to their business efficiently and effectively.

Today, I am introducing legislation that will help small businesses to do just that. This bill would free up employers from needless paperwork and provide more working capital for businesses with usually less than 20 employees. This proposal would enable employers with less than $5,000 in monthly withholding to deposit only once a month rather than as frequently as 8 or 10 times a month as is currently the practice. According to current IRS provisions, only businesses with less than $3,000 in monthly withholding deposit monthly. This legislation then would simply raise the threshold for those who file monthly by $2,000. For withholding of less than $500 and over $5,000, current regulations governing deposits would apply.

Deposit rate relief is vital to small businesses which rely on limited capital to maintain their productivity. The frequency of payments they must make to the IRS severely ties up their cash flow, starving them of the capital which keeps their businesses in operation. In light of the many tax increases which were imposed in the recent social security bill, many employers simply must have that working capital in order to continue providing their services. In a survey just completed, small businessmen and women ranked cash flow as one of the most serious problems facing small businesses.

Not only does this legislation free up capital for businesses' use, but it also frees businesses from needless paperwork and from the threat of falling behind on their payments thus incurring penalties and further loss of capital. The burden of complying with current deposit requirements is simply a weight which these struggling businesses simply should not be required to bear.

Deposit rate relief is one of the highest legislative priorities of many small business groups and small business men and women. This bill is endorsed by the National Federation of Independent Business and other groups. Let me quote from a few comments I have received about current high payroll taxes, and the burden of complying with current deposit requirements.

A Ganado, Tex. small business owner writes, social security and withholding deposit penalties are too high.

With the cash flow as slow as it is in small business, it really presents a problem to make the social security deposits on time and then to have to pay the penalties on top really creates a financial burden on small business.

A Huntington Beach, Calif., owner of a plumbing company writes:

In the years that I have been in business, I have almost without exception received each and every quarter a notice from the IRS that a penalty is due on my account . . . each and every time I have to rework the figures to prove the IRS incorrect. The problem I find, in talking to business people like myself is that they have little or no office staff and wind up paying the penalties due to a lack of time to check them out.

A Breakville, Ohio, businessman wrote simply:

If social security taxes are raised in the future, we may be forced out of business. It is already a heavy drain on our cash flow per month and it is very common for us to fall behind in our payments and end up paying ridiculous penalty and interest for doing so. It simply cannot be helped as all of our work is done in credit and we must rely on the faith of our customers to pay us on time so that we may meet our obligations.

Furthermore, codification prevents the IRS from issuing rules which would further accelerate deposits to meet government needs. In 1980, the IRS increased the frequency of deposit by business from four times a month up to eight times a month for large business. This increase was enacted without a single act of Congress.

Finally, revenue estimates for a 10-year period beginning at the date of this proposal's enactment reveal only marginal losses in social security and general revenue.

Mr. President, this bill merits quick hearings and early enactment for the sake of small businesses and for the sake of American economic recovery. Let me point out that this is not a controversial bill. An identical amendment earlier passed the Senate by a vote of 96 to 0 during the social security debates.●

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 1899. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to permit certain scientific or educational organizations to issue tax-exempt bonds to finance scientific or educational facilities or equipment; to the Committee on Finance.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH ACT OF 1983

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am introducing the Scientific Research Act of 1983, which will simplify section 103 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, so that universities and colleges may be able to use debt-financing as a means of improving their scientific and technological research capacity.

It has been estimated that, at the present time, research facilities and equipment which are critical to basic research in U.S. institutions of higher education lag 10 years behind the instrumentation in European and Japanese universities. Foreign institutions have been able to improve and expand their research equipment at a pace more consistent with the advancements in scientific measuring and computing technologies than U.S. institutions.

Today, universities and colleges have only limited funds in university budgets, endowments, and Government grants, and contracts to acquire new equipment. But, because of the irregularity and unreliability of these funds, there has been little, if any, improvement. Thus, several universities have turned to debt-financing as a means of upgrading their research abilities.

Debt-financing is the use of debt instruments, such as a bond or a note, to acquire equipment for immediate use. This form of financing offers several advantages. First, since scientific progress does not stop and wait for a Government equipment grant, which may or may not arrive, debt-financing is a method of financial planning and management that allows the university to use the equipment and facilities immediately and to strike while the iron is hot. Debt-financing would provide instrumentation at a relatively low cost, because tax-exempt interest rates are generally lower than the inflation rate, so that even while including interest costs, the equipment is being acquired at a lesser cost.

Although debt-financing has proven advantageous to some institutions, it also has complications that have deterred others from using this method of financing the purchase of equipment. For instance, instruments of debt-financing, such as revenue and municipal bonds and revolving lines of credit, are so involved and difficult to implement as to require the assistance and counsel of investment bankers and legal tax experts. This bill seeks to simplify these complications and impediments and this means of procuring expensive, though badly needed, scientific instrumentation.

This bill will make debt-financing more feasible for America's universities. This would be achieved by simplifying section 103 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 such that interest on the obligations of colleges, universities, and not-for-profit scientific organizations for the acquisition of equipment and facilities for scientific or educational purposes will be tax-exempt. If our educational institutions can acquire state-of-the-art instrumentation, our Nation will benefit through their ability to conduct state-of-the-art research. Tax-exempt interest on debt-financing for scientific equipment will provide an important catalyst for the investment in university research.

Colleges and universities need the financial options that can aid them in increasing their research capabilities as well as in educating men and women in science and engineering who should be capable of handling modern research equipment. The potential positive impact of the financial method encouraged by this bill is significant and I hope my colleagues will support this legislation.●

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S. 1900. A bill to require the executive branch to enforce applicable equal employment opportunity laws and directives so as to promote pay equity and eliminate wage-setting practices which discriminate on the basis of sex, race, or ethnicity and result in discriminatory wage differentials; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

PAY EQUITY ACT OF 1983

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am today introducing S. 1900, the proposed "Pay Equity Act of 1983." This legislation is aimed at helping bring an end to what is one of the most devastating economic problems facing millions of American women and their families and one of the most pervasive forms of employment discrimination in our society—the refusal of many employers in both the public and private sectors to pay female employees fair and equitable wages for the work they perform.

Mr. President, this type of discrimination against female employees has persisted despite the existence of applicable State and Federal laws and directives and court decisions outlawing gender-based wage discrimination. Unfortunately, the existence of these laws and court decisions has not been translated into elimination of these unlawful practices. What is clearly needed is a strong national commitment to ending once and for all the practice of paying certain employees lower wages because those employees are female.

The legislation I am introducing today is aimed at compelling those Federal agencies responsible for enforcement of our Federal equal employment opportunity laws to begin an aggressive campaign to enforce these laws and help bring about an end to wage discrimination.

THE PROBLEM: THE WAGE GAP

Mr. President, I am sure that every Member of this body is acutely aware of the enormous gap between the average earnings of female workers and the average earnings of male workers. Today, full-time female workers earn 59 cents for every dollar earned by similarly situated male workers. Indeed, in recent years the earnings gap between men and women has not declined, but, in fact, has widened. In the 1950's, full-time female workers earned 64 cents on the average for every dollar earned by a full-time male worker. The gap is even wider today for minority women; the ratio is 54 percent for black women and 49 percent for Hispanic women.

The disparity between the average wages earned by female workers and those earned by male workers exists today in every profession, occupation, or field of employment and at every level of experience. It persists in male-dominated fields. It persists in female-dominated fields. It persists in the new occupational fields that have not yet become sexually stereotyped.

For example, female engineers earn only 86 percent of the salary of male engineers; female college professors and lawyers receive only 71 percent of what their male counterparts earn. Although 60 percent of the retail sales clerks are female, they earn only 67 percent of what male clerks earn. Average starting salaries for female Harvard MBA's are reported to be $2,000 less than those paid to male MBA's. Entry level male college lecturers average $13,577; females, $11,870. Sex bias in wages has even appeared in the computer field. In 1981, the median weekly pay for female computer operators was $355; for males, $488.

Mr. President, the overall wage gap has been closely and repeatedly studied by researchers. Variables such as attachment to the work force, level of experience, education, job commitment, and similar factors have been examined in various studies. These studies attempting to explain the difference in earnings between male and female workers have been able to account for generally less than one-fourth and never more than one-half of the earnings differential on the basis of different labor force participation patterns of male and female workers. Virtually every researcher has concluded that there remains a large gap which can be explained only by the existence of discriminatory employment policies.

PAY EQUITY: EQUAL PAY AND COMPARABLE PAY

Mr. President, two distinct forms of wage discrimination contribute to the earnings gap. The first involves the problem of equal pay for equal work. The second involves the problem of comparable pay for work of comparable worth.

The first—equal pay for equal work—is relatively simple to understand and has clearly been unlawful since the passage of the Equal Pay Act in 1963. That law provides that it is unlawful for an employer to discriminate between employees on the basis of sex by paying lower wages than those paid to employees of the other sex for equal work. Prior to the enactment of the Equal Pay Act, many employers openly paid female workers lower wages for performing the same work as male workers.

Unfortunately, this parctice continues today, albeit in more subtle forms. Employers no longer argue—as they did prior to 1963—in favor of lower pay for female workers on the grounds that women need less than male workers. Instead, they develop creative rationalizations for paying women less than men for substantially identical work. The Federal Equal Pay Act actually encourages this creativity since it provides four defenses which an employer may raise when a violation of the act has been alleged. The fourth defense—that the discrimination was based upon a factor other than sex—invites employers to develop arguments that the apparent discrimination is actually based upon a factor other than sex. For example, employers have argued that the willingness of female workers to work for lower wages constitutes a factor other than sex which would justify setting their wages below those of male workers who would refuse to work at the lower wages. Fortunately, for the most part, the courts have rejected these thinly disguised discriminatory practices.

It is clear, however, that although it has been 20 years since passage of the Equal Pay Act, equal pay for equal work has not yet been fully achieved. Indeed, even more vigorous enforcement activities are needed today to deal with the more subtle and devious tactics used to justify continuing violations of the act.

But, Mr. President, it is generally agreed that denial of equal pay for equal work is no longer the major factor contributing to the earnings gap. The major factor today is the concentration of female workers in a limited number of job classifications where the wages are lower than the education, training, skills, experience, effort, responsibility, or working conditions required would otherwise warrant. The primary reason the wages are lower in these jobs is because they are filled predominantly by women. This problem, often referred to as the comparable worth issue, must be dealt with forcefully if we are ever to achieve equitable pay for all workers.

COMPARABLE PAY FOR WORK OF COMPARABLE WORTH

Mr. President, the concept of comparable pay for work of comparable worth stands for the relatively simple notion that the wages a worker earns should be based upon the value of the work performed, not the sex of the employee. Unfortunately, it is widely recognized that the wages paid in jobs and occupational fields dominated by female workers are lower than the wages paid in those jobs and occupational fields dominated by male workers that require comparable education, skills, training, education, effort, responsibilities, and working conditions.

In the now classic case of Lemons v. City and County of Denver, 620 F2d 228 (CA 10), the nurses in the city of Denver public hospitals are paid less than the men who trim the trees in the city parks, not because of any greater intrinsic value of the work done by the tree trimmers or greater difficulty in finding individuals to trim trees, but simply because tree trimmers are predominately male and the nurses are predominately female.

There are many other examples of this type of inequity. In Montgomery County, Md., clerks in the county-operated liquor stores were reported to earn more in 1979 than teachers in the county schools. Secretaries at the University of Washington in Seattle with 2 years' experience were paid between $847 and $1,085 while university truck drivers received a starting salary of $1,168 to $1,289. In New York and Wisconsin, the salaries for State parking lot attendants are considerably higher than the wages paid to State clerical employees. A study in San Jose, Calif., found the salaries of librarians below those paid to street sweeper operators.

In each of these examples, one difference emerged: the higher wages were paid where employees were predominately male and lower wages were paid where employees were predominately female. In many cases, the employer's own numerical job-evaluation system gave the male-dominated jobs and the female-dominated jobs similar ratings; the wages for the female jobs were nonetheless set lower than the male-dominated jobs.

OPPONENTS OF COMPARABLE WORTH

Mr. President, those who oppose elimination of wage disparities based upon the devaluation of work that is performed predominately be female workers make three basic arguments in opposition to these efforts. First, they argue that it is impossible to compare different jobs and establish their relative worth. Second, they contend it is not discrimination, but the invisible and neutral hand of the marketplace at work in creating these wage disparities. Third, and finally, they argue that even if it is discrimination, the cost of eliminating the inequities would be too great. Each of these arguments has an inherent weakness.

First, with respect to the so-called apples-and-oranges argument—that you cannot compare different types of jobs—the fact is that different jobs are compared all the time by employers in establishing wage rates. Objective job-evaluation techniques have existed for many years, and they are widely used by employers in both the public and private sectors. The National Academy of Sciences' Committee on Occupational Classification and Analysis in its important study, "Women, Work, and Wages: Equal Pay for Jobs of Equal Value," commissioned by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, noted the widespread use of such job evaluation plans. As I will discuss in a few moments, these job-evaluation techniques provide an objective method of determining the value of different jobs and a promising approach to eliminating discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials.

Second, the short answer to the argument that it is the marketplace, not discrimination, that determines wage rates, is that the so-called free marketplace has been radically altered by the presence of discrimination. Historical wage discrimination against female workers, once not only prevalent but acceptable, continues to distort the marketplace to depress the wages of women and to devalue the work performed by women. Only in the past 20 years has it become unacceptable—legally and otherwise—to pay women less than men for precisely the same work or to exclude women from certain jobs or occupations. The effects of this de jure discrimination against female workers were built into most wage structures, and these effects continue to be felt.

Moreover, our Nation has already made the decision as a matter of social policy that workers will not be left to whatever fate the free market resolves for them. Protective labor laws do not permit employers to pay workers less than the minimum wage, even though some desperate workers might work for less, nor do they allow employers to set wages lower for minority workers, even though high unemployment rates among many minority groups might drive some of these workers to accept lower wages.

In short, a civilized and humane society does not countenance the exploitation of its workers. Women, like other classes of vulnerable workers, are entitled to the protection of the law against unfair exploitation.

Finally, the arguments that eliminating the wage difference would destroy the economy and cost billions and billions of dollars are vastly exaggerated. First, many of these estimates are based upon elimination of the entire wage gap. The studies I mentioned earlier have found that a certain portion of the gap—between one-fourth and one-half—is probably attributable to nondiscriminatory factors, including differences in female-worker labor-force participation patterns. Second, as to that portion of the wage gap that is attributable to discriminatory practices, it is not anticipated that the resulting inequities could be eliminated over night. Even with the most vigorous commitment to eliminating wage inequities, the task is likely to be a long and tedious one. Indeed, in the 20 years since passage of the Equal Pay Act, those inequities have not been eliminated. Attainment of full pay equity is likely to be gradual and incremental.

Finally, whenever the issue of costs is discussed, it is important to remember that the costs of pay inequities are already being borne by the underpaid workers. The price is being paid by the increasing feminization of poverty and the cost of government assistance to those underpaid workers and their families who cannot survive on the meager wages produced by discriminatory employment practices. Society is also paying in terms of the loss of productivity and reduced consumer spending when workers are denied fair wages.

IMPORTANCE OF RESOLVING THE COMPARABLE WORTH PROBLEM

Mr. President, there are some who may argue that rather than attempting to resolve the difficult issues surrounding the comparable worth problem, we should be focusing our attentions on eliminating the earnings gap by encouraging young women to enter nontraditional, male-dominated fields where the wages are likely to be higher and the advancement opportunities more open.

I believe we must do both.

I have been among the foremost advocates of opening up every occupational or professional field to women. The barriers which have blocked women seeking to enter male-dominated fields must be eliminated. Our educational systems must be encouraged to do a better job in preparing young women for the world of work and educating them about the jobs that will be emerging out of the new technologies. Their horizons should not be limited in any fashion by sexist stereotypes about what is or is not an appropriate field of employment for women or by false perceptions about the work force.

But at the same time that we are seeking to break down those barriers which have kept many women in job ghettoes where the wages are low and the oppotunities for advancement limited, it is important to recognize that the work performed in many of these female-dominated fields is important both to our economy and to our society. If we force our creative and talented teachers to leave our schools in order to get adequate compensation, or our Nation's nurses to all become doctors in order to gain the recognition and compensation they deserve, what would happen to the quality of our schools or our hospitals? We need good teachers as well as good nurses, regardless of their sex.

Moreover, Mr. President, whatever opportunities may exist for young women just entering or about to enter the work force, those women who have already acquired years of education, training, and experience in fields like teaching or nursing should not be required to abandon those career investments in order to earn a decent wage.

Finally, unless we resolve once and for all the ambivalence about the value of female workers that underlies the comparable worth problem, the inequities are not likely to end. Indeed, as more and more women enter a new field, the wages there are likely to become depressed. History has already demonstrated this to be true. For example, bank tellers were once universally male. The job then represented a relatively well-trained position on the career ladder to higher management in the banking field. Today, bank tellers are predominantly female and the wages and advancement opportunities have been curtailed accordingly. The value of a job should not decrease just because more women fill the positions.

GUNTHER V. COUNTY OF WASHINGTON

Mr. President, until 1981, there was some disagreement as to the interrelationship of the Equal Pay Act, with its scope limited to matters relating to equal pay for equal work, and the broader coverage of title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 with respect to discrimination on the basis of sex in all aspects of employment, including compensation. Some argued that the Bennett amendment to title VII limited its coverage to only those instances of wage discrimination which would be covered by the Equal Pay Act. Others, noting the broad purposes of Congress in enacting title VII, argued that an employer violated title VII when the wages of female workers were set below those paid to male workers even though the jobs were not identical.

The issue was definitively resolved in the landmark decision of the Supreme Court in Gunther v. County of Washington, 452 U.S. 161 (1981). In Gunther, the Supreme Court held that it would be a violation of title VII for an employer to set the wages of female workers below the value determined by the employer's own objective job evaluation while setting the wages of male workers at the full value. The Court correctly concluded that Congress intended title VII to prohibit all practices in whatever form which create inequality in employment opportunity due to discrimination on the basis of race, religion, sex, or national origin and to strike at the entire spectrum of disparate treatment of men and women resulting from sex stereotypes.

Mr. President, wage discrimination is now clearly unlawful under title VII. That conclusion was reiterated earlier this month in a Federal district court case, Washington Federation of State Employees against State of Washington, involving the wage-setting practices of the State of Washington. The district court held the State of Washington in violation of title VII for setting the wages in job categories dominated by women below the levels paid in other categories requiring comparable skills and background.

Private litigants throughout the country are bringing similar cases before the courts. A number of States and local governmental entities have recently passed laws or enacted ordinances to eliminate wage inequities or mandate job evaluations to determine the relative worth of job classifications. My own State of California has been in the forefront, enacting in 1981 a new law requiring comparable worth issues to be considered in wage negotiations with State employees and requiring annual reports on the progress that is being made in eliminating wage inequities. A number of California cities and counties have taken similar actions. Connecticut has enacted a law requiring a statewide review of job classifications for comparable worth purposes, and Minnesota has adopted legislation requiring the State employment relations commissioner to prepare, applying comparable worth concepts, a listing of State jobs affected by pay inequities and to earmark funds for needed adjustments. In testimony presented last year at hearings of three subcommittees of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service on pay equity, it was reported that some 25 States and local governments including Michigan, Washington, Illinois, Maine, and Wisconsin had funded job-evaluation studies to identify the extent of wage depression in female-dominated jobs. The Hawaii Legislature has passed comparable worth resolutions, requesting that all employers, both public and private, adopt a concept of equal pay for work of comparable value. Comparable worth has also become a major issue in collective bargaining activities.

FEDERAL ENFORCEMENT ACTIVITIES

However, despite the considerable activity taking place in the States and in the courts, Federal efforts in this area are at a virtual standstill. Prior to the Reagan administration, the two agencies with primary responsibility for enforcement of Federal equal employment opportunity laws and directives—the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission—EEOC—and the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs—OFCCP—in the Department of Labor—had begun activities in the comparable worth area. EEOC filed an amicus curiae brief on the side of the plaintiffs in the Gunther case and commissioned the study I mentioned earlier by the National Academy of Sciences into the area. In August 1981, shortly after the Gunther decision, EEOC, then under the acting chairmanship of J. Clay Smith, issued interim guidelines to its field offices to assist in identifying and processing cases in light of the Gunther decision. Similarly, OFCCP included in regulations published in December 1980 language clarifying that the prohibition against employment discrimination by Federal contractors encompassed wage differentials based upon comparable worth principles.

However, the Reagan administration immediately suspended those regulations, and, under the Reagan-appointed EEOC, work on comparable worth cases appears to have ceased, effectively sabotaging the guidelines issued after Gunther. At the House hearing last year, the new chairman of the EEOC, Clarence Thomas, defended his agency's inaction by saying that the Commission was "in the legal arena, without specific guidance" and he was "unsure" whether the agency had authority to process certain of these cases.

Mr. President, EEOC is specifically charged with the responsibility of providing leadership in matters relating to equal employment opportunity. If the agency is not able to exert that leadership, then Congress must provide a push that is needed. The legislation I am introducing today is aimed at providing EEOC and OFCCP with the specific guidance which seems to be necessary in order to get these agencies to enforce fully and agressively the Federal laws and directives relating to unlawful employment practices. The Federal Government ought to be playing a major and active role in helping to eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices.

JOB-EVALUATION TECHNIQUES

Mr. President, before I describe the specific provisions of the legislation I am introducing today, I want to take a few moments to discuss a specific issue related to the elimination of unlawful wage discrimination—utilization of objective job-evaluation techniques.

As I indicated earlier, objective job-evaluation techniques have been utilized for many years by employers in both the public and private sectors as a basis for job classifications and wage rates. Job-evaluation techniques provide, through numerical rating systems, standards and measures of job worth that are used to estimate the relative worth of jobs. It has been reported that almost two-thirds of the adult working population are already paid on the basis of a job evaluation scheme, and that virtually every large employer, including Federal and State governments, uses some objective job-evaluation system to determine the relative worth or grade level of each job classification.

In a job-evaluation plan, pay ranges for a job are based on estimates of the worth of the jobs according to such criteria as the skill, effort, and responsibility required by the job and the working conditions under which it is performed. Pay for an individual, within the pay range, is set by the worker's individual characteristics, such as credentials, seniority, productivity, and quality of job performance. Job-evaluation systems vary from employer to employer, both in terms of the criteria used and the relative weights. However, the concept of numerical rating and comparative measurement of different jobs is common to all job-evaluation systems.

The National Academy of Sciences observed in Women, Work and Wages: Equal Pay for Jobs of Equal Value that—

> Job evaluation plans provide measures of job worth that, under certain circumstances, may be used to discover and reduce wage discrimination for persons covered by a given plan. Job evaluation plans provide a way of systematically rewarding jobs for their content—for the skill, effort, and responsibility they entail and the conditions under which they are performed. By making the criteria of compensation explicit and by applying the criteria consistently, it is probable that pay differentials resulting from traditional stereotypes regarding the value of women's work or work customarily done by minorities will be reduced.

Mr. President, the National Academy of Sciences study went on to state that existing job-evaluation techniques were by no means perfect. Many incorporated into them factors associated with sex, race, or ethnicity, and many utilized actual wages to figure into the computations, thereby perpetuating existing inequities. Other problems in applying these plans universally were also raised. The Academy concluded, nevertheless, that statistical techniques exist that may be able to generate job worth scores from which components of wages associated with sex, race, or ethnicity have been at least partly removed. The Academy urged that these techniques be further developed.

It is also important to note that in many cases, where the employer has utilized a job-evaluation plan to establish the comparative worth of different jobs, the employer has simply chosen not to apply the results of its own evaluation to the wages of the female workers. For example, in the Gunther case the employer arbitrarily paid the female workers 20 percent less than the employer's own job evaluation had determined was the comparative worth of the jobs. The law is clear that employers must abide by the results of their own reasonable job-evaluation systems. What is needed is for the law to be enforced.

Finally, Mr. President, it should be noted that the failure of an employer to utilize a job-evaluation system to set wages can give rise to an inference of intentional discrimination. In one case brought under the Equal Pay Act, Taylor v. Charley Brothers, a Pennsylvania district court found that an employer's intent to discriminate against female employees could be inferred from the fact, among other things, that it had not undertaken any evaluation that would have indicated the value of jobs held by either men or women. Employers seeking to avoid the impact of the Gunther decision by refusing to do their own objective job evaluations certainly run the risk of thereby providing evidence of intentional discrimination.

OUTLINE OF LEGISLATION

Mr. President, as I indicated at the outset, the legislation I am introducing today is aimed at compelling those Federal agencies responsible for enforcement of Federal equal employment opportunity laws to begin an aggressive campaign to enforce those laws and help bring about an end to wage discrimination against female workers. Certainly this could be accomplished by the executive branch without a congressional mandate. The President could through issuance of an Executive order achieve the same ends. The law already prohibits wage discrimination. But the law is not self-executing.

Unfortunately, under the current administration it is highly unlikely that such actions will voluntarily take place. Nevertheless, Congress has the power and the authority to direct these agencies to take appropriate action. Enactment of this legislation would provide the congressional mandate that is evidently necessary to bring about Federal action in this area. I do not believe that it is fair or appropriate to rely solely upon private litigants to enforce the law. The Federal Government has a role and responsibility to fulfill. It is time it did so.

SUMMARY OF PROVISIONS: "PAY EQUITY ACT OF 1983"

Mr. President, I would like to outline the provisions of the bill:

Section 1 would establish the short title of the bill as the "Pay Equity Act of 1983".

Section 2 would set forth the findings and purposes of the act. The findings pertain to the existence of the earnings gap between male and female workers, its causes and impact upon individuals and our economy, and the failure of appropriate Federal agencies to enforce applicable laws and directives. The expressed purpose of the act is to help eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices and resulting discriminatory wage differentials by: first, providing for the development and utilization of equitable job-evaluation techniques to promote the establishment of wage rates based upon the work performed rather than the sex of the employee and thereby insure that all employees, irrespective of sex, or race, or ethnicity, will receive comparable pay for work of comparable worth; second, directing the Federal agencies charged with the responsibility for enforcement of Federal equal employment opportunity laws to help eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices and discriminatory wage differentials; third, encouraging public and private employers to use equitable job-evaluation techniques in order to eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices and discriminatory wage differentials; and fourth, bringing the Federal Government's wage-setting practices into compliance with the purpose of the proposed act and the provision of the 1978 Civil Service Reform Act which provides that equal pay should be provided for work of equal value performed by Federal employees.

Section 3 would set forth definitions of the various terms utilized in the act.

Section 4 would set forth specific actions to be taken by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission—EEOC. First, the Commission would be directed to issue guidelines for the identification and elimination of discriminatory wage-setting practices and discriminatory wage differentials.

Mr. President, the EEOC is charged by Executive order with the responsibility for providing leadership within the Federal Government on matters relating to equal employment laws. Its nonaction on the important and urgent issue of pay equity is inexcusable. Employers are entitled to some guidance from the Commission to enable them to identify and eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices. In the past, the Commission has made many important contributions to the development of equal employment opportunity law; for example, its early guidelines on employment testing issues contributed to the development and utilization of validated testing procedures. It should be fulfilling a similar role with respect to the development and utilization of equitable job-evaluation techniques. Instead, the Commission's policy seems to be to sit back and await the piecemeal development of these issues by private litigants and the courts. This is an abrogation of executive branch responsibility under title VII.

In order to assure appropriate coordination between the Commission and the Department of Labor's Office of Federal Contract Complicance Programs—OFCCP—section 4 of the bill would specifically require consultation with OFCCP in the promulgation of the Federal guidelines. Section 4 also would direct the Commission to develop and carry out a continuing program of education, information, and technical assistance with respect to the elimination of discriminatory wage-setting practices and discriminatory wage differentials and the development and utilization of equitable job-evaluation techniques.

Mr. President, in order to insure adequate congressional oversight, section 4 contains provisions directing the Commission to make annual reports to the President and Congress on the steps it has taken and plans to take to carry out the proposed act. A self-evaluation of the effectiveness of the Commission's efforts is to be included in the report along with inclusion of such recommendations for statutory changes or administrative action, or both, as the Commission considers necessary to effectuate the purpose of the proposed act. The requirements with respect to this report have been made rather detailed in light of the fact that the Commission has shown no willingness voluntarily to take any action in this area.

Finally, section 4 would require the Commission to undertake a study of the Federal system for establishing pay grades for Federal employees to determine whether that system satisfies the definition of an equitable job-evaluation system as proposed in the bill. In 1978, in enacting the Civil Service Reform Act, the Congress explicitly provided in section 101(a) of that act—5 U.S.C. 2301(b)(2)(3)—that equal pay should be provided for work of equal value in the Federal work force. Yet, at the house hearings last year, the Director of the Office of Personnel Management—OPM—admitted that the system being used had not been reviewed for sex bias. Numerous other witnesses testified at those hearings as to the inherent bias in the Federal classification system, which is derived from the system in existence in 1923.

Since OPM appears unlikely to undertake an evaluation of its own system, section 4 would direct EEOC to do so. The Commission was given the responsibility for enforcement of equal employment opportunity laws within the Federal work force in the 1978 EEO reorganization. Mandating its involvement in this area is clearly appropriate and seems necessary in view of the vacuum that exists.

Section 5 would set forth directives to the Secretary of Labor, acting through OFCCP, with regard to Federal contractors. One primary way in which the Federal Government has sought to eliminate discrimination in employment is to obligate businesses that do contract work for the Federal Government or whose contracts are funded with Federal financial assistance to insure nondiscrimination with regard to employment practices and to take affirmative steps to provide equal employment opportunities throughout all of their activities as a condition of the contract. Executive Order 11246, promulgated by President Johnson in 1965, provides this basic directive and requires that Federal contractors meet these requirements. The lead agency for enforcement of this Executive order is the Department of Labor, through OFCCP.

Section 5 would specifically direct the Secretary of Labor, acting through OFCCP, to issue guidelines to require Federal contractors to identify and eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices and discriminatory wage differentials. Those guidelines would be issued after and should be consistent with the guidelines required to be issued by EEOC under section 4. Section 5 also requires that such OFCCP guidelines also provide that Federal contractors required to submit written affirmative action plans or updates of existing plans include in such plans or updates—within a year after the guidelines are issued—a review of the employer's wage-setting practices, an identification of any discrimination in those practices, and a plan of action to correct such discrimination. Section 5 would also strongly encourage these contractors to use equitable job-evaluation techniques by requiring compliance reviews of pay equity for those who fail to do so.

Currently, OFCCP guidelines provide generally that Federal contractors with more than 50 employees and a contract of more than $50,000 must submit a written affirmative action plan and require annual updating of such plans. Section 5 would thus require those contractors to include in their written affirmative action plans additional material relating to discriminatory wage-setting practices and discriminatory wage differentials. Although the guidelines would not require every Federal contractor to use an equitable job-evaluation in setting wage rates, they would provide a strong stimulus to do so.

Section 5 also would require the Secretary of Labor to submit to the President and Congress annual reports describing in detail the activities undertaken by the Department to carry out the provisions of the proposed act. Again, this reporting requirement is designed to give Congress adequate information to exercise its oversight responsibilities.

Section 6 would provide that each Federal agency required under section 717 of the Civil Rights Act to submit an equal employment opportunity plan must include in such plan or update of an existing plan information on its wage-setting practices and wage differentials. Again, this is a written plan already required to be prepared under section 717; this legislation would simply add to what that plan is required to include with respect to discriminatory wage-setting practices and discriminatory wage differentials. The required information must be submitted within 1 year of the date of enactment.

Finally, Mr. President, section 7 would require the EEOC to provide the President and Congress with a detailed report on its enforcement activities relating to the Equal Pay Act. The statistics relating to the average earnings of women indicate a continuing failure to achieve equal pay for equal work. Congress needs a clear understanding of what the Commission has been able to do since responsibility for Equal Pay Act violations was transferred to it and of what was done by the Department of Labor prior to the transfer. Section 7 also would require submission to the Congress of the Department of Labor's comments on the Commission's report.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, pay equity is a matter of fundamental fairness. It is also a matter of economic necessity.

Our Nation has increasingly been experiencing what is graphically described as the feminization of poverty. Two out of three adults in this Nation living in poverty are women. As the National Advisory Council on Economic Opportunity has noted, "Poverty among women is becoming one of the most compelling social facts of this decade."

Lack of pay for work of comparable worth is a primary factor in producing this poverty rate.

For men in our society, poverty often comes as a consequence of joblessness and the way out of poverty is through employment. But many women live in poverty even though they already have jobs and are working full-time; their jobs just do not pay a living wage. Almost 40 percent of the fully employed women earn less than $10,000. In 1982, the poverty level for a four-person family was $9,860. The poverty rate for families headed by a full-time working woman is more than double that for households headed by full time working men.

The National Advisory Council on Economic Opportunity also concluded that if working women earned the same wages that similarly qualified men now earn, the number of families living in poverty would be cut in half.

Mr. President, elimination of discriminatory wage-setting practices that deny famale workers a fair return for their labor should be of paramount importance to every American. The issue of wage discrimination is not a woman's issue or a special interest issue. It is a national issue. It goes to the very heart of our national commitment to the eradication of poverty, our commitment to a just society, and our commitment to revitalize our economy. Pay inequities must end. We cannot afford the enormous societal cost of allowing them to persist.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation I am introducing be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1900

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Pay Equity Act of 1983".

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the average earnings of full-time, female workers are significantly lower than the average earnings of similarly-situated male workers;

(2) this average earnings differential results, in significant part, because wages paid in occupational fields or job classifications held predominantly by female workers are lower than those paid in occupational fields or job classifications held predominantly by male workers, and this differential results from wage-setting practices based on the sex of the employees, rather than any intrinsic differences in the comparable worth of the job as measured by the education, training, skills, experience, effort, responsibility, or working conditions required for the job;

(3) as a result of these discriminatory wage differentials resulting from discriminatory wage-setting practices, many female workers are underpaid and undercompensated for their work efforts and thereby denied equal employment opportunities;

(4) these discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials result in depressing the wages, devaluing the work, and lowering the living standards of many female workers and contribute to the increasing numbers of women and children living at or near the poverty level and a consequent increase in their need for various forms of government assistance;

(5) the contributions of female workers are vital to our economy, and the continued existence and tolerance of these discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials prevent full utilization of the talents, skills, experience, and potential contributions of female workers and result in the exploitation of these workers;

(6) these discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials persist despite applicable state and federal equal employment opportunity laws and directives;

(7) the federal agencies charged with the responsibility for enforcement of federal equal employment opportunity laws and directives have failed to take action, pursuant to applicable such laws and directives, to seek to eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials; and

(8) objective job-evaluation techniques now exist which are utilized by many public and private employers to determine the comparative value of different jobs through a system which numerically rates the basic features and requirements of a particular job, and additional efforts should be made to develop, improve, and implement these techniques so as to help eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials.

(b) Recognizing that the elimination of discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials is in the public interest, the purpose of this Act is to help eliminate such practices and differentials by—

(1) providing for the development and utilization of equitable job-evaluation techniques that will promote the establishment of wage rates based upon the work performed rather than the sex of the employee and thereby help assure that all employees, irrespective of sex, race, or ethnicity, receive comparable pay for work of comparable worth;

(2) providing to those federal agencies charged with the responsibility for enforcement of federal equal employment opportunity laws and directives specific guidance and direction to help eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials;

(3) encouraging and stimulating public and private employers to eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials through the development and utilization of equitable job-evaluation techniques in setting wage rates; and

(4) bringing the federal government's wage-setting practices into compliance with the purpose of this Act and the provision of section 101(a) of the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978, Public Law 95-454 (5 U.S.C. 2301(b)(2)(3)), which provides that equal pay should be provided for work of equal value in federal employment.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. As used in this Act, the term—

(1) "Commission" means the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission established by section 705 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e-4);

(2) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Labor;

(3) "federal agency" means any agency of the Federal Government or the District of Columbia, including any Executive agency as defined in section 105 of title 5, United States Code, the United States Postal Service and the Postal Rate Commission, and the Library of Congress, the General Accounting Office, and the Office of Technology Assessment;

(4) "discriminatory wage-setting practices" means the setting of wage rates paid for jobs held predominantly by female workers lower than those paid for jobs held predominantly by male workers although the work performed requires comparable education, training, skills, experience, effort, and responsibility, and is performed under comparable working conditions;

(5) "discriminatory wage differentials" means different rates of compensation resulting from utilization of discriminatory wage-setting practices;

(6) "job-evaluation technique" means an objective method of determining the comparative value of different jobs utilizing a system which rates numerically the basic features and requirements of a particular job, including such factors as education, training, skills, experience, effort, responsibility, and working conditions; and

(7) "equitable job-evaluation technique" means a job-evaluation technique which, to the maximum extent feasible, does not include components for determining the comparative value of a job that reflects the sex, race, or ethnicity of the employee.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION ACTIVITIES

SEC. 4. (a)(1) Not later than nine months after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Commission, in consultation with the Secretary (acting through the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs in the Department of Labor), shall publish in the Federal Register, for public review and comment, proposed guidelines for the purpose of identifying and eliminating discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials. Such guidelines shall include recommendations for utilization of equitable job-evaluation techniques to establish rates of compensation for employees.

(2) Not later than one year after such enactment date, the Commission, in consultation with the Secretary (acting through the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs), shall publish final guidelines for the purpose described in paragraph (1).

(b) In order to effectuate the purpose of this Act, the Commission shall develop and carry out a continuing program of education and information, under which, among other things, the Commission shall—

(1) undertake and promote research into the development of equitable job-evaluation techniques;

(2) develop a program for maximum dissemination and utilization of such equitable job-evaluation techniques; and

(3) develop and implement a program for providing appropriate technical assistance to any public or private entity requesting such assistance to eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials.

(c) On February 1, 1985, and annually thereafter, the Commission shall submit to the President and the Congress a report describing in detail the activities of the Commission during the preceding fiscal year to carry out the provisions of subsection (b). Such report shall include an evaluation of the effectiveness of such activities, a description of the Commission's plans for carrying out the provisions of subsection (b) and effectuating the purpose of this Act during the fiscal year in which the report is submitted, and such recommendations for statutory changes or administrative action, or both, as the Commission considers necessary to effectuate such purpose.

(d)(1) The Commission shall conduct a study of the system utilized under chapter 51 of title 5, United States Code, by the Office of Personnel Management (established by chapter 11 of such title) to establish pay grades for federal employees in order to determine if such system satisfies the definition in section 3(7) of an equitable job evaluation system.

(2) Not later than six months after the final guidelines are published under subsection (a)(2), the Commission shall submit to the President and the Congress a report of its findings, in light of such guidelines, with respect to the study undertaken pursuant to paragraph (1) and shall provide a copy of this report to the Director of the Office of Personnel Management. The report shall include such recommendations for statutory changes or administrative action, or both, as the Commission considers necessary to effectuate the purpose of this Act.

(3) Not later than ninety days after receiving a copy of the report pursuant to paragraph (2), the Director of the Office of Personnel Management shall submit to the President and the Congress a report commenting on the Commission's report and specifying its intentions and the reasons therefor (and as appropriate, the timetable to carry out or not carry out the Commission's recommendations).

(4) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Director of the Office of Personnel Management and the head of each Federal agency shall cooperate in all respects with the Commission in connection with its conduct of the study required under this subsection and shall provide to the Commission such data, reports, and documents in connection with the subject matter of such study as the Commission may request.

FEDERAL CONTRACTS

SEC. 5. (a)(1) Not later than thirty days after the publication of final guidelines under section 4(a)(2), the Secretary (acting through the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs) shall publish in the Federal Register proposed guidelines for the purpose of requiring all contractors of the United States to identify and eliminate discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials. Such guidelines shall—

(A) include provisions to encourage all such contractors to develop and utilize equitable job-evaluation techniques to establish rates of compensation for employees;

(B) provide that each such contractor that is required by Federal law or directive to submit a written affirmative action plan shall (i) with respect to each such plan or update of each such plan submitted after the publication of the final guidelines published pursuant to paragraph (2), include in such plan or update a review and identification of any discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials within such contractor's labor force and a plan of action to eliminate any such practices and differentials, or (ii) if such contractor does not submit such plan or update within one year after such publication date, submit, within such one-year period, an amendment to its existing plan which shall include the information described in subclause (i); and

(C) provide for compliance reviews of any such contractor that has failed to utilize equitable job-evaluation techniques in setting wage rates for emloyees.

(2) Not later than sixty days after publication of the proposed guidelines under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall publish final guidelines for the purpose described in paragraph (1).

(b) On February 1, 1985, and annually thereafter, the Secretary shall submit to the President and the Congress a report describing in detail the activities undertaken during the preceding fiscal year and to be undertaken during the fiscal year in which the report is submitted by the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs pursuant to subsection (a). Such report shall include such recommendations for statutory changes or administrative action, or both, as the Secretary considers necessary to effectuate the purpose of this Act.

FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES

SEC. 6. Each federal agency responsible for submitting an equal employment opportunity plan pursuant to section 717 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e-16) shall include, in each such plan or update of such plan submitted to the Commission after the date of the enactment of this section, a review and identification of any discriminatory wage-setting practices and wage differentials with respect to its labor force and a plan of action to eliminate any such practices and differentials. Any such agency which does not submit such plan or update within one year after such enactment date shall, not later than one year after such enactment date, submit an amendment to its existing plan which shall include the information described in the preceding sentence.

EQUAL PAY ACT REPORT

SEC. 7. (a) Not later than October 1, 1984, the Commission shall submit to the President and the Congress a report describing in detail the activities of the Commission with respect to enforcement of the provisions of the Equal Pay Act of 1963 (29 U.S.C. 206(d)) since the date of transfer of authority for Equal Pay Act enforcement activities to the Commission pursuant to Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1978. Such report shall include with respect to such activities—

(1) information on the number of complaints received and processed by the Commission, their disposition, and the allocation of Commission resources to Equal Pay Act enforcement activities;

(2) a comparision of the disposition of, and allocation of recources to these cases by the Commission to the disposition of, and allocation of resources to, similar cases by the Department of Labor prior to the transfer of such responsibilities to the Commission; and

(3) any recommendations for statutory changes or administrative action, or both, as the Commission considers necessary to carry out the provisions of such Act and effectuate the purpose of this Act.

(b) Not later than ninety days after the date of the submission of the report required by subsection (a), the Secretary shall submit to the President and the Congress a report commenting on the Commission's report and containing such recommendations for statutory changes or administrative action, or both, as the Secretary considers necessary to carry out the provisions of such Act and effectuate the purpose of this Act.

By Mr. ARMSTRONG:

S. 1901. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to treat price level adjusted mortgages; to the Committee on Finance.

PRICE LEVEL ADJUSTED MORTGAGES

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, imagine the return of single-digit home mortgage rates this decade.

Imagine how many homes would be built, the number of jobs created, the millions of Americans whose dream of home ownership would come true with the return of single-digit mortgages.

Wishful thinking? No.

It could be reality with a new mortgage concept known as price level adjusted mortgages (Plams) and a simple change in Federal tax law.

This idea was suggested to me some time ago by Dr. Byron L. Johnson—an economist, teacher, former Colorado University regent and U.S. Congressman. After lengthy study I am convinced that Plams are an idea whose time has come.

Dr. Johnson and I are not the only ones who are sold on Plams. They are also endorsed by Dr. Milton Friedman, Nobel laureate; Dr. Herman Kahn, founder of the Hudson Institute; the Federal Home Loan Bank Board; the Utah State Retirement System; and many, many others. They all agree that Plams can permanently revitalize the Nation's housing marketplace.

To understand the beauty of this new mortgage, look first at today's ordinary mortgages. The conventional mortgage—where a home loan is repaid in equal monthly payments over 30 years—was first offered in the 1930's. This mortgage made housing affordable, and solved one of the most pressing problems of the Great Depression.

But the conventional mortgage was created when there was practically no inflation. Lenders could offer 2- and 3-percent mortgages, knowing that money lent in 1945 would be repaid in 1955 with the same dollar values because there was little inflation in those years. When prices are stable, the conventional mortgage is superb; it relies on a constant payment in current dollars that are roughly equal in value to constant dollars.

But when inflation rears its ugly head—as it did in the 1970's—the conventional mortgage can be disastrous to borrowers, lenders, and builders. With inflation, the value of monthly mortgage payments declines over time, and lenders receive less than fair value for their loans.

To protect their investment, lenders raise interest rates to levels that anticipate higher future inflation. Interest rates rise and fall according to expectations about inflation. If the preinflation interest rate is 5 percent, for example, a 10-percent inflation rate would trigger a 15-percent interest rate.

When interest rates triple, mortgage payments rise and price many out of the housing market. It is no wonder that the high cost of money, on top of housing construction costs, is the main factor pricing the American dream outside the reach of many would-be home buyers. The Federal Home Loan Bank Board says that 2.6 million Americans who want to buy homes simply cannot afford the costs of ownership.

In other words, 2 million Americans cannot buy homes because interest rates for conventional mortgages are pegged to the inflation rate.

But what would happen if the amount borrowed—instead of the interest—was pegged to the inflation rate?

Enter Plams (Price Level Adjusted Mortgages).

Plams merely add the real cost of inflation to the principal of the mortgage, rather than adding inflation to the interest rate. Put another way, Plams are mortgage instruments having an outstanding balance which is periodically adjusted to inflation, or indexed. The interest rate applicable to a Plam is a real interest rate; that is, a rate without any inflation premium. The payments on a Plam are based on this real rate, and at the end of each year, any outstanding balance is adjusted for inflation.

The advantages of Plams are enormous. Borrowers benefit from lower initial payments, which especially help first-time home buyers. Lenders benefit because there is no uncertainty over inflation, and their initial investment is inflation proof. The Government benefits because it reduces the amount of tax revenue now lost to borrowers in the form of high mortgage interest rate deductions.

Here is an example. Assume that inflation is 10 percent annually, and that a lender wants to make 4-percent real interest on money he loans. The interest rates would thus be 14 percent. For a $50,000 30-year conventional mortgage at 14-percent annual interest, initial payments would be $600 a month. At the end of 10 years, $47,000 of the mortgage would be left to be paid.

Under Plams, the initial payment would be only $238, or about a third of the conventional mortgage. Of course, under Plams, the mortgage value and the monthly payments would rise as a result of inflation. Even so, payments after 10 years are still only $563 on a $102,000 mortgage.

While the benefits are obvious, so is one risk. There is a possibility that household income or house price will not keep up with inflation. But the risk of this is slight, says the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. To quote their 1981 statement:

> The concern over whether individual households will encounter undue financial stress has been addressed in a study in a sample of 3,000 households over a nine-year period. (When compared to conventional mortgages), graduated payment mortgages created some increase in financial strain, but the more serious cases constituted an insignificant portion of the households studied.

Armed with these and other statistics, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board authorized Federal savings and loan associations to offer Plams but, despite their advantages, they have not caught on. One reason is the doubt about Federal tax treatment of Plams. For Plams, IRS holds the view that the increase in the mortgage of a Plams is tax deductible for the borrower and taxable as income for the lender. They will have to report the higher payments as income, even though the adjustments in principal are specifically designed only to preserve the purchasing power of the investment.

To understand the significance of the IRS policy, consider the tax aspects of the example used earlier. A Plams mortgage of $50,000 increases to $102,000 after the first 10 years. Even though the increase merely inflation proofs the lender's initial investment, the IRS wants the lender to pay tax on the $50,000 increase as if it were income.

This is an unfair tax because it taxes the recovery of capital as income.

Legislation I am introducing corrects this tax problem. This measure is straightforward: For newly constructed homes that are financed through an inflation-adjusted mortgage, the inflation increase will be considered neither as income to the lender nor as tax deductible for the borrower.

This legislation should pass, and for several reasons:

First, it is not fair to tax recovery of capital as income.

Second, 2 million more people would be able to buy homes, and get at least that many more people back to work.

Third, the amount of interest income claimed as deduction by taxpayers will fall sharply as indexation becomes widespread.

Fourth, while interest income reported by lenders will fall, it will not fall proportionately, because many lenders are fully, or substantially tax exempt now.

Fifth, the wider use of Plams, and the resulting sharp fall in effective interest rates, will have such a substantial benefit to national employment and income that the gross taxable income will rise significantly and increase total revenues.

Clearly, Plams are an idea whose time has come. The only barrier keeping it from permanently revitalizing the housing industry is Federal tax law. My bill removes this barrier, and opens the door to widespread Plams use.●

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, Mr. STEVENS, and Mr. JEPSEN):

S. 1902. A bill to amend title 39, United States Code, to assure that the nine-digit ZIP code remains voluntary, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

NINE-DIGIT ZIP CODE

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation related to the nine-digit ZIP code. I think that this legislation represents an emerging consensus on how the nine-digit ZIP program should be implemented by the Postal Service. Joining me as cosponsors of this bill are Senator JEPSEN who 2 years ago cosponsored legislation with me to delay implementation of the longer code, and Senator STEVENS who has always supported the efforts of the Postal Service to implement the expanded ZIP code on a voluntary basis.

This bill would allow the nine-digit ZIP code to become a reality, but only on a voluntary basis and only for large business mailers who are likely to realize a financial benefit from participating in the incentive plan which is currently pending before the Postal Rate Commission.

Mr. President, let me explain the provisions of the bill by using an analogy to another ZIP code program used by the Postal Service. Although most Americans do not know it, this country already has a seven-digit ZIP code in place and operating. It is called the carrier route system. As I say, it is seven digits long. The first five digits are just the same as the five-digit ZIP code. The last two digits identify specific carriers—mailmen—at each individual post office.

In the same way that the four new digits in the nine-digit code would be used to cut sorting costs, the two extra digits in the seven code are used in the sorting process. Instead of having to memorize which carrier has which addresses, the two digits allow a quick identification of the carrier without the need for scheme memorization.

As I have said, this system is already in place. The Postal Service provides the two-digit add-on to very large mailers through the exchange of computer tapes and other information systems. The mailers who print their addresses by computer add these two digits on to the address. The mailers receive a discount on the price of a stamp for each item that bears these two digits. And the sorting clerks at the post office can do their work much more quickly and accurately, saving us all some money in the cost of processing the mail. It is a successful program. It is completely voluntary. And it has been implemented without concerning or involving to any great extent the general public. Nobody has been asked to learn their personal carrier route number—their seven-digit ZIP code. No business asks you to identify your seven-digit number when you provide the address. And nobody feels that their mail will somehow receive lesser service if it does not bear the seven-digit number.

It seems to me that the nine-digit ZIP code could be implemented on the same basis. And if it were, I would have no objection in letting the nine-digit program go forward. I would, in fact, wish the Postal Service every success with the program. My concern has always been that many small mailers would get caught up in implementing the nine-digit ZIP code at great cost without offsetting benefits. Not everyone shares that view. Some think that voluntary is voluntary and that no one would make the investment in converting unless benefits would clearly result. But I have always feared that some would feel compelled to go into the system regardless of the direct benefits because they would believe that five-digit mail was not going to be handled as expeditiously by the Postal Service. Currently, 97 percent of the American public uses the five-digit code without any direct financial benefit and they do so because they want prompt service for their letters and they believe that the ZIP code is necessary to get it. Not so, according to Postal Service regulations. The five digit is voluntary. As the nine digit would be. So voluntary in this case is to some extent in the eye of the beholder.

The bill has only a few specific provisions. It would require the Postal Service to keep the nine-digit ZIP code voluntary for all classes of mail, to provide substantially the same service for both five-digit and nine-digit mail, to restrict advertising and information efforts to business mailers rather than the general public, and to assure that Postal Service maintains nine-digit ZIP information systems so that the longer codes will always be available to business mailers inexpensively and through the Postal Service rather than from the general public.

Mr. President, in crafting these conditions I think that we have come very close to describing the seven-digit carrier route system and I expect that the nine-digit system will be implemented in a comparable way. I have had discussions and exchanged correspondence with the Postmaster General on this point and believe that the nine-digit ZIP system can and will be implemented without involving small mailers or the general public. Mr. President, I would ask that a copy of the bill be included at this point in the RECORD. Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1902

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 404 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding the following new subsection:

"(c)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, the nine-digit ZIP code shall remain voluntary. No one need use it unless to qualify for any voluntary rate incentive offered for participation in efforts to hold down postal costs through automated processing of mail bearing the code.

"(2) The Postal Service shall not engage in publicity efforts urging household mailers to use the nine-digit ZIP code in addressing mail to correspondents.

"(3) The Postal Service shall not make any mass mailings for the purpose of advising household addresses of their nine-digit ZIP codes.

"(4) The Postal Service shall maintain appropriate systems to enable mailers to obtain the nine-digit ZIP code information needed to maintain complete addresses for their correspondents.

"(5) The Postal Service shall strive to maintain speed of mail service for mail bearing the five-digit ZIP code as good as it provides for mail bearing the nine-digit ZIP code. It shall maintain public information to monitor whether there is a difference in the speed of mail service between mail bearing the nine-digit ZIP code and mail bearing the five-digit ZIP code."

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I join with my good friends, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mr. JEPSEN in cosponsoring this legislation.

As many know, I have supported the ZIP+4 program, for I see it as a way for the U.S. Postal Service to dramatically increase employee productivity and thus hold down postal rates. The U.S. Postal Service's automation program has the potential to save postal ratepayers about $600 million annually. The key to these savings is the voluntary ZIP+4 program.

When the U.S. Postal Service was created, Congress mandated that it perform its duties in the most efficient manner possible. The Postal Service is living up to that charge by meeting its public service responsibilities in a businesslike manner. And, like many businesses today, it has recognized the value of automation in holding down the costs reflected in the postage rates we pay.

In October 1981, Congress directed the General Accounting Office to study the ZIP+4 program, which was not fully understood by the public. In its report, GAO conditionally recommended that the Postal Service proceed with ZIP+4 because the new code offers the maximum savings available from automation.

We are now assured that ZIP+4 will benefit the Postal Service and all mailers. So, for the record, here are some facts about ZIP+4:

The ZIP+4 program is intended for use by volume business mailers and individuals need not be concerned with the program.

The current five-digit ZIP code enables mail to be sorted only between post offices and requires more expensive and largely manual sorting at the receiving post office. The four new digits provide geographic information which enables automated equipment to sort mail to a small segment of a letter carrier's route.

The optical character readers and bar code sorters being deployed by the Postal Service—which are similar in concept to the scanners we see today in grocery stores, banks, and retail stores—have proven their worth. These ZIP+4 machines will process approximately 10,000 pieces of letter mail per work hour, compared to 1,800 pieces per work hour now done on mechanized equipment and 850 pieces per work hour for manual sorting.

ZIP+4 will more than double the Postal Service's return on investment for automation and will increase the savings received by all mailers.

ZIP+4 will reduce sorting errors and improve the reliability of mail delivery.

ZIP+4 will help the Postal Service spread out the intervals between rate increases by increasing postal productivity and reducing postal labor costs.

The ZIP+4 will be voluntary. Those who choose to use it may use it. Those who choose to ignore it may ignore it. ZIP+4 offers the freedom of choice which is traditional in our democracy.

Now that these facts are known, the only awesome thing about ZIP+4 is its potential to save postal ratepayers millions of dollars. The only frightening thing about ZIP+4 is that if these facts are ignored, we might lose this opportunity to keep our Postal Service as efficient and affordable as it can be.

I, for one, am concerned about our postal rates even though they are the lowest in the free world. I am doing everything I can to urge the Postal Service to delay a postal rate increase until it is absolutely essential. ZIP+4 is a major element in the efforts of the Postal Service to not only delay an increase but to insure that when an increase is required it will be as small as possible.

As some Members have pointed out, there are problems with the ZIP+4 program which I believe are primarily perceptual rather than actual. This bill will go a long way toward resolving those false perceptions and encourage the public to embrace the program with greater confidence.

This bill incorporates the essence of legislation I introduced last year to put into statute that this program will always be totally voluntary but will provide an incentive in the form of reduced postal rates for those businesses who do choose to use the ZIP+4.

The bill forbids the Postal Service from engaging in publicity efforts aimed at those not likely to use ZIP+4, such as each householder, and requires that the delivery standards for the current five-digit ZIP code user not be adversely affected as a result of the implementation of ZIP+4. We feel that such a legislative requirement will prohibit the Postal Service from engaging in publicity which might lead one to believe that he or she must use the new code, which is not true, and will reassure those who choose not to use the expanded code that their mail will not be delayed in order to deliver ZIP+4 mail.

The bill also requires the Postal Service to establish an appropriate system of records to enable mailers to obtain the necessary ZIP+4 code information.

Again, I cannot stress enough the importance of the ZIP+4 program and the resulting automation to the efforts to hold down postal rates. I urge that we move forward with the program. A positive step in that direction is support and passage of this legislation.

By Mr. GRASSLEY (for himself, Mr. PRYOR, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, and Mr. MELCHER):

S. 1904. A bill to require that the Department of Defense increase the use of formal advertising in the procurement of property and services, to limit the circumstances under which such department may award contracts by negotiation, to establish additional requirements with respect to the negotiation of contracts by such department, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

CREEPING CAPITALISM

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, we are all aware of the spare-parts overpricing problem. It has been well-documented, and widely publicised. But now it is time to offer solutions to this problem.

The problem of overpricing does not begin and end with spare parts. It applies equally to weapon systems. It is the product of a bureaucracy behaving as a monopoly. All the incentives are structured to insure that we get exactly what we have gotten.

We see the cumulative effects of the problem in the form of an underfunded defense budget. It is a pervasive problem, brought about by the natural tendency of the Pentagon toward centralization, control, and the administering of prices through negotiations. The system suffers from a lack of competition. Unless competition is brought to bear in the Defense Department, our defense will diminish to a critical degree.

Today Senator PRYOR and I introduce a bill to force the Department of Defense to increase the use of competitive bidding in its purchase of goods and services. It is intended to reverse a many-decades-old trend toward increasing bureaucratization and monopoly within the Defense Department. It is a bill which confronts a problem which has not developed overnight, and therefore cannot be righted overnight.

This bill is an important step in correcting a very serious and longstanding structural deficiency. It is also an important step toward controlling costs and eliminating the underfunding problem in the Defense budget. It would compel DOD to evolve toward an arrangement that is more harmonious with our nationally accepted values when it comes to the production of goods and services. It is a case of bringing DOD business into line with the way the rest of America does business.

Very briefly, the bill would do the following:

It would modestly increase the amount of Defense dollars subject to formal advertising, by 5 percent per year until 70 percent of all funds are competitively bid. The current figure estimated by GAO is roughly 6 percent.

If DOD did not meet its obligation to increase formal advertising by 5 percent in any given year, then the Department's funds for all negotiated contracts would be frozen.

All cost and pricing data, as well as the names of those who negotiate contracts, would be made part of the public domain.

The bill would also eliminate the many loopholes, or exceptions, to formal advertising which presently allow DOD to ignore true competition and instead negotiate contracts.

And the bill would require that formally advertised contracts be rebid at least once every 3 years.

The intention behind this bill is to change the context or the framework that DOD operates in. It would reorient the Pentagon, away from monopoly and centralization, and instead toward free market competition. It is not an attempt to micromanage. Instead, the bill very clearly defines an objective, a set of goals, and a timetable by which to reach those goals. Although it would give the Pentagon a long period of time to learn the art of competition, the bill is adamant about what it would require DOD to do over time.

Those of us who introduce this bill are under no illusions that reversing the ingrained patterns of the Pentagon bureaucracy will be very easy. There is an enormous constituency for business as usual. There will be an enormous struggle to keep the idea of true competition alive, until more people are deriving benefits from competition than from the present system. Until then, the system will seek to undermine competition as it has in the last several decades. The bureaucracy will seek to preserve the status quo.

The sponsors of this bill represent a good cross section of the political spectrum. Joining Mr. PRYOR and myself are Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, and Mr. MELCHER. Our common interest is a strong defense brought about through the disciplines of competition. We wish to see the Defense Department apply the same principles and values for purchasing goods and services as all other American institutions do. And why do we ask this? For one simple reason: It has stood the test of time. It works.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am pleased to join today with the Senator from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY) in introducing the Department of Defense Procurement Procedures Act of 1983.

Let me discuss the magnitude of defense procurement. It has been estimated that over 10 million separate contracts or other procurement actions take place each year involving over $100 billion at the Department of Defense. Every penny is taxpayer money.

It is nothing short of shocking to hear that competition at the Pentagon is limited to only 6 percent of total defense contract dollars. This is very different from the private sector. It would be hard to find a private business in these difficult economic times that failed to seek out the best possible deal in buying services or supplies. For that matter, it would be hard to find a householder who does not do at least a little shopping around.

Any self-respecting agent in charge of purchases would test the market, ask for competitive bids and then render a judgment based on cost and quality.

Why has the Pentagon not brought its procurement practices into line? One assumption is that competition is regarded among professional defense people as a troubling annoyance and its absence can always be covered up by redtape and doubletalk. More cynical is the nagging possibility that contracts, and especially follow-ons, are simply a part of the buddy system that works its way through the military-industrial maze. Both views are commonly held by the public.

In fairness to the Pentagon, it should be noted that official explanations have been suggested by the General Accounting Office and the Office of Federal Procurement Policy. According to their studies, the absence of purchase descriptions, plus the presence of unnecessarily restrictive specifications, discourage competition. Moreover, procurement officers sometimes fail to undertake market analyses and find new suppliers.

The least appealing of the official suggestions is that many sole-source contracts are awarded in response to unsolicited proposals. This is no excuse, but it may offer an explanation. An enterprising salesman calls on a Pentagon official, for example, argues convincingly that troops need a new flashlight for high humidity and dense foliage, and then shows his product is one logical possibility. The sale is final before a contract is even signed.

Studies cited by the General Accounting Office have shown that competition can save 20 percent of the cost. In addition, if the Defense Department were to spread the money around it would broaden the base of defense production. This could be especially important at the present time as we enter what may be a major buildup in defense production and expenses become inflated more than ever.

Finally, competition is only right. Why should the Pentagon continue to operate according to rules of its own when other budgets are drastically cut across-the-board? Government practices aside, competition has been standard procedure in the private sector for years. There is no reason it should not be followed in military spending.

Pentagon officials need to learn what so many American merchants and managers have known for years—that competition is good business in both quality and cost. It is a lesson the Pentagon has either failed to learn or is unwilling to accept.

Mr. President, I ask that a summary of the major features of the bill be placed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY

1. It would nudge up the amount of defense contract dollars that are competitively bid. According to GAO, less than six percent of defense contract dollars are subject to true competitive bidding. This bill would add five percent to that figure each year until the total amount of defense dollars subject to competitive bidding reached 70 percent.

2. If the aggregate amount of purchases through competitive bidding does not reach the amount required through this bill, then all funds for negotiated contracts may not be obligated or expended.

3. Competitive bidding is defined as "formal advertising" as described in Title 10, Section 2305 of the United States Code. Under Section 2304, 17 exceptions to formal advertising are listed. This bill would eliminate twelve of those exceptions, and tighten the rest where appropriate. The general thrust is to eliminate all loopholes that enable contracts to be negotiated or competitively negotiated rather than competitively bid.

4. All cost and pricing data of negotiated contracts would be made part of the public domain. The names of each officer of employee of the Government who participates in the decision to negotiate a contract, or who participates in the awarding of a negotiated contract should be made part of the public domain.

5. DoD contracts that are required to be made by formal advertising must be re-bid at least once every three years.

S. 1905. A bill to authorize funds for the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

MAUREEN AND MIKE MANSFIELD FOUNDATION

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill to establish the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation. This foundation has been created to support two important organizations: the Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs and the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Center at the University of Montana.

Together, these two centers will honor the career of Mike Mansfield, the longest-serving majority leader in the history of the U.S. Senate. Currently, the American Ambassador to Japan, Mike Mansfield, is truly an American statesman and a world leader.

The centers also honor the contributions of Mike's wife, Maureen Mansfield. As Mike said, upon his retirement from the Senate, "My conclusion has been reached in this instance with my wife, Maureen Hayes Mansfield, who has been with me through all these years and whose sensitive counsel, deep understanding, and great love have been so much a part of whatever may be the sum of my contribution."

The Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs, to be constructed at Flathead Lake in northwestern Montana, will bring leaders in business, government, and cultural affairs from nations of the Pacific to participate in conferences and seminars on the developing economic and cultural ties in this region. We expect that the center will host more than 60 such meetings each year on subjects ranging from agricultural trade to educational exchange programs.

The center's progress is keyed to the unparalleled growth which has characterized trade in the Pacific basin during the past two decades. This growth is expected to continue into the 21st century. The center will work to foster economic growth through trade, and will also be a leader in improving international understanding and in eliminating cultural barriers which have impeded exchanges across the Pacific.

The Maureen and Mike Mansfield Center at the University of Montana will conduct academic programs related to Pacific area studies, ethics, and public affairs. The university programs will open new opportunities for research and study, and attract leaders from academic and public life.

These two centers will sponsor cooperative programs designed to build upon their complementary relationships, such as hosting major conferences on Pacific area political, cultural, and trade relations.

The State of Montana has appropriated $1 million to the Mansfield Foundation, which will coordinate fundraising activities for these two centers. This bill authorizes an additional $5 million to be appropriated from Federal funds, as a one-time appropriation to help establish the centers.

The foundation will seek additional funds from individual donors, and we expect substantial donations from Japanese and other Pacifice sources, once Ambassador Mansfield retires from his post in Japan.

I believe it is fitting and proper that the United States should honor Mike Mansfield in this way. These two centers will honor his career by supporting and continuing his lifelong efforts to achieve close relations with Pacific nations in every sense.

Mr. President, many friends of Mike and colleagues of ours have joined in this effort. The majority leader (Mr. BAKER) and the minority leader (Mr. BYRD) served on the founding committee for the foundation, along with Senator DANNY INOUYE, the late Senator "Scoop" Jackson, and House Speaker TIP O'NEILL.

Stan Kimmitt, former Secretary to the Senate, served on the initial planning group and is a member of the board of the Mansfield Foundation. The foundation is chaired by Hon. Ted Schwinden, Governor of Montana.

Mr. President, with the support of the leadership, I hope to pass this bill soon, possibly attached to another measure moving through Congress. And I plan to ask the Senate to include funds for this important foundation in the 1984 labor appropriations bill. I hope my colleagues will want to support this effort, to honor Mike Mansfield and to continue the important work he has started.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1905

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. The Secretary of Education is authorized to provide financial assistance in accordance with the provisions of this Act to the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation to assist in the development of the Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs and the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Center at the University of Montana.

SEC. 2. No financial assistance provided by this Act may be made, except upon an application at such time, in such manner, and containing such information as the Secretary of Education may require.

SEC. 3. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums, not to exceed $5,000,000, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. Funds appropriated pursuant to this Act shall remain available until expended.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the majority leader (Mr. BAKER) and the minority leader (Mr. BYRD) be added as original cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I commend the Senator for this resolution. I cannot think of a more fitting tribute to one of our former colleagues, and one of my predecessors in this office, than the proposal now being made. I am pleased to be a cosponsor and I urge its early and favorable consideration.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I want to very deeply thank the gracious majority leader. It is obvious that without his efforts we would not be proceeding nearly as quickly and as expeditiously as we are. I pass on the deep gratitude and thanks of the people of the State of Montana for the majority leader's help in this regard.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

By Mr. JOHNSTON:

S.J. Res. 173. A joint resolution commending the Historic American Buildings Survey, a program of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

HISTORIC AMERICAN BUILDINGS SURVEY

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing a joint resolution commending the Historic American Buildings Survey (HABS), a program of the National Park Service.

Created in 1933, HABS provided meaningful and constructive employment to countless architects, draftsmen, photographers, and other skilled individuals who were victims of the Great Depression. Its goal was, as it still is after 50 years of service, "preservation through documentation."

We are fortunate, indeed, to have such a program. Approximately 16,000 historically and architecturally significant buildings and structures in this country have been graphically preserved as a result of HABS' efforts. Without such documentation, the authentic restoration of historical landmarks would be impossible. For example, it is only because of scaled drawings and interior photographs produced by HABS employees that Hyde Park, Roosevelt's birthplace which was damaged by fire last year, can be accurately reconstructed.

As many as 5,000 of the 16,000 structures surveyed have disappeared in one way or another. Yet, carefully compiled records, including interior and exterior photographs, detailed drawings, and pages of historical and architectural data, insure the preservation of otherwise lost significant architectural techniques and designs.

HABS represents a collective effort. The National Park Service organizes the surveys and seeks funding through congressional appropriations or private contributions; and since 1933, the American Institute of Architects has provided counsel and the Library of Congress has housed the records. Additionally, for a number of years an advisory committee comprised of architects and historians assisted in monitoring performance and encouraging professionalism.

Thousands of important structures remain unsurveyed; hence, as they succumb to decay, fire, demolition, or other forms of destruction or alteration, a part of our heritage also fades. The numbers involved could be intimidating. However, architectural students who work on summer projects; detailed records donated by other architects; and supplementary documentation of changing American engineering techniques provided by a sister organization, the Historic American Engineering Record (HAER) have all contributed immensely to the program's important mission. Its success depends on continued support and generosity.

Mr. President, I encourage my colleagues to join me in congratulating the Historic American Building Survey on its 50th anniversary and ask unanimous consent that a joint resolution, commending it for its contribution to our understanding of the history and heritage of this country, be inserted in the RECORD. I also ask unanimous consent that an article by Laura Beaty, program associate for Historic Heritage of the National Parks and Recreation Association, which appeared in the March 1983, National Parks magazine be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. J. RES. 173

Whereas the Historic American Building Survey has been documenting the architectural heritage of the United States with measured drawings, photographs, and historical data since 1933;

Whereas these records, stored in the Library of Congress for public use, along with the records created by a sister program, the Historic American Engineering Record, have added immeasurably to our knowledge and appreciation of the historic American built environment;

Whereas the Survey has proven to be an important training ground for thousands of architects, historians, and scholars who have worked to preserve our historic American architecture; and

Whereas the fiftieth anniversary of this program marks an appropriate time to commend the National Park Service on the Survey's past accomplishments as well as a time to look forward to the continuance of this important mission of recording the best examples of historic American architecture and engineering: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Historic American Buildings Survey be commended for its substantial contributions to our understanding of the history and heritage of this Nation.

[From National Parks, March/April 1983]

THE HISTORIC AMERICAN BUILDINGS SURVEY

(By Laura Beaty)

The Great Depression of the 1930s spawned many public works projects that provided jobs for millions of unemployed Americans. Most of these programs vanished as a revitalized domestic economy replaced public jobs with private ones. One notable exception is the Historic American Buildings Survey (HABS), a creative program established in 1933 that still exists today.

HABS was conceived by the historic architects of the National Park Service (NPS), who saw the opportunity to hire accomplished architects who were out of work. Their mission would be to graphically record the disappearing architecture of America.

HABS' original purpose was not to prevent the loss of America's historically and architecturally significant buildings, but to compile a record of them through surveys before they vanished. So the newly formed HABS set out to document a wide range of buildings and structures, from early log shelters to ornately designed mansions, from the homes of famous Americans to buildings that had witnessed significant historical events. HABS' goal was—and still is—"preservation through documentation."

Structures surveyed by HABS teams are insured against complete and total loss because the documents survive, even if the buildings do not. In fact, surveys of buildings threatened by demolition or alteration are given precedence to ensure that some record of these buildings exist. Without these surveys, no evidence of the existence of thousands of historical American buildings would remain. To date, about one-third of the sixteen thousand buildings and structures recorded by HABS have disappeared.

Surveys conducted by HABS contain a great deal of detailed information. Complete surveys include measured drawings, interior and exterior photographs, and written material on the historical and architectural aspects of the buildings. A measured drawing, done to precise scale, is the most comprehensive kind of record that can be made of a building. Because of the cost and time required in preparing measured drawings, however, only the most significant subjects are recorded that way. In some cases, depending on the size of the building or detail to be recorded, photographs must substitute for measured drawings. For instance, photographing a tall or unstable building is more practical than assigning a terrified architect to hand-measure every inch of the structure.

Architects, draftsmen, and photographers employed by HABS under various federal relief programs prepared five thousand sheets of drawings and took three thousand photographs of historic buildings throughout the country during HABS' first few years. The accomplishments of the program at that time were directly related to the numbers and quality of the particpating architects at any given locality. As a result, buildings in some regions of the country were more thoroughly documented than those in others.

In 1934 the National Park Service entered into an agreement on behalf of HABS with the American Institute of Architects (AIA) and the Library of Congress. Each of these groups was assigned specific tasks. NPS sets the standards, organizes the projects, and seeks the necessary funding through congressional appropriations or private or state sources, depending upon the projects. AIA members offer counsel, and the Library of Congress preserves the records and makes them available to the public.

In addition, an advisory committee formed in 1934 to advise the National Park Service on the quality of the work being performed by the architects, the historians, and the Library of Congress, and to recommend structures to be recorded. The committee, composed of professional architects and historians, met annually from 1934 to 1940 and from 1967 to 1980. During those periods, the committee's evaluations served to encourage a high degree of professionalism in all phases of the documentation work. NPCA concurs with the recent suggestion by HABS that this committee be reactivated to oversee current projects.

When Congress passed the Historic Sites Act of 1935, it officially gave the Park Service major responsibility for historic preservation. The act established a national policy "to preserve for public use historic sites, buildings and objects of national significance or the inspiration and benefit of the people of the United States." The act provided that the Park Service shall have the power to "secure, collate, and preserve drawings, plans, photographs, and other data of historic and archeological sites, buildings and objects." HABS was the program through which the NPS surveys would be performed.

During World War II, the nation's manpower and money went towards wartime activities. HABS became relatively inactive for about ten years. Some architects continued with recordation projects on their own, donating records to the National Park Service. Slowly, the collection grew.

When survey activities resumed in the 1950s, the buildings within the National Park System became a major target for HABS. Called "Mission 66," a ten-year project got underway in 1956, its aim to revive the parks that had been badly neglected during World War II. Records were made of many historic structures in the parks for restoration work planned by Mission 66.

Ironically, by the 1950s improved economic conditions prevented HABS from hiring experienced architects because they were no longer affordable. Since that time, the new HABS teams have consisted of students from professional architectural schools. These students work on summer projects developed by HABS and supervised by NPS historic architects or faculty members from the architectural schools.

Before HABS, no major effort to record American architecture had been made in this country. Because of this program, scholars, historic preservationists, and others are now able to study the changing architectural styles that represent the remarkable growth of this country. Our architectural heritage ranges from primitive shelters of early settlers to the giant, sophisticated structures that today fill our city skylines. HABS teams continue to survey buildings of local, state, and national interest, both privately and publicly owned.

In 1969, in order to supplement its own work, HABS helped establish a sister organization, the Historic American Engineering Record (HAER, pronounced "hair"). HAER records American technology that has been rendered obsolete by more contemporary engineering and is in danger of demolition. Like HABS, it works through the cooperative efforts of several groups—the National Park Service, the American Society of Civil Engineers, and the Library of Congress. HAER conducts extensive studies to document structures and sites significant to American engineering and industrial history. The studies produce measured drawings, photographs, flow charts, films of specific industrial processes, maps, and reports, which are deposited in the Library of Congress for use by the public. HAER documentation is often the only remaining proof that dams, factories, and other structures existed before they were destroyed to make room for improved technologies.

In its fiftieth year, HABS boasts documentation of more than sixteen thousand buildings and structures represented by thirty-two thousand measured drawings, forty-six thousand photographs, and many pages of detailed historical data. These records have become invaluable to the Park Service. For example, the only good news to accompany last winter's report of a tragic, destructive fire at Hyde Park, Franklin Roosevelt's birthplace, was the extent of HABS' documentation of the buildings there. Restoration architects will be working from forty-one measured drawings and fifty-seven interior photos as efforts begin to repair the fire damage. Without these scaled drawings, accurate restoration of the park would not be possible.

In 1982, HABS finished a landmark project: a complete computer listing of all its documented structures. Now, with the aid of this list, one need only know in what county a structure is located to find out whether it has been recorded by HABS. A catalog of the HABS collection will be published in 1983 by the Library of Congress as part of the program's fiftieth anniversary celebration.

Any celebration of the accomplishments of HABS must be tempered by the sobering fact that only 25 percent of some ten thousand major structures managed by the National Park Service have been documented according to HABS standards. Furthermore, most of our 1,575 National Historic Landmarks remain unrecorded.

It would be unrealistic to expect the staff of HABS and its summer programs to be able to record the vast numbers of significant buildings and structures that remain undocumented. For this reason, HABS must rely on other architects to donate records drawn to HABS standards for documentation. To encourage such donations and as part of its fiftieth anniversary, HABS, in conjunction with the Athenaeum of Philadelphia, will award the first annual Charles E. Peterson Prize this fall. Cash awards will be given to the students of architecture who donate the three best sets of measured drawings, with certificates of merit for the runners-up. The annual award is being established in honor of Charles E. Peterson, founder of HABS, originator of the HABS documentation methods, and author of the NPCA book, The Moore House, based on one of the first, seminal HABS surveys.

Over the past fifty years, HABS teams have taken on many different tasks, often documenting for the first time centuries-old structures that reveal, in the warp of a floorboard or the curve of a chiseled stone arch, the lives of the people who lived there and the character of the time when they were built. The nation will continue to grow, and new buildings and structures will replace those designed and constructed by earlier generations. With continued support, the Historic American Buildings Survey and its sister project, HAER, will carry on their mission, tracing the changing shape of American architecture and engineering.

AMENDMENT NO. 2227

At the request of Mr. COHEN, the names of the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN), the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. MATSUNAGA), and the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) were added as cosponsors of amendment No. 2227 intended to be proposed to S. 1887, an original bill to extend the Federal supplemental compensation program for 18 months, and for other purposes.

SENATE RESOLUTION 231—RELATING TO THE ENFORCEMENT OF THE ANTITRUST LAWS

Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. DOLE, Mr. SIMPSON, and Mr. EAST) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 231

Whereas the Congress in 1890 enacted the Sherman Act to prohibit "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations . . .";

Whereas the United States Supreme Court has held that vertical price restraints are per se violations of the Sherman Act;

Whereas in 1975 the Congress repealed portions of the Miller-Tydings Act and the McGuire Act authorizing State laws permitting "fair-trade" restrictions;

Whereas consumers benefit from vigorous price competition at the retail level and could be injured by vertical price-fixing comspiracies;

Whereas the United States Attorney General is charged with instituting proceedings to prevent and restrain violations of the antitrust laws: and whereas other Federal agencies and offices have responsibilities relating to these laws;

Whereas the Solicitor General of the United States Department of Justice, on behalf of the United States, has filed an amicus curiae brief with the Supreme Court which, in part, advocates changing vertical price restraint actions from a per se to a "rule of reason" violation of the antitrust laws; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the United States Attorney General and all other appropriate Federal agencies and officials shall faithfully enforce the Federal antitrust laws, and should, at the earliest available opportunity, undertake to fully explain to Members of Congess the policies of the United States with respect to litigation relating to vertical price restraints.

SENATE RESOLUTION 232—HONORING CARL YASTRZEMSKI OF THE BOSTON RED SOX

Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and Mr. TSONGAS) submitted the following resolution, which was ordered placed on the calendar:

S. RES. 232

Whereas Carl Yastrzemski will soon complete his twenty-third and final season as a baseball player for the Boston Red Sox;

Whereas Carl Yastrzemski has played in more major league baseball games than any other player in the history of the sport;

Whereas "Captain Carl" won baseball's honored triple crown and led his Cardiac Kids to the "Impossible Dream" of an American League Pennant in 1967;

Whereas Yaz will be remembered always as one of the finest players in baseball history and a leader of great compassion and ability both on and off the field.

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States of America joins with the people of Massachusetts and sport fans throughout the world in honoring Carl Yastrzemski for his outstanding career, his outstanding sportsmanship, and his outstanding contribution to baseball and the nation.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

BYRD (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 2231

Mr. BYRD (for himself, Mr. NUNN, Mr. CHILES, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. DIXON, Mr. EXON, Mr. FORD, Mr. GLENN, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SASSER, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. DODD, Mr. PELL, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. PRYOR, and Mr. HOLLINGS)

proposed an amendment to the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159) to authorize the further participation of U.S. Armed Forces in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon; as follows:

SECTION 1. The Congress finds that—

(a) Starting on August 29, 1983, the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Peacekeeping Force in Lebanon were introduced into hostilites or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities were clearly indicated by the circumstances as provided for in section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution;

(b) Not later than August 31, 1983, a report from the President was required to be submitted by the President to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate pursuant to section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution, which was required to include the following information:

(1) The circumstances necessitating the introduction of the United States Armed Forces into Lebanon;

(2) The constitutional and legislative authority for the introduction of the United States Armed Forces into Lebanon; and

(3) The estimated scope and duration of the hostilities, or of the imminent involvement of the United States Armed Forces in hostilities.

Sec. 2. Not later than 48 hours after the enactment of this resolution, the President, as required by section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution, shall submit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate a report containing the information required by paragraphs (A)-(C) of section 4(a) of the War Powers Resolution, together with the following additional information:

(a) A description of the specific goals of United States policy in Lebanon;

(b) A description of the specific roles and missions of the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Peacekeeping Force in Lebanon, including the governing rules of engagement for fulfilling the goals of United States policy in Lebabon; and

(c) A description of the specific criteria that are being applied to determine when the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Peacekeeping Force in Lebanon have successfully accomplished the roles and missions described in clause (b).

Sec. 3. Pursuant to section 5(b)(2) of the War Powers Resolution, the 60-day period specified in section 5(b) of such Resolution is hereby extended for 60 days from the date of enactment of this resolution, provided that the President complies with the requirements of Section 2 of this resolution.

Sec. 4. Nothing in this resolution modifies, limits, or supercedes any provision of the War Powers Resolution of the requirement of Section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, relating to Congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of the United States Armed Forces in Lebanon.

NATIONAL RAILROAD PASSENGER CORPORATION AUTHORIZATION

GORTON (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 2232

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. GORTON (for himself, Mr. KASTEN, and Mr. MELCHER) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill (S. 1117) to amend the Rail Passenger Service Act to authorize additional appropriations for the National Railroad Passenger Corporation, and for other purposes; as follows:

On page 8, after line 5, add the following new section:

SEC. 9. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b), that portion of the May 2, 1983 Order of the Interstate Commerce Commission in Ex Parte No. 346 (Sub. No. 8) which authorizes the imposition of empty mileage charges and reclaim of car hire payments (sections 1039.14(c) (1) and (2) of title 49, Code of Federal Regulations) shall not take effect until after the completion of judicial review in the Court of Appeals.

(b) Subsection (a) shall not apply to any boxcar bearing the reporting marks of any rail carrier (including all rail carriers owned or controlled by such rail carrier) having gross railway operating revenues in excess of $500 million per year as reported in the latest annual report or reports of such rail carrier to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

(c) The enactment of this section shall not be construed as an expression of Congressional approval or disapproval of such Order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and shall not be construed to create any presumption of validity or invalidity with respect to such order.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a brief description of the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the description was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF THE AMENDMENT

Subsection (a) postpones the effective date of the car hire portion of the ICC's May 2, 1983 Order in Ex Parte No. 346 (Sub. No. 8) until completion of judicial review of the Order by the United States Court of Appeals.

Subsection (b) provides that boxcars bearing the reporting marks of any rail carrier (including all the railroads owned or controlled by the rail carrier) having gross railway operating revenues in excess of $500 million per year as reported in the latest annual report or reports of such rail carrier to the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be subject to the imposition of empty mileage charges and reclaim of car hire payments. The largest nine rail carriers in the United States have operating revenues in excess of $500 million when all their railroad operations are aggregated; these rail carriers should have sufficient economic leverage to protect themselves during the pendency of judicial review of that portion of the Order stayed under subsection (a) of the amendment.

Subsection (c) provides that this section shall not be construed as an expression of Congressional approval or disapproval of the ICC's Order, nor shall it be construed as creating a presumption of validity or invalidity of the Order.

EAGLETON AMENDMENT NO. 2233

Mr. EAGLETON proposed an amendment to the joint resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 159, supra, as follows:

On page 5, line 4, strike out "protective" and insert "defensive".

On page 5, between lines 14 and 15, insert the following;

(1) the results of efforts to secure removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon and to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory;

On page 5, line 15, strike out "(1)" and insert "(2)".

On page 5, line 17, strike out "(2)" and insert "(3)".

On page 5, line 21, strike out "(3)" and insert "(4)".

On page 5, line 23, strike out "(4)" and insert "(5)".

On page 6, line 3, strike out "(5)" and insert "(6)".

On page 7, line 1, strike out "(3)" and insert "(4)".

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1983

KASTEN AMENDMENTS NO. 2234 AND NO. 2235

Mr. KASTEN proposed two amendments to the bill (S. 1714) to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act to provide authorization of appropriations, and for other purposes, as follows:

On page 26, line 4, strike "SEC. 13." and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 14."; and insert the following immediately after line 2:

CONGRESSIONAL REVIEW OF RULES

SEC. 13. (a) The Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. 41 et seq.) is amended by inserting after section 26, as added by section 10 of this Act, the following new section:

"SEC. 27. (a)(1) On the day the Commission forwards to the Federal Register for publication a recommended final rule, the Commission shall transmit a copy of such rule to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives. The Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives are authorized to receive a recommended final rule under this subsection whether the appropriate House is in session, stands in adjournment or is in recess.

"(2) On the day on which the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives receive a recommended final rule, the Secretary and the Clerk shall transmit a copy of such rule to the appropriate committees.

"(b)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no recommended final rule may become effective until the expiration of a period of thirty days after the date on which such rule is received by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives. If before the expiration of such thirty-day period, either appropriate committee ordered reported or is discharged from consideration of a joint resolution with respect to such rule, such rule may not become effective until the earlier of—

"(A) the expiration of a period of sixty days beginning on the date on which the committee ordered reported or is discharged from consideration of such joint resolution, except that such rule may not become effective under this subparagraph if within such sixty-day period a joint resolution with respect to such rule has become law;

"(B) any time after either House of Congress has rejected a joint resolution with respect to such rule; or

"(C) the adjournment of Congress sine die at the end of a Congress, except that such rule may not become effective under this subparagraph if—

"(i) a period of thirty days has not expired since the date on which such rule was received by the appropriate committees; and

"(ii) within such thirty-day period, a joint resolution with respect to such rule has become law.

"(2) For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) the term 'days' means only days of continuous session of Congress;

"(B) continuity of session is broken only by an adjournment sine die at the end of a Congress; and

"(C) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment or recess to a day certain shall be excluded in the computation of days of continuous session of Congress for the thirty-day period referred to in this subsection if the adjournment is for more than three days, and shall be excluded in such computation for the sixty-day period referred to in this subsection if the adjournment is for more than fifteen days.

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any final rule subject to this section shall be considered a recommendation of the Commission to the Congress and shall have no force and effect as a rule unless such rule has become effective in accordance with this section.

"(d) Whenever an appropriate committee reports a joint resolution pursuant to this section, the resolution shall be accompanied by a committee report specifying the reasons for the committee's action.

"(e) Congressional inaction on, or rejection of, any resolution of disapproval concerning a rule shall not be deemed an expression of approval of the rule involved. The compliance of the Commission with the requirements of this section, including any determination by the Commission under this section, shall not be subject to judicial review of any kind.

"(f)(1) If a recommended final rule of the Commission is disapproved under this section, the Commission may issue a recommended final rule which relates to the same acts or practices as the disapproved rule. Such recommended final rule—

"(A) shall be based upon—

"(i) the rulemaking record of the recommended final rule disapproved by the Congress; or

"(ii) such rulemaking record and the record established in supplemental rulemaking proceedings conducted by the Commission, in accordance with section 553 of title 5, United States Code, in any case in which the Commission determines that it is necessary to supplement the existing rulemaking record; and

"(B) may reflect such changes as the Commission considers necessary or appropriate, including such changes as may be appropriate in light of congressional debate and consideration of the resolution of disapproval with respect to the rule.

"(2) After issuing a recommended final rule under this subsection, the Commission shall transmit such rule to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with subsection (a)(1) of this section, and such rule shall only become effective in accordance with this section.

"(g) The provisions of this subsection, subsections (a)(2), (d) through (k) of this section are enacted by Congress—

"(1) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectively, and as such they are deemed a part of the rules of each House, respectively, but applicable only with respect to the procedure to be followed in that House in the case of joint resolutions, and they supersede other rules only to the extent that they are inconsistent therewith; and

"(2) with full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change the rules (so far as relating to the procedure of that House) at any time, in the same manner and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of that House.

"(h) Except as provided in subsection (k) of this section, joint resolutions shall, upon introduction or receipt from the other House of Congress, be immediately referred by the presiding officer of the Senate or the House of Representatives to the appropriate committee of the Senate or the House of Representatives, as the case may be.

"(i)(1)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B) of this paragraph, if the committee to which a joint resolution has been referred does not report such resolution within 20 days of continuous session of Congress after the date of transmittal to the Congress of the recommended final rule to which such joint resolution relates, it shall be in order to move to discharge the committee from further consideration of such resolution.

"(B) If the committee to which a joint resolution transmitted from the other House has been referred does not report such resolution within 30 days after the date of transmittal of such resolution from the other House, it shall be in order to move to discharge such committee from further consideration of such resolution.

"(2) Any motion to discharge under paragraph (1) of this subsection must be supported in writing by one-fifth of the Members, duly chosen and sworn, of the House of Congress involved, and is highly privileged in the House and privileged in the Senate (except that it may not be made after a joint resolution has been reported with respect to the same rule); and debate thereon shall be limited to not more than one hour, the time to be divided in the House of Representatives equally between those favoring and those opposing the motion to discharge and to be divided in the Senate equally between, and controlled by, the majority leader and the minority leader, or their designees. An amendment to the motion is not in order.

"(j)(1) Except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection, consideration of a joint resolution shall be in accord with the rules of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, respectively.

"(2) When a committee has reported or has been discharged from further consideration of a joint resolution, or when the companion joint resolution from the other House has been placed on the calendar of the first House, it shall be in order, notwithstanding the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate or any other rule of the Senate or the House of Representatives, at any time thereafter (even though a previous motion to the same effect has been disagreed to) to move to proceed to the immediate consideration of either such joint resolution. The motion is highly privileged in the House and privileged in the Senate and is not debatable. An amendment to the motion is not in order.

"(3) Debate on a joint resolution shall be limited to not more than two hours (except that when one House has debated the joint resolution of that House, the companion joint resolution of the other House shall not be debatable), which shall be divided in the House of Representatives equally between those favoring and those opposing the resolution and which shall be divided in the Senate equally between, and controlled by, the majority leader and the minority leader, or their designees. A motion further to limit debate is not in order. An amendment to, or motion to recommit, the joint resolution is not in order. A motion to reconsider shall be in order only on the day on which occurs the vote of adoption of the joint resolution, and shall not be debatable. Any other motions shall be decided without debate.

"(k) If a joint resolution has been ordered reported or discharged from the committee of the House to which it was referred, and that House receives a joint resolution with respect to the same rule from the other House, the resolution of disapproval of the other House shall be placed on the appropriate calendar of the first House. If, prior to the disposition of a joint resolution of one House, that House receives a joint resolution with respect to the same rule from the other House, the vote in the first House shall occur on the joint resolution of the other House.

"(l) For purposes of this section—

"(1) The term 'appropriate committee' means either the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives or the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate, as the case may be.

"(2) The term 'rule' means any rule promulgated by the Commission pursuant to this Act, other than any rule promulgated under section 18(a)(1)(A) of this Act and any interpretive or procedural rule.

"(3) The term 'joint resolution' means a joint resolution the matter after the resolving clause of which is as follows: 'That the Senate and the House of Representatives disapprove the rule entitled , transmitted to the Congress by the Federal Trade Commission on , 19 .', the blank spaces being filled with the appropriate title of the rule and the date of transmittal of the rule to the Congress, respectively.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) of this section shall be effective on the date of enactment of this Act, except that any rule promulgated by the Federal Trade Commission after June 23, 1983 and before such date of enactment shall be transmitted by the Federal Trade Commission on the date of enactment of this Act to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with subsection (a)(1) of section 27 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as added by subsection (a) of this section. Any such rule shall have no force and effect except in accordance with such section 27.

OFFICE OF GOVERNMENT ETHICS AUTHORIZATION

COHEN (AND LEVIN) AMENDMENT NO. 2236

Mr. BAKER (for Mr. COHEN, for himself, and Mr. LEVIN) proposed an amendment to the House amendment to the bill (S. 461) to extend the authorization of appropriations for the Office of Government Ethics for 5 years, as follows:

In lieu of the language inserted by the House insert the following:

AMENDMENTS TO ETHICS IN GOVERNMENT ACT OF 1978

SECTION 1. Except as otherwise expressly provided in this Act, whenever an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978.

FIVE YEAR TERM FOR AND REMOVAL OF THE DIRECTOR

SEC. 2. Section 401(b) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Effective with respect to any individual appointed or reappointed by the President as Director on or after October 1, 1983, the term of service of the Director shall be five years. Upon removal of the Director prior to the expiration of his term, the President shall communicate in writing the reasons for such removal to the Committees of the Senate and the House exercising jurisdiction over this Act."

AUTHORITY TO ISSUE REGULATIONS

SEC. 3. (a) Section 402(a) is amended by striking out ", under the general supervision of the Office of Personnel Management,".

(b) Section 402(b) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1)—

(A) by striking out "and recommending to the Office of Personnel Management"; and

(B) by striking out "President or the Office of Personnel Management" and inserting in lieu thereof "President or the Director";

(2) in paragraph (2)—

(A) by striking out "and recommending to the Office of Personnel Management"; and

(B) by striking out "President or the Office of Personnel Management" and inserting in lieu thereof "President or the Director";

(3) in paragraph (6) by striking out "Office of Personnel Management" and inserting in lieu thereof "Director";

(4) in paragraph (12) by striking out "Office of Personnel Management" and inserting in lieu thereof "Director"; and

(5) in paragraph (15) by striking out "and recommending for promulgation by the Office of Personnel Management" and inserting in lieu thereof "and promulgating".

(c) Section 404 is amended by striking out "Office of Personnel Management" and inserting in lieu thereof "President or the Director".

(d) (1) Any rules or regulations issued under section 402 of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978 which are in effect immediately before the effective date of the amendments made by this Act shall remain in effect according to their terms until modified, superseded, set aside, or revoked on or after such effective date.

(2) The responsibilities of the Director of the Office of Government Ethics under paragraphs (6) and (12), respectively, of section 402(b) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, with respect to rules and regulations issued by the Office of Personnel Management before the effective date of the amendments made by this Act shall not be affected by this Act or any of the amendments made by this Act.

SEPARATE BUDGET LINE ITEM FOR OFFICE OF GOVERNMENT ETHICS

SEC. 4. Title IV is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SUBMISSION OF BUDGET

"SEC. 407. (a) In the budget submitted to the Congress pursuant to section 1105(a) of title 31, United States Code, the President shall include estimated expenditures and proposed appropriations the President decides are necessary to support the Office of Government Ethics in the fiscal year for which the budget is submitted and the four fiscal years after that year.

"(b) In the statement of changes submitted to Congress with respect to the budget pursuant to section 1106(b) of title 31, United States Code, the President shall specify the effect of such changes on the information submitted pursuant to subsection (a) of this section.".

REQUEST ASSISTANCE FROM INSPECTORS GENERAL

SEC. 5. Section 403 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: "The authority of the Director under this section includes that authority to request assistance from the inspector general of an agency in conducting investigations pursuant to subsections (b)(3) and (b)(4) of section 402.".

RECOMMEND REDESIGNATION OF AGENCY ETHICS OFFICIAL

SEC. 6. Section 402(b) is amended by—

(1) striking out "and" at the end of clause (14);

(2) striking out the period at the end of clause (15) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(3) adding at the end thereof the following:

"(16) recommending the redesignation of an agency ethics official where such official fails to properly and effectively perform his or her duties.".

OGE REVIEW OF FINANCIAL DISCLOSURE REPORTS OF HIGH LEVEL WHITE HOUSE AIDES

SEC. 7. Section 203(c) is amended by adding after "designated agency officials," the following: "employees described in section 105(a)(2) (A) or (B), 106(a)(1) (A) or (B), or 107(a)(1)(A) or (B)(1)(A)(i), of title 3, United States Code,".

LIMIT ON OUTSIDE EARNED INCOME FOR HIGH LEVEL WHITE HOUSE AIDES

SEC. 8. Section 210 is amended to read as follows:

"OUTSIDE EARNED INCOME

SEC. 210. Except where the employee's agency or department shall have more restrictive limitations on outside earned income, all employees covered by this title—

"(1) who are compensated at a pay grade in the General Schedule of grade GS-16 or above and who occupy nonjudicial full-time positions, appointments to which are required to be made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or

"(2) employees of the White House Office who are compensated at rates equivalent to level II of the Executive Schedule under section 5313 of title 5, United States Code, may not have in any calendar year outside earned income attributable to such calendar year which is in excess of fifteen percent of their salary.".

REPORTS BY PRESIDENTIAL NOMINEES

SEC. 9. Section 201(b) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" immediately after "(b)";

(2) by inserting after the first sentence the following: "Such individual shall, not later than the date of the first hearing to consider the nomination of such individual, make current the report filed pursuant to this paragraph by filing the information required by section 202(a)(1)(A) with respect to income and honoraria received as of the date which occurs five days before the date of such hearing."; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) An individual whom the President or the President-elect has publicly announced he intends to nominate to a position may file the report required by paragraph (1) at any time after that public announcement but not later than is required under the first sentence of such paragraph.".

ETHICS AGREEMENTS

SEC. 10. Title II is amended—

(1) by redesignating section 211 as section 212; and

(2) by inserting after section 210 the following new section:

"NOTICE OF ACTIONS TAKEN TO COMPLY WITH ETHICS AGREEMENTS

"SEC. 211. (a) In any case in which an individual agrees with that individual's designated agency official, the Office of Government Ethics, or a Senate confirmation committee to take any action to comply with this Act or any other law or regulation governing conflicts of interest of, or establishing standards of conduct applicable with respect to, officers or employees of the Government, that individual shall notify in writing the designated agency official, the Office of Government Ethics, or the appropriate committee of the Senate, as the case may be, of any action taken by the individual pursuant to that agreement. Such notification shall be made not later than the date specified in the agreement by which action by the individual must be taken, or not later than three months after the date of the agreement, if no date for action is so specified.

"(b) If an agreement described in subsection (a) requires that the individual recuse himself or herself from particular categories of agency or other official action, the individual shall reduce to writing those subjects regarding which the recusal agreement will apply and the process by which it will be determined whether the individual must recuse himself or herself in a specific instance. An individual shall be considered to have complied with the requirements of subsection (a) with respect to such recusal agreement if such individual files a copy of the document setting forth the information described in the preceding sentence with such individual's designated agency official, the Office of Government Ethics, or the appropriate committee of the Senate, as the case may be, within the time prescribed in the last sentence of subsection (a).".

BLIND TRUST AMENDMENTS

SEC. 11. Sections 102(e)(7), 202(f)(7), and 302(f)(7) are each amended to read as follows:

"(7) Any trust may be considered to be a qualified blind trust if—

"(A) the trust instrument is amended to comply with the requirements of paragraph (3) or, in the case of a trust instrument which does not by its terms permit amendment, the trustee, the reporting individual, and any other interested party agree in writing that the trust shall be administered in accordance with the requirements of this subsection and the trustee of such trust meets the requirements of paragraph (3)(A); except that in the case of any interested party who is a dependent child, a parent or guardian of such child may execute the agreement referred to in this subparagraph;

"(B) a copy of the trust instrument (except testamentary provisions) and a copy of the agreement referred to in subparagraph (A), and a list of the assets held by the trust at the time of approval by the supervising ethics office, including the category of value of each asset as determined under subsection (d) of this section, are filed with such office and made available to the public as provided under paragraph (5)(D) of this subsection; and

"(C) the supervising ethics office determines that approval of the trust arrangement as a qualified blind trust is in the particular case appropriate to assure compliance with applicable laws and regulations.".

(b) Sections 102(e)(5)(A), 202(f)(5)(A), and 302(f)(5)(A) are each amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"This subparagraph shall not apply with respect to a trust meeting the requirements for being considered a qualified blind trust under paragraph (7) of this subsection."

APPLICATION OF FINANCIAL DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS TO STAFF OF FEDERAL ADVISORY COMMITTEES

SEC. 12. Section 201 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(j) (1) Any individual who performs staff functions in support of an advisory committee which is composed, in whole or in part, of spec! . Government employees shall be subject to the provisions of this title as if that individual were such a special Government employee.

"(2) For purposes of paragraph (1)—

"(A) the term 'advisory committee' means any committee, board, commission, council, conference, panel, task force, or other similar group which is established—

"(i) by statute or reorganization plan,

"(ii) by the President, or

"(iii) by one or more agencies, in the interest of obtaining advice or recommendations for the President or one or more agencies or officers of the Federal Government; such term includes any subcommittee or other subgroup of an advisory committee, but does not include the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations and the Commission on Government Procurement;

"(B) the term 'staff functions in support of an advisory committee' means such activities as the Director of the Office of Government Ethics by regulation prescribes which are carried out with respect to those functions for which the advisory committee was established as described in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;

"(C) the term 'special Government employee' has the meaning given that term by section 202 of title 18, United States Code; and

"(D) the term 'agency' has the meaning given that term by section 551(1) of title 5, United States Code.

"(3) The Director of the Office of Government Ethics shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out this subsection.".

EXTENSION OF AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 13. Section 405 is amended in paragraph (2) by striking out "four" and inserting in lieu thereof "nine".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 14. The amendments made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1983.

Amend the title so as to read "To amend the Ethics in Government Act of 1978 to make certain changes in the authority of the Office of Government Ethics, and for other purposes.".

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, September 29, 1983, in order to receive testimony concerning the following nominations:

Mr. Sherman E. Unger, of Ohio, to be U.S. Circuit Judge for the Federal Circuit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON WATER AND POWER

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Water and Power of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, September 29, at 10 a.m., to hold a hearing to consider S. 1811 and H.R. 71, bills to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Interior to engage in a special study of the potential for ground water recharge in the High Plains States, and for other purposes; and S. 1590, to clarify the contractual authority of the Secretary of the Interior to deliver water to the North Platte Irrigation District project.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT AFFAIRS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Governmental Affairs be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, September 29, to continue markup on S. 121, the trade bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON PREPAREDNESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Preparedness of the Committee on Armed Services be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, September 29, to receive testimony from the Department of the Navy, on Naval Petroleum and Oil Shale Reserves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PERMANENT SUBCOMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, September 29, at 10 a.m., to hold a hearing on the Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees International Union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

TAX INDEXING: A PROFOUND AND NEEDED CHANGE

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if any of my colleagues doubt that tax indexing is one of the most important changes in the Tax Code then I urge them to read "Tax Indexing: A Profound and Needed Change" in the July edition of Tax Advisor.

The two authors of this article, Jack O. Nutter and George A. Pieler, thoughtfully explain the history of the 1981 tax indexing provision and analyze its merits. I agree with their conclusion:

It should be clear that indexing income taxes is not merely an issue of tax policy. It is a major and fundamental issue of fiscal policy, of how Congress and the President manage government finances and try to influence the course of the economy. From that perspective, the question becomes one of accountability. Many proponents view indexing as requiring an explicit choice: Should the government resort to a mechanism that raises taxes automatically, while taking political credit for the expenditure of those revenues, or should the will to spend be matched by the will to take the explicit actions needed to raise an appropriate amount of revenues. . .

Thus, the fate of indexing is directly linked to the question of whether the American economy will move toward stable recovery or will return to the inflation and interest rate "roller coaster" in the future. No more important question awaits the 98th Congress.

I urge my colleagues to read this fine article, which I ask be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

TAX INDEXING: A PROFOUND AND NEEDED CHANGE

(By Jack O. Nutter II and George A. Pieler)

INTRODUCTION

In August, 1981, Congress passed the largest tax cut in American history. H.R. 4242, the Economic Recovery Tax Act (ERTA),[1] was designed to reduce the tax burden on the American taxpayer by $750 billion over five years and to restore incentives for individual initiative and business investment. Close on the heels of the 1981 tax rate reductions, Congress passed legislation, in 1982, to reduce the mounting federal deficit by raising a total of $98.3 billion in new revenues over three years through a myriad of cutbacks in tax preferences, new enforcement procedures and use-related taxes.[2] Despite the debate about "enhancing" revenues to cut the deficit, Congress left intact the provision of ERTA that prevents inflation from generating automatic, unlegislated tax increases year after year.[3] The new tax indexing provision, which takes effect in 1985, is a major departure from past policy. Indexing will safeguard taxpayers from bracket creep and prevent Congress from periodically declaring that it has cut taxes when it passes legislation that actually does nothing to reduce the real tax burden. This article will examine the history of the 1981 tax indexing provision, analyze the merits of indexing the progressive rate structure and discuss other issues relating to tax indexation.

"TAXFLATION" AS A POLITICAL PROBLEM

In recent decades, inflation has plagued the American economy in varying degrees and in different forms. In the 1960s, unrestrained demand pushed up the general price levels. Price increases accelerated in the 1970s, and were joined by rising unemployment in a new phenomenon labeled "stagflation." The economic and political response to the OPEC embargo, coupled with steadily rising government spending, helped bring inflation into the double-digit range. By the end of the 1970s, accelerating inflation clearly threatened the social and economic welfare of the nation. It also introduced a new word into the American political vocabulary: taxflation.

As a political term, taxflation describes how increases in the general level of prices and wages affect our progressive tax system. The concern about the political and economic effects of taxflation ultimately led to the enactment of tax indexing, one of the most fundamental tax reforms ever adopted by Congress.

DISTORTION CAUSED BY INFLATION

Milton Friedman has discussed the political implications of inflation, calling it "a hidden tax that at first appears painless or even pleasant, and above all . . . a tax that can be imposed without specific legislation." Dr. Friedman characterized the effect of inflation on our tax system as "taxation without representation."[4]

Inflation distorts our progressive tax system in two profound ways. First, a taxpayer whose nominal income rises in the course of sustained inflation is subject to higher effective tax rates because part of his nominal income is shifted into a higher rate bracket while real purchasing power remains unchanged.[5] Three separate factors interact to cause this problem. First, as nominal income increases within a particular tax bracket, more of that income is subject to the marginal rate in that bracket, causing the average tax rate to rise. Secondly, as a taxpayer moves into the next tax bracket, a higher marginal tax becomes effective, raising the average tax rate. Finally, fixed dollar amounts in the Code, such as the $1,000 personal exemption, become less significant. As nominal income increases, fixed dollar amounts, as a share of total income, decline and the proportion of income that is subject to tax increases.

As inflation causes more of a taxpayer's income to be taxed at higher and higher marginal rates, but with no increase in real purchasing power, the taxpayer's standard of living declines because a greater proportion of income is being paid in taxes. For example, before ERTA, a family of four earning $17,889 paid $1,670 in federal income taxes in 1979, or 9.3 percent of its income. With an inflation rate of 13.3 percent in 1979, and wage increases to keep up with inflation, the family earned $20,304 in 1980, and maintained its real purchasing power. With a tax payment of $2,062 in 1980, or an effective tax rate of 10.1 percent, however, the family experienced a decline in real spendable income.

The second way that inflation distorts the tax system involves the measurement of real income from capital. Here, the problem occurs because the tax system, in measuring income subject to tax, does not take into account the declining purchasing power of the dollar. Measuring real income is a simple concept in theory, but its application to the Internal Revenue Code can be very complicated.

A simple example illustrates the "income definition" problem. An individual who bought a home three years ago for $30,000 and sells it for $50,000 in 1983 has a $20,000 taxable capital gain. A significant portion of the increase in the selling price is likely to reflect inflation: If the inflation rate over the period between the purchase and sale of the asset was 20 percent, the real gain is only $14,000, and the remaining $6,000 of the price increase is attributable to inflation. Tax is imposed on the entire gain, however, as measured by the nominal increase in value.

Each of these distortions principally benefits the federal Treasury. Although estimates of the exact impact of inflation on aggregate tax revenues vary, the amounts of new taxes raised are significant. A study by George M. Von Furstenberg, former senior staff economist at the Council of Economic Advisors, indicated that "bracket creep" raises aggregate federal revenues by more than 16 percent for each 10 percent increase in inflation.[6] In a 1975 study, the congressional Joint Economic Committee estimated that a 10 percent inflation rate increases tax revenues by 14.7 percent.[7] Dr. Emil Sunley, at that time a Treasury official, testified in 1978 that "the elasticity of the income tax with respect to inflation is about 1.5 (percent); that is, tax receipts rise 1½ times as fast as the rate of inflation."[8]

Many economists and policymakers maintain that, to be fair and equitable, a tax system should be inflation-neutral. These commentators view tax indexing as a long-awaited reform whose time has come.[9] Inflation distortion and the resulting real tax increases can be eliminated substantially by automatically adjusting certain provisions of the Code in direct proportion to rises in the general price level. By periodically adjusting the personal exemption amount,[10] the zero bracket amount,[11] and the upper and lower limits of each tax bracket (width),[12] the "real" increases in current dollar tax liability caused by inflation can be minimized.[13] This is the approach adopted in the indexing provision of ERTA.

HISTORY OF LEGISLATIVE INITIATIVES

It took a long and persistent struggle to enact tax indexing. Most tax indexing proposals, including the ERTA provision, offered straightforward remedies to the taxflation problem by adjusting fixed dollar amounts in the Code. The economic and political consequences of tax indexing have still generated controversy. To understand this controversy, and to appreciate how far the indexing concept has advanced, it is important to examine early congressional action.

Sen. James L. Buckley first proposed tax indexing in an amendment to the Tax Reduction Act of 1975.[14] The Buckley amendment provided for a yearly inflation ajustment to the income tax tables in Sec. 1, based on the increase in the Consumer Price Index. During a brief Senate debate, Sen. Russell Long, Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and floor manager of the bill, warned his fellow Senate colleagues that the amendment "would mean that in future years when inflation occurs Congress will find it necessary to raise taxes or to cut spending."[15] The Buckley amendment was defeated by a substantial margin.[16]

The Senate confronted indexing again the next year, during consideration of the Tax Reform Act of 1976. Sen. Robert Taft proposed an amendment to index the personal exemption, the then standard deduction, the low-income allowance and each tax bracket.[17] Senate opposition was apparently based on the political attractiveness of being able to generate revenues through inflation, and the political difficulty of being required to vote for higher taxes. The Taft amendment was also defeated.[18]

After the sound rejections in 1975 and 1976, the prospects for tax indexing appeared dim, a view that was confirmed when an amendment to the Tax Reduction and Simplification Act of 1977, similar to the initiatives in the prior two years, was rejected by the Senate.[19] However, 1978 marked the beginning year of a "tax revolt" when ideas such as tax indexing began to be taken seriously.

Early in 1978, Sen. Robert Dole, then a member and now chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, introduced a bill that attracted considerable attention because of its comprehensive and balanced approach to the problem of taxes and inflation.[20] The Dole legislation proposed to index most of the significant fixed dollar amounts in the Code used to determine individual income tax rates, exemptions, deductions and credits. The bill also included adjustments for the unified credit for estate and gift taxes and the annual gift taxes and the annual gift tax exclusion. In addition, unlike earlier proposals, inflation adjustments for business income tax provisions were proposed, including a basis adjustment to eliminate the tax inflation on capital gains and adjustments in the graduated corporate rate schedule.

The Dole bill differed from earlier proposals in several other respects: it provided an annual inflation adjustment equal to only two-thirds of the increase in the Consumer Price Index. In addition, the President was given the authority to suspend these automatic inflation adjustments, subject to a Senate or House veto, if the President determined that the adjustments would have a substantial adverse effect on the domestic economy.[21]

Public hearings held on the Dole proposal in April, 1978,[22] represented the first time that a congressional tax-writing committee seriously addressed the indexing issue. Several events in that year gave credibility and momentum to tax indexing. First, in its proposed tax cut submitted to Congress in January, the Carter Administration recommended increasing the progressivity of the tax system. The Administration's proposals, like past bills, did not evenly compensate all taxpayers for the effects of inflation.[23] Secondly, a Republican proposal to cut marginal tax rates a total of 33⅓ percent over a three-year period was receiving considerable attention.[24] This early proposal by Sen. William Roth and Rep. Jack Kemp, the precursor of the rate cuts adopted in ERTA, seemed to focus national attention on the tax burden. In addition, inflation was accelerating: During early 1978, the inflation rate began to reach the annual double-digit levels that erupted in full force in 1979 and 1980. Finally, the "tax revolt" movement was sweeping the country. With the passage of Proposition 13, a California ballot initiative to cut property taxes, policymakers increasingly advocated cutting taxes and reducing the role of government.

Although the Dole indexing proposal received considerable attention in the Senate, the first congressional acceptance of indexing came during the House Ways and Means Committee consideration of the Revenue Act of 1978. The Committee rejected a proposal to begin indexing fixed dollar amounts in the Code, but approved a proposal to adjust the capital gains tax for inflation.[25] The Ways and Means Committee bill also differed from the Carter Administration proposal on the question of the tax rate structure. The Committee did not explicitly endorse indexing fixed dollar amounts, but the bill did recognize the concept of taxflation and indexing by increasing the tax bracket widths to "approximate the automatic adjustments which would occur under indexing." [26]

After the '78 Act passed the House, a bipartisan coalition of senators offered a proposal in the Senate to index the personal exemption, the zero bracket amount, and the rate brackets for four years.[27] Although the coalition indexing amendment was eventually defeated, the proponents of the amendment felt that progress had been made. Indexing was no longer a partisan issue, and the coalition amendment received more votes than the widely publicized Roth-Kemp tax cut measure.[28] The Senate considered indexing on two more occasions before its passage in ERTA, but the basic groundwork was established in 1978.

THE ERTA PROVISION

The momentum from these earlier efforts carried over, into the 97th Congress, and in the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981, Congress addressed the effects of inflation on the federal tax system. Congress acted, on a bipartisan basis, to provide a sustained adjustment for past inflation—the 5-10-10 percent sequence of individual rate reductions—and also agreed to preserve this lower rate structure through an inflation adjustment beginning in 1985. Indexing the individual rate structure is a major reversal of past congressional policy: Congress can no longer make future ad hoc adjustments for inflation and characterize them as tax cuts. Instead, future tax reductions and tax increases will have to be undertaken explicitly.

The indexing provision of ERTA is straightforward. Section 104 of ERTA provides inflation adjustments for the minimum and maximum dollar amounts for each marginal rate bracket, the zero bracket amount and the fixed-dollar amount of the personal exemption. The amount of the future inflation adjustments will depend on the percentage increase in the Consumer Price Index (CPI) for all urban consumers for the fiscal year most recently ended. For example, the rate brackets that will apply in calendar year 1985 will incorporate an inflation adjustment based on the percentage increase in the CPI in fiscal year 1984 (from October, 1983, through September, 1984). The percentage increase will be determined by comparing the average of the CPI level during fiscal year 1984 with the average during fiscal year 1983. The same computation will be made for each succeeding taxable year, with fiscal year 1983 as the base year.

Accordingly, the "bracket creep" phenomenon that has caused higher nominal incomes to be taxed at higher marginal rates and increased effective tax rates will be substantially eliminated beginning in 1985. In addition, indexing the personal exemption addresses one of the significant fixed-dollar amounts in the Code that has been distorted by inflation. The income definition problems created by inflation remain after ERTA, however.

The relative ease with which Congress approved tax indexing came as a surprise to many. Viewed in perspective, however, it should be remembered that the Senate had considered tax indexing six times before 1981, and rejected it only after a full debate on the issue. In addition, although tax indexing was not proposed by the Reagan Administration, it was a key element of the so-called Kemp-Roth tax reduction plan that candidate Reagan had stressed during the 1980 presidential campaign. Thus, the decision to include some form of indexing in the 1981 tax bill had been coming for some time.

GENESIS OF THE 1981 INDEXING PROVISION

On Feb. 18, 1981, President Reagan unveiled his program for economic recovery, including a multi-year plan of tax reductions for businesses and individuals. Specifically, the President asked Congress to reduce tax rates for individuals by 10 percent a year for each of three consecutive years, with the first reduction to take effect July 1, 1981. The Administration did not include an indexing provision in its tax program, but there was an express acknowledgment that the tax proposals were designed to deal with the problems caused by the interaction of inflation and the tax system. The White House noted that increases in nominal income move taxpayers into higher tax brackets, whether the increases are real or merely an adjustment for higher costs of living. As a consequence, taxes rise faster than inflation, raising average tax rates and tax burdens. The Administration's proposals were designed to "bring down average individual tax receipts to 10.8 percent of personal income in 1984," still 1.6 percentage points above the levels in 1965. Without these marginal tax rate cuts, however, individual taxes would rise to 14.7 percent of personal income by 1984. In the Administration's view, failing to provide tax reduction was "tantamount to imposing a tax increase on the average American taxpayers."[29]

Thus, the Reagan Administration proposed an across-the-board offset to bracket creep. Unlike earlier proposals, however, the offset was to be sustained over several years. In addition, the Administration also planned to reduce tax rates in real terms; the extent to which taxes would be reduced would depend on the rate of inflation over the period when the rate reductions were being phased in. At the time Congress acted on the 1981 tax bill, compromising on a 25 percent rate reduction over three years, the Administration was projecting that about 22 percent of that 25 percent would offset bracket creep and payroll rax increases already scheduled to take effect during that period.[30]

A question left unresolved by the Administration proposal was whether the reduction in tax rates would be made permanent through a mechanism to adjust the rate structure to reflect changes due to inflation. The proponents of indexing had several strong allies in Congress, including Finance Committee Chairman Robert Dole and Sen. William Armstrong, also a member of the Finance Committee. Earlier in 1981, these senators had introduced S. 1, which provided for adjustments of the individual rate brackets, the zero bracket amount and the personal exemption each year according to the change in the Consumer Price Index.

SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE ACTION

The Finance Committee began considering the Reagan tax proposals on June 18, 1981. Early agreement was reached on the basic provisions of the tax package: a 25 percent reduction in tax rates in three stages (Oct. 1, 1981, July 1, 1982 and July 1, 1983), dropping the maximum tax rate from 70 percent to 50 percent, and the adoption of the Accelerated Cost Recovery System. The Treasury Department supported these measures, and had also agreed to a number of other provisions in the tax bill in an effort to gain support for the basic tax program.

The Administration withheld support for an indexing provision, however. Sen. Armstrong with the approval of Chairman Dole, urged the Committee to adopt an indexing provision to take effect in 1985, after the sequence of individual rate reductions was completed, and beyond the three-year budget period that Congress was considering. The Administration, represented by the Treasury Department, neither actively opposed nor supported the proposal to include indexing in the 1981 bill. Instead, the Treasury suggested that the indexing issue should be left for a "second tax bill" that the Administration intended to propose later; at the same time, the Treasury Department indicated that Congress should "work its will" on this issue.

The Administration's neutral posture posed some difficulties for congressional proponents of tax indexing. Clearly, Administration support would help to assure the eventual enactment of indexing. All the same time, the opportunity to press the issue was then present, and waiting for active support from the Treasury Department could be a risky strategy. To complicate matters, most of the advocates of indexing were also strong supporters of the Administration's economic program and, by and large, did not want to push an issue that the Administration did not yet publicly advocate.

In the Finance Committee, this problem was dealt with in a subtle, but effective, fashion: The indexing proposal made by Senators Armstrong and Dole was considered and voted on, but not as an integral part of the main tax proposal the Committee was considering. Instead, indexing was to be reported out of Committee as a separate amendment, and considered on the Senate floor for inclusion in the tax bill. Using this approach, the Committee approved the separate indexing amendment by a vote of nine to five.

SENATE ADOPTS INDEXING

The tax bill was reported by the Finance Committee on June 25, 1981, and taken up on the Senate floor on July 15. On the first day of floor debate, Senator Dole "laid down" the indexing amendment on behalf of the Committee. During debate on the amendment, on July 15 and 16, supporters argued that the change was needed to make Congress accountable for its taxing decisions, to encourage restraint over the federal budget and to protect taxpayers from unlegislated tax increases. Opponents claimed that tax indexing would aggravate the deficit problem by reducing the potential revenue base and would limit the ability of Congress to "target" tax relief and manage fiscal policy.

Responding to the arguments of indexing proponents, the Senate passed the Committee amendment by a vote of 57 to 40. Because of the uncertainties of the legislative process, however, the fate of the provision was far from assured. The House Ways and Means Committee was deliberating on an alternative tax bill, and, in view of that committee's political makeup, seemed unlikely to adopt an indexing provision. Although a substitute bill supported by the Administration was to be offered as an alternative to the Ways and Means bill on the House floor, it was not clear whether, because of the Senate action, the Administration would embrace indexing as part of this substitute. It seemed likely that the indexing provision would be the subject of negotiations in the House-Senate conference on the tax bill.

The matter was resolved sooner than anticipated, however. On July 23, the Reagan Administration unveiled its substitute tax proposal to be offered on the House floor by Representatives Barber Conable and Kent Hance. The Administration substitute closely resembled the Senate tax bill, including an identical indexing provision. Following a nationwide television address by the President—in which he graphically dramatized the difference that indexing would make in sustaining tax relief—the full House of Representatives agreed to the Administration substitute. Because the indexing provisions in the House and Senate bills were identical, no Conference Committee bargaining was required. Tax indexing became law when President Reagan signed the Economic Recovery Tax Act on Aug. 13, 1981.

WHY INDEXING MATTERS

The indexing of fixed-dollar amounts in the Code accomplished by the provision in ERTA is a relatively simple process. As the legislative history demonstrates, however, it took years of effort to enact the basic concept of tax indexing. Weighty economic and political arguments have been marshalled for and against the concept.

A number of economists have characterized tax inflation as an automatic stabilizer that benefits the economy. As inflation increases, incomes rise along with federal revenues. The increasing tax load is likely to cause declines in consumer spending, which, in turn, slow the economy and inflationary pressures. Some of the assumptions behind this "fiscal drag" theory can be questioned, however, because the government is likely to spend the additional revenues generated by inflation. A more serious consideration, often overlooked, is that, in a period of high inflation and slow growth, automatic tax increases may be an unwanted drag on the economy. Furthermore, the price level does not always respond immediately to changes in the level of demand. Prices may continue to rise even after demand begins to drop off. Because of this lag, nominal income and tax rates may continue to rise, even though real income and employment are declining.[31]

Those who favor indexing argue that an indexed tax system can decrease wage demands that may give momentum to inflation. Demands for higher wages follow inflationary trends, and also reflect expectations of future inflation. Workers faced with higher taxes may attempt to maintain their previous levels of after-tax real income by seeking wage increases to compensate for higher taxes and increases in prices. Thus, in a system where taxes do not rise automatically with inflation, some moderation in wage demands may be expected.[32]

Indexing can also be viewed as a way to clarify the distribution of the tax burden. In the years before the adoption of ERTA and indexing, Congress passed a number of tax-cutting measures.[33] Despite arguments that these periodic tax cuts compensated taxpayers for inflation, there is evidence that taxpayers, as a whole, were not better off after the changes. Instead, the burden of taxation was merely shifted into different income groups. Specifically, in the intermediate brackets, where progression is relatively steep, tax reductions have usually not been sufficient to offset the effects of inflation.[34]

There is no question that periodic tax cuts are highly visible and serve an understandable political purpose. In contrast, tax indexing will require Congress to vote for tax increases if they are needed to finance new programs or reduce the deficit. According to former Sen. Buckley, this "is one of the unspoken reasons why the idea of indexation has met with such resistance." [35]

Nonetheless, proponents of indexing argue that tax cuts enacted during a period of significant inflation are illusory. As mentioned above, the Revenue Act of 1978 supported this contention. "Indexers" generally believe that Congress must be accountable for its actions; if Congress wishes to raise taxes, it should do so openly, rather than relying on inflation and capitalizing on a lack of taxpayer awareness to facilitate automatic increases.

Opponents have argued, however, that indexing the tax system is an admission of defeat in the attempt to control inflation. Indexing is viewed as encouraging individuals, institutions and politicians to seek accommodation with inflation, rather than fight it. There is less political pressure on government to avoid excessive monetary and fiscal expansion.

Dr. Friedman disagrees with this view, and argues that indexing "will make it easier (to reduce inflation) by reducing the incentive for government to inflate." [36] In other words, without a "fiscal dividend" from inflation, government has little to gain from following inflationary policies.

Other economists agree with Dr. Friedman, and suggest that the federal government has a vested interest in inflation because of the inflation-induced windfall to the Treasury that it produces, something Congress was reluctant to give up without proper gratitude from taxpayers.[37] By increasing federal revenues, inflation has given Congress the ability to create new programs or expand old ones if it does not reduce taxes. For those who favor more and larger government programs, the tax effects of inflation may seem desirable, because they reduce the need for legislative action on new taxes or tax increases. For those who want fewer and smaller government programs, this result is undesirable, and an indexed system is preferred as a way to eliminate the inflation-induced fiscal dividend, tighten fiscal discipline and promote a more careful review of real increases in government spending and of so-called tax expenditures. Of course, it remains to be seen which view will prove correct.

OTHER ISSUES IN INDEXING THE TAX LAW: DEFINITION OF INCOME

Aside from the basic problem of bracket creep, one of the most difficult issues involved with tax indexing is defining income and measuring real income from capital. The problems encountered in this area involve inventory accounting, debt instruments, depreciation and capital gains.

The lack of an adequate definition of income can have significant economic effects: Overstating taxable income from capital discourages savings and investment. Before ERTA, certain kinds of income were more heavily taxed than wage income, creating another inequity. Unfortunately, developing a fully indexed tax system to reconcile these problems would be very complicated, particularly an adjustment mechanism to take into consideration the decline in real value of debt instruments.[38]

Congress has tried to come to terms with these problems, focusing on the definition of capital gain income. A capital gain is realized when the amount received from a sale or exchange of a capital asset is greater than the adjusted basis of the property. Generally, the adjusted basis is the price of the property at acquisition adjusted upward or downward for capital improvements and depreciation.[39]

Inflation creates problems in the taxation of capital gains when nominal values increase to keep up with inflation, but the real values of property increase, decrease or remain constant. A distortion that is adverse to the taxpayer occurs when nominal values of the asset increase at a slower rate than inflation. The taxpayer may have a real capital loss, but may be taxed on an illusory capital gain. The tax system then has the effect of minimizing capital losses or converting them into capital gains.

For example, assume that a block of stock is purchased for $100 and sold for $125 after inflation has increased 20 percent. Under current law, the amount received over $100 is subject to taxes, but only the amount received over $120 is real income. If the illusory gain is compared with the real gain, the effective tax rate is multiplied. For instance, if the illusory gain is four-fifths of the total gain, as it would be if the property were sold for $125, income would be overstated five times.[40]

OVERSTATEMENT OF INCOME

A study released in 1978 detailed the extent to which excessive taxes have been collected on often illusory gains realized on the sale of common stock. The study was prepared by Martin Feldstein, now head of the Council of Economic Advisors, and Joel Slemrod, on behalf of the National Bureau of Economic Research. Based on an analysis of individual income tax returns, the authors concluded that, in 1973, individuals paid nearly $500 million in excess tax on corporate stock capital gains because of the distorting effect of inflation.[41] The study did not include partnership or fiduciary returns, however, and the full amount of the excess taxes actually collected was therefore understated.

The Feldstein-Slemrod study is particularly illuminating. The authors concluded that, in 1973, individuals paid capital gains tax on more than $4.5 billion in nominal capital gains. According to the study, if these transactions were adjusted for increases in the consumer price levels, the $4.5 billion of nominal gains would become real capital losses of nearly $1 billion. The study also showed the uneven impact of this form of taxflation on individuals from different income groups who reported the same real gains: taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes below $50,000 suffered real losses of about $3 billion, but paid $99 million in taxes. Taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes of $50,000 or more, however, realized $2.1 billion in real gains, and paid $1 billion in taxes.

Some economists contend that the portion of capital gains excluded from taxable income works as an ad hoc inflation adjustment. The exclusion was increased in 1978, during a period of high inflation.[42] At best, however, the exclusion can only be an approximation; this argument also ignores the fact that the stated goal of the capital gains exclusion has been to encourage risk-taking, not to compensate for inflation.

SLIDING EXCLUSION

Congress has considered bills to permit taxpayers to exclude a larger portion of each nominal capital gain from taxation, depending on the holding period for the asset.[43] Given a positive rate of return and steady inflation, the amount of capital gains excluded from taxes will decline over time. Since inflation does not uniformly increase for different types of assets, however, the proper approach in a true inflation-neutral tax system would probably be to measure only the real capital gain, rather than make arbitrary assumptions about the real rate of return and future inflation rates. The "sliding scale" proposals confuse absolute and proportional gains; the amount of gain due to inflation does increase with time (as long as consumer prices do not fall), but the inflation-related gain, as a proportion of the total gain, is likely to decrease as the holding period increases.[44]

THE EFFORT TO INDEX CAPITAL GAINS

In 1978 and 1981, efforts to index the basis of certain assets for purposes of the tax on capital gains made progress in Congress. Although neither efforts succeeded, it is worth reviewing the proposals for indications of how Congress may approach future asset indexing legislation.

The House version of the Revenue Act of 1978 included an amendment, proposed by Rep. Bill Archer, to index the basis of certain types of capital assets. The Ways and Means Committee Report on the provision noted, "[A] taxpayer can have substantial gains for tax purposes even though the real value of the assets (i.e., adjusted for inflation) has not changed . . . [I]n many instances individuals with the same marginal tax rate may have an equal amount of real gain taxed at a different rate due to the combination of inflationary pressures and the length of their holding period for the asset.[45]"

Thus, the Committee Report suggested that the distortions and inequities in measuring capital income for tax purposes warranted a solution involving an inflation adjustment.

The complexity of the Archer amendment indicates that correcting inflation distortions in the measurement of income from capital is more difficult than eliminating bracket creep from the rate structure. In the Archer amendment, the indexing basis adjustment was limited to certain assets, including common stock or stock possessing the attributes of common stock, tangible personal property and real property. Intangible property, including options or other contracts with respect to stock, was not covered. Similarly, contract rights in connection with real property were not eligible for the inflation adjustment. Assets qualified for inflation adjustment only if they were held for at least one year and constituted a capital asset or property used in a trade or business at the time of sale. Thus, inventory and stock held by securities dealers were not eligible for indexing. On the other hand, certain Sec. 1231 assets, such as timber, coal, iron ore, certain livestock and unharvested crops were eligible.

A key issue in asset indexing is the definition of "adjusted basis." Under the Archer proposal, adjusted basis was generally the taxpayer's basis in the asset immediately before sale, determined in accordance with existing law. Depreciation and depletion deductions reduced the basis eligible for adjustment. A substantial increase in investment in an indexed asset was treated as a separate asset, with its own holding period and basis adjustment. If a substantial decrease in investment occurred, such as a withdrawal of capital, the basis of the indexed asset attributable to that reduction could not be adjusted for inflation after the date of the reduction.

In 1982, during consideration of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act, the Senate approved a capital gains indexing amendment proposed by Sen. Armstrong. The Armstrong amendment was a more limited version of the earlier Archer proposal; it provided inflation adjustments only for corporate stock and real property used in a trade or business. Like the Archer amendment, the property would have to be held for more than one year to qualify. The amendment also included rules for the "flow-through" of the inflation adjustment to shareholders and partners of certain entities. After a brief debate, the Senate adopted the Armstrong amendment by a vote of 64 to 32. Despite the strong Senate support, however, and the House's approval of a comparable provision in 1978, the Armstrong amendment was not included by the Conference Committee in the final bill because the House conferees declined to accept it.[46] Whether Congress will eventually agree to an inflation adjustment for capital gains remains unclear. The strong support each house of Congress has displayed on different occasions suggests that the issue is still viable. At the same time, the complex nature of the capital gains indexing proposals demonstrates the difficulty of extending tax indexing to areas other than elimination of bracket creep.

PROSPECTS FOR FURTHER INDEXING: SOME PROBLEMS

The problems involved in creating a workable capital gains indexing proposal illustrate the difficulties posed by expanding the application of tax indexing. These difficulties include deciding what types of assets should be eligible for inflation adjustment, how to deal with passthrough entities, how to cope with debt instruments, and whether to provide differentials for different types of assets that may not have comparable relationships to the general rate of inflation. The indexing of rate brackets and the personal exemption involve policy considerations that are fairly clear, easy to implement and capable of generating broad political support. For other aspects of the income tax system, however, the issues are less understandable, and it is more difficult to marshal the necessary political support for change. Although it is still worth the effort to attempt to expand indexing, careful groundwork must be established.

It would seem reasonable to index all fixed-dollar amounts in the Code that have significant tax consequences. For example, the credit for the elderly,[47] the cap on the deduction for investment interest,[48] the limit on the amount of gain from the sale of a principal residence that can be exempt,[49] and the estate and gift tax unified credit[50] could all be indexed. These types of dollar amounts, unlike the amounts that define the general rate structure, have a more narrow and targeted purpose. Thus, in some cases, there may be reasons to leave the amounts constant, so Congress will have occasion to reexamine them periodically, weigh their merits and determine their appropriate relation to the inflation rate. These political and policy concerns are different from the issues involved with allowing an unindexed individual rate structure to generate a higher level of revenues for the government without congressional action.

Broader use of indexing in connection with specialized tax incentives may also create inflation-induced tax gains for taxpayers, as opposed to the gains government has realized from taxflation. The most obvious example is the deductibility of interest payments, which tend to respond to inflation. In times of high inflation, higher-bracket taxpayers derive a significant benefit from the deduction for interest at rates that reflect an inflation premium. For example, if the basis of capital assets were indexed, it might be appropriate to adjust the deduction for interest on loans to acquire these assets.

Inflation also has a distorting effect on depreciation. The amount of depreciation allowable generally depends on the original cost of an asset. As inflation raises price levels, the real value of depreciation allowances decreases. For depreciation that is calculated by the historical cost method, this reduction is equivalent to a substantial increase in the rate of tax. In testimony before the Joint Economic Committee in 1978, Dr. Feldstein noted that the historical cost method of tax depreciation caused corporate depreciation in 1977 to be understated by more than $25 billion. This understatement increased corporate tax liabilities by $12 billion.[51]

Although the Code provides no specific adustment for the effects of inflation on depreciation, some commentators have argued that "accelerated depreciation provides some tax offset in early years."[52] In recent years, this argument was theoretically and practically unconvincing because inflation was too high to provide any real benefit throughout the life of an asset. However, the adoption of ACRS appears to address this problem in a relatively simple way and achieve a kind of rough justice.

For many provisions of the Code, the choice of an appropriate measure of inflation may be more important than in the case of the general rate structure. It is reasonable to use the CPI for the rate brackets because this index is the most commonly understood and accepted measure of price level changes. In considering other measures, however, such as tax incentives related to housing, it may be more appropriate to look only at the housing component of the price index, or some other measure of appreciation in the housing market, perhaps even on a localized basis. The variety of inflation indices that might be appropriate would add to the complexity of the overall tax system in a way that the ERTA indexing provision does not.

All of these questions need to be addressed and answered after a fair examination of the issues. Discussion of inflation adjustments in the Code will continue, and further congressional consideration is inevitable. As long as inflation persists, Congress will continue to consider the implications of and possible extension of indexing. While a 5 percent or 6 percent inflation rate may seem modest in light of recent experience, the idea of living with such a high "core" rate of inflation means that careful and thorough consideration must be given to its effects on the tax laws. This examination has begun, and major progress has been made, but there is still much to be done.

CONCLUSION: INDEXING AND THE POLITICAL ECONOMY

It should be clear that indexing income taxes is not merely an issue of tax policy. It is a major and fundamental issue of fiscal policy, of how Congress and the President manage government finances and try to influence the course of the economy. From that perspective, the question becomes one of accountability. Many proponents view indexing as requiring an explicit choice: Should the government resort to a mechanism that raises taxes automatically, while taking political credit for the expenditure of those revenues, or should the will to spend be matched by the will to take the explicit actions needed to raise an appropriate amount of revenues?

Since indexing was adopted in ERTA, Congress has demonstrated the ability to make at least some of the necessary decisions on taxing and spending. Whatever view one takes of the relative merits of tax increases and spending cuts in reducing in the budget deficit, the fact remains, that in 1982, Congress did vote to raise significant new revenues when a consensus developed that revenues were necessary to reduce the federal deficit. The impact of the recession was undoubtedly a major factor. Congress was effectively denied the customary fiscal reward from bracket creep, however, because of the 1981 tax rate cuts. Voters can judge the performance of Congress on its action, not its inaction.

Whether Congress will continue to act remains to be seen. The prospect of grappling with enormous deficits has lead several prominent members to urge repeal or "indefinite delay" of indexing as a relatively simple way of reducing the deficit, and a number of outside analysts have agreed. Unfortunately, this suggestion is often analyzed as though the question simply involved choosing between raising revenues or not raising revenues to reduce the deficit. However, the choice is between raising revenues directly, as in the 1982 tax bill or concealing increased taxes in inflation. The latter approach may be easier in the short run, but it may not lead to meaningful restraint on the deficit—or even better tax and fiscal policy. only after tax rates were reduced and indexed did Congress begin to face up to the task of improving the efficiency and equity of the tax laws by reviewing provisions of the Code that needed a fresh look. Arguably, repeal of indexing would also decrease the pressures to continue improving the tax laws.

Observers of the political economy will be alert to any attempts to tamper with indexing, because such efforts would have broad implications. As Martin Feldstein told the Senate Finance Committee in February, 1982, "the day the Congress votes to rescind indexing, the financial markets will recognize the bad news, and will say, 'ah ha, that means that Congress has a bigger vested interest in higher inflation rates in the future' . . . one of the ways in which the deficit can create inflation is by persuading Congress to eliminate indexing, and then persuading the monetary authorities to reduce that deficit thorough inflating the economy, pushing us all into higher brackets and collecting more taxes." Thus, the fate of indexing is directly linked to the question of whether the American economy will move toward stable recovery or will return to the inflation and interest rate "roller coaster" in the future. No more important question awaits the 98th Congress.

25TH ANNIVERSARY OF SBIC'S AND MESBIC'S

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, during the past 25 years, small and minority-owned small businesses, backed with venture capital from small business investment companies (SBIC's) and minority enterprise small business investment companies (MESBIC's), have experienced extraordinary growth, opened the door to hundreds of thousands of employment opportunities and been in the forefront of our Nation's developments in technology and innovation.

Many of these prosperous, small, and minority-owned small businesses would not have been able to begin their operations without the injection of seed capital from SBIC's and MESBIC's. These privately managed and organized financial institutions are licensed by the U.S. Small Business Administration (SBA), to provide equity capital, long-term loans, and management assistance to small firms. I do not need to tell you, in this day and age, that this service is desperately needed and appreciated by the small business community. As traditional credit markets become increasingly hesitant to take a chance on small, often untried and unproven, companies, the importance of SBIC's and MESBIC's in giving small companies the capital they need to grow and expand becomes ever greater.

The SBIC and MESBIC industry's record of helping small businesses and promoting entrepreneurism is one to which I am pleased to pay special tribute. The National Association of Small Business Investment Companies (NASBIC) estimates that nearly $5 billion has been invested in 66,000 new and growing firms by SBIC's since the program began. The American Association of Minority Enterprise Small Business Investment Companies (AAMESBIC) estimates that in the last 5 years alone, MESBIC's have invested more than $190 million in minority-owned small firms.

More importantly is the return that we have gotten on these investments. Studies show that for every taxpayer dollar invested in the SBIC and MESBIC programs, the Government has received $100 back in the form of tax revenues. Additionally, it has been proven that the job growth among SBIC's and MESBIC-assisted small firms is 10 times greater than among American companies in general.

In return for pledging to finance only small businesses, SBIC's are licensed by SBA to supplement their private investment capital with funds borrowed from the Government at an interest rate slightly above the cost of money to the Federal Treasury. MESBIC's, which make investments exclusively to economically or socially disadvantaged enterpreneurs, go through the same licensing procedure and supplement their private investment capital through the Government's purchase of preferred securities and debentures.

The SBIC program was created in 1958; currently, there are 500 SBIC's licensed in this country, of which 140 are MESBIC's.

At a Small Business Committee hearing on the SBIC and MESBIC programs last December, SBA Administrator James C. Sanders testified that these innovative programs had "succeeded in providing unique and much-needed assistance to small businesses." He called the benefits of these programs impressive and noted that the jobs produced, the tax revenues generated, and the Government's overall economic gains, have far exceeded the Government's cost of operating these programs. I wholeheartedly concur in his evaluation.

Let me cite a few examples of the unknown companies who got their start with funding from SBIC's Wang Laboratories, People Express, Midway Airlines, Federal Express, and Apple Computer. It reads like a who's who of top entrepreneurs, does it not? Yet, no one was willing to take a chance on these firms until a few far-sighted, imaginative SBIC's came along and recognized the potential of these young entrepreneurs.

Maybe not as well known nationally, but a little closer to home for this Senator is a Connecticut SBIC-backed firm which has achieved tremendous success. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate American Frozen Foods, Inc. of Bridgeport, Conn., a direct sales organization that distributes food products to consumers in their homes. The company received venture capital from First Connecticut SBIC in 1961. During its first year, it had 10 employees and sales of $600,000, and operated at a loss. In 1983, American Frozen Foods employs about 900 people, has sales of about $50 million, and is profitable. This is just one example of how an SBIC can help a company through difficult times with financing and by working with their management team.

This company is 1 of 12 being honored today at the SBIC 25th anniversary celebration here in Washington. The additional distinguished small businesses deserving recognition include: Ault, Inc., Minneapolis, Minn.; Dicomed Corp., Minneapolis, Minn.; Digitron, Inc., Dayton, Ohio; Essence Communications, Inc., New York, N.Y.; E. R. Green & Associates, Inc., Carle Place, N.Y.; Lifeline Systems, Inc., Waltham, Mass.; Martinez & Rutter, Inc., Dallas, Tex.; NBI, Inc., Boulder, Colo.; Palm Harbor Homes, Inc., New York, N.Y.; and Quantum Corp., Milipitas, Calif. In addition, the industry's first licensee, First Midwest Capital Corp., in Minneapolis, Minn., will receive special recognition and an award at the anniversary event.

Mr. President, the contributions of SBIC's and MESBIC's to our Nation are gratefully acknowledged and deeply appreciated. As chairman of the Small Business Committee, I have long been a supporter of these valuable programs and I wish the industry continued success with investments in the small and minority small business community.●

LOOK-ALIKE DRUGS

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, America is engaged in a struggle to bring an end to the excessive use of drugs. This national tragedy is sapping the strength and energy of not only our Nation's youth, but people in all walks of life and of all ages.

Due to the increased pressure by law enforcement agencies at all levels of government to suppress the manufacture and sales of controlled substances, we now find a growing industry of manufacturing and selling "look-alike drugs."

Look-alike drugs resemble or duplicate the appearance of certain highly abused controlled substances such as amphetamines, barbiturates, and tranquilizers. They contain combinations of substances commonly found in over-the-counter cold, allergy, and diet pills which, when taken in multiple doses or in combination with aspirin or caffeine, produce stimulant or depressant effects similar to the controlled substances they are designed to resemble.

The look-alikes are being promoted as the "legal way to get high" and are being promoted through mail order firms, magazine advertising, brochures at rock concerts, on college campuses and in the schoolyards.

The Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), and the Postal Service are all trying to stop this new drug epidemic. Present Federal law does not give them all the tools they need to be effective in their fight.

Many State legislatures have passed laws to combat the sale of look-alike drugs, but without additional Federal legislation, their actions have not solved the problem.

In 1981, the Virginia Legislature adopted the Imitation Controlled Substances Act intended to prohibit the sale of look-alike drugs. However, the police and prosecutors have found that they are unable to stop the practice because of other statutes that provide loopholes in the law. My State's legislature will endeavor to adopt additional measures that will help law enforcement next year. However, they believe that Federal legislation is also necessary to get the job done.

Mr. President, the Food and Drug Administration has documented more than a dozen deaths attributed to look-alike drugs. The trade is growing by leaps and bounds. Virginia officials have found these drugs being sold to third and fourth graders. There are more than 15 stores selling these drugs in my State—3 years ago, there were none.

As a cosponsor of S. 503 and S. 497, bills introduced to close down the manufacture and sales of these drugs, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Senator HUMPHREY has advised me that his Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse would begin marking up S. 503 on October 18.

Kids should not be taking any drugs without a doctor's prescription or parental approval. Our overriding goal should be to keep these drugs out of the hands of schoolchildren. To date, regulatory efforts by the Food and Drug Administration have not been successful; the manufacturers and sellers have found ways to escape from Federal regulations.

The answer is enactment of legislation to outlaw the manufacture, distribution, and sales of look-alike drugs which are on the market solely for the purpose of fostering drug abuse. The dealers will tell you that these drugs are for recreational use; we all know that this is ridiculous. How can drug use be anything but abuse—abuse of mind and body.

Mr. President, early action is needed to protect our young people and I urge my colleagues to support this legislation when it is brought before the Senate.●

THE CONTINUING RESOLUTION

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations has just concluded its consideration of amendments to House Joint Resolution 368, the continuing resolution for fiscal year 1984. I am most happy to announce to this body that the committee has recommended a clean continuing resolution, unencumbered by the usual array of extraneous amendments. Those which Senator STENNIS and I will offer on behalf of the committee when the continuing resolution arrives from the House are related strictly to technical changes and the usual boilerplate language required for continuing resolutions.

Mr. President, I want to heartily thank all members of the Appropriations Committee for their forebearance and magnificent cooperation today, and the Senate leadership on both sides of the aisle for their strong support in keeping the continuing resolution clean. I do not believe it is overly dramatic to characterize the committee's action today as historic, and I certainly hope it will not be a once in a lifetime event.

It is my fervent hope that the Senate will follow the outstanding example of my colleagues on the Appropriations Committee once the continuing resolution is taken up here on the floor, and refrain from offering amendments. We have an excellent chance here of avoiding the marathon sessions and weekend endurance contests to which we have become accustomed of late, and the possibility of a Government shutdown that looms large at this time of the year. Let us act on the continuing resolution tomorrow with dispatch, clear the necessary technical changes through conference, and send the measure to the President for his signature Friday.

For the reference of Senators, I ask that a short summary table explaining the spending rates for the nine bills covered under the continuing resolution be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. I will have a further explanatory statement to offer when the Senate takes up House Joint Resolution 368.

The table follows:

SUMMARY OF SENATE CONTINUING RESOLUTION

Lower of 1983 level or President's budget—Foreign operations.

Lower of House or Senate bill level—Commerce.

Senate bill level—Agriculture, Interior, and Labor-HHS.

Current rate—Treasury.

Conference rate—Military construction and District of Columbia.

$253 billion annual rate—Defense.●

WOMEN AND DRUGS

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, we have all been hearing in the news about how life expectancy is related to smoking and that men's statistically shorter lifespan may be linked directly to smoking. Well, women seem to be catching up to men in that area as well. More women are smoking today than ever before, and they are beginning earlier. Unfortunately, many cigarette advertisements aimed at women not only imply that smoking is mature and glamorous. The subliminal message is that smoking somehow means equality and independence for women.

What disturbs me the most is that smoking in teenagers seems to be directly linked to the use of illegal drugs. According to officials of the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA), smoking teenagers use substantially more marihuana, cocaine, hallucinogens, or heroin. Of the smoking teenagers between the ages of 12 and 17, 49 percent use marihuana, 58 percent drink alcohol, and 14 percent use cocaine, hallucinogens, or heroin. By contrast, among nonsmoking teens, only 5 percent use marihuana, 22 percent use alcohol, and 1 percent use cocaine, hallucinogens, or heroin.

Mr. President, as chairman of the Senate Drug Caucus, I have read many studies on why people take drugs. I have discovered to my dismay, that all drug use, not just smoking, has increased dramatically among women, especially young women.

Studies indicate that while men tend to use drugs for pleasure or for social reasons, women take them to help them cope with life.

We are living in a time that is most exciting and challenging for women. Women are experiencing greater opportunities and expanded roles. Independence, however, brings with it its own particular pressures. And pressure and frustration invariably lead to some kind of drug abuse in many people. According to Prof. Beth G. Reed of the University of Michigan School of Social Work:

While large areas of similarities exist between women and men, they can also be described as living in fundamentally different cultures. Men's contributions are more valued than women's, both monetarily and in terms of prestige. Thus, many women grow up with low self-esteem and lower expectations for their lives. They are more concerned with surviving than about getting ahead. These feelings of powerlessness and pessimism are immobilizing and must be confronted in drug treatment.

Professor Reed has suggested that certain kinds of drug rehabilitation be geared toward the specific problems of women. Reed remarks on such problems, which are outlined in NIDA's recent study, "Treatment Services for Drug Dependent Women:"

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

Reed said:

Women as a group have lower incomes, less consistent work histories, and are less likely to have a work-related identity. Rehabilitation that includes job training is particularly for them.

CHILD CARE

A large majority of drug-dependent women feel responsible for the welfare of their children. Thus, treatment programs should help women improve their parenting skills and should include child care arrangements to encourage their participation. Attention to child care and parenting training can increase women's trust in the program, strengthen her family, and decrease the problems her children may have in the future.

MEDICAL CARE

Since many drugs seem to affect women's bodies more quickly and more destructively than they do men's, and because women's reproductive systems are more complex, several chapters address such topics as medical services, nutrition, health and fitness, and reproductive concerns. Women are more likely than men to seek medical help. However, they are also more likely to have been given medication to help them cope. Often it was their problems and stress that began their slide into chemical dependency in the first place.

LEGAL CONCERNS

Civil litigation needs related to child custody, physical abuse, housing, and credit are common among drug-dependent women.

EMPOWERMENT TRAINING

The women-oriented services discussed in the books explicitly outline ways the women can be guided to develop more confidence, be more assertive, and feel (and be) more independent. Expression of anger and aggression is considered "unfeminine" and is discouraged by society. So many women feel guilty about feeling angry, and this adds to their feelings of helplessness. Assertiveness and survival skills training programs allow women to have a series of success experiences and to feel more in control of their lives.

SUPPORT SYSTEMS

Many women appear to accept their limiting circumstances because their homemaker and family roles prevent them from having enough contact with other women. Feeling isolated, these women cannot fully understand the similarities between the problems they face and broader patterns within society. As a result, they often blame themselves for situations which they cannot control. Chemically dependent women also often withdraw from family and friends, or are rejected by them. Activities with other women can reduce their social isolation and provide opportunities for them to work together to improve their common circumstances.

Reed added:

Generalizing about all drug-dependent women—or men—obscures some important differences that have profound implications for treatment. These differences include age, race ethnicity, socioeconomic background, sexual orientation, and lifestyle. Women from very dissimilar backgrounds can learn much from each other in treatment if each woman's lifestyle is respected.●

SOUTH AND CENTRAL AMERICA PROBLEMS AND OPPORTUNITIES

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as all of us are aware, Central and South America are critical areas of the world insofar as the United States is concerned. Despite the fact that Latin America is undergoing social, economic, and political upheavals, it is an area that is vital to our interests and one that we ignore at our peril. One of the bright spots in our relations with this area is our present Ambassador to Columbia, Lewis Tambs. Having known Lew Tambs for quite some time, I can assure my colleagues that the interview with him and the profile on him which appeared in the September 11, 1983, edition of the Arizona Republic is both honest and factual. Unfortunately, space limitations of the newspaper prevented the reader from learning more about this multifaceted and talented man. However, the warnings which he sent out in the interview are, nevertheless, true and should be required reading by everyone who is concerned with the security and stability of our own country.

Mr. President, I ask that these two articles be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order that everyone may have a chance to read them and to understand the problems and opportunities which face us in Latin America.

The articles follow:

[From the Arizona Republic, Sept. 11, 1983]

INTERVIEW: AMBASSADOR FEARS UNITED STATES IS LOSING "POWER PERCH"

SPECIAL REPORT: SOVIET-CUBAN ADVENTURISM

(By Bill Waters)

BOGOTÁ, COLOMBIA.—Ever the professor, Ambassador Lewis Tambs is quick to lay groundwork for his increasingly accepted views of what the Soviets and the Cubans are up to in Latin America.

The Arizona State University geopolitical historian launches most discussions of Soviet-Cuban adventurism in the region by citing three basic Soviet goals:

Surround the People's Republic of China, which they've done effectively with the communist victory in Vietnam;

Deny Western democracies access to oil and ore from the Middle East and South America; and Isolate the U.S.

They're accomplishing that last point by conducting what Tambs terms "a low-cost, low-profile, low-risk war."

That war, he says, not only is eroding the U.S. "power perch" in the Caribbean and Central America, but it's also endangering oil and ore imports vital to the U.S.

"And it could stampede millions of refugees from Nicaragua, El Salvador, Guatemala and Mexico into the United States," he said.

The Kremlin has taken new interest, he notes, in probing the sea lanes between Arabia and the U.S., and between Alaska and U.S. oil ports.

In the Caribbean and in Central America, says Tambs, the Soviets and their Cuban allies are obliging the U.S. to divert men and resources southward.

"The ability of the U.S. to project power eastward to Europe and the Middle East, and westward to our friends in Asia is dependent on a cooperative Caribbean and a supportive South America.

"Since 1898, we really haven't had to worry much about that part of the world."

We don't have enough ships or men to be strong everywhere, Tambs said from the library of the ambassador's residence. "We need friends, and allies, in Latin America."

The southern countries, said the ambassador, acknowledging its hackneyed sound, "are our soft underbelly."

"A majority of U.S. exports go down the Mississippi River and out the Gulf of Mexico or the Caribbean.

"In case of war in Europe, the majority of our seaborne reinforcements would come from Gulf Coast ports."

How vital is that?

"Initially, of course, we'd be airborne from the Atlantic Coast," said ex-paratrooper Tambs—"but most of the reinforcements would come by sea."

He mentions Navy Secretary John Lehman's concern that if Cuba honors its commitment to the Soviets, it could take us six weeks to fight our way through the Florida Straits—by which time the war would be over.

What is Castro committed to do?

Tambs talks of a commitment to stop our shipping at one point or another should the Soviets call in the full extent of Cuban debts to Moscow.

"Let's say, for the sake of argument, that Castro lets our shipping go through for 30 days, then decides to choke it off. What, after all that escorting, would be left to defend the Gulf Coast?"

That coast, with its shipyards and refineries, would be open to aerial attack.

Tambs isn't just conjuring up scary stories; rather, he's trying to portray some of the less-publicized possibilities that add to the Pentagon's nervousness over Soviet jabs, feints and advances.

What bothers the ambassador is that Moscow, through Havana, can create a whole new Cold War front on a shoestring.

"The Soviets really don't have a thing to sell but weapons . . . but they're very good at weapons, let's not kid ourselves."

"Those weapons are going into the hands of Nicaraguans now. They've already got a 30,000-man army, maybe 150,000 with the militia.

"Somoza never had more than 20,000, and they're talking about 250,000, maybe more.

"The kids in uniform could get the choice of death by hunger, or death as heroes of international communism. Their leaders have a siege mentality, and they're looking to pre-emptive attacks.

"We acquiesced to communist takeovers in Eastern Europe, but there's no rationale to doing it here."

What worries Tambs is that the Soviets said last year they'd put missiles in the Western Hemisphere.

"We don't know if there are missiles here or not."

The Kennedy-Khrushchev agreements of 1962 dealt only with missiles in Cuba. It would be easy, Tambs notes, to put portable intermediate-range missiles in Nicaragua. Their 800-mile range could put them in reach of Mexico's richest oilfields, among other targets.

"The noose is tightening not only on oil, but ore," says the ambassador.

"Mexico, with some 67 billion barrels of proven petroleum reserves, also supplies the U.S. with manganese.

"Guatemala, which started exporting oil in 1981 from the Petén and West Chancha fields, and which has estimated reserves of between two and six billion barrels, has been shipping nickel to the U.S. for five years."

Then there's aluminum. Caribbean-basin nations—the Dominican Republic, Haiti, Surinam, Guyana and Jamacia—supply most of America's 93 percent import requirements.

In short, a whole other reason to be concerned about the region—and a whole other threat, real as well as psychological, to be met by a country not in the mood to fight.

"The Soviets, of course, are from the land of Potemkin Villages. The West is honest, while the other side will say anything to win.

"We're poker players. We take the hand that's dealt us, resort to our cards, depending on our philosophy—conservative, liberal—and play with what we've got. We're essentially reactionary.

"We tend to believe that as long as we've got money, we can stay in the game. . . ."

"The Soviets are chess players. They try to keep three to five moves ahead of us, while we, the poker players, are reacting to move one."

"We're businessmen, crisis managers—but if you know what you're doing, there shouldn't be a crisis.

The U.S. position in the area, he says, is sound: We stand for the democratization of Central America—open political campaigns, free elections and all, for Guatemala, El Salvator and Nicaragua.

"We're not asking Nicaragua to do anything we're not asking El Salvador to do."

To Tambs' way of thinking, even the generals running some of the republics are moving toward democracy, at least in their stated ideals—"and you don't hear that coming from Cuba."

"All people have a right to self-determination, internally and externally. No system's better than the one in which people choose their own rules.

"If Nicaragua chooses socialism, that's their business.

"Meanwhile, we've asked the Salvadorans to negotiate with their armed opponents.

He realizes there's a less-than-tractable right wing in El Salvador; people whose refusal to countenance political, economic and agrarian reforms could keep the once-productive nation at war for a long time to come.

"They haven't lived with 20th century capitalism, where you pay workers, and make consumers of them," Tambs explains. "They're still in a 19th century kind of capitalism of maximum profits and gains."

We're doing all we can to give all people a chance. Colombia has offered to El Salvador and Nicaragua to train them in conducting free elections."

"We don't like Zimbabwe solutions of shooting your way into negotiations."

Regionally, Tambs says wistfully, "If we could split off the kooks from the rational types, it would be to the advantage of the U.S."

More than Soviet missiles and Cuban-flown MiGs fit Tambs' view of what the U.S. faces in a chaotic Central America:

"If totalitarian revolutions really get going," he says, "the U.S. could be inundated, not with 'boat people' from around the world, but with refugees from our very own continent."

He's got a point. Thee are 100 million people between Nogales and the Darien Gap. if only one out of 10 came here in search of freedoms severely threatened in that part of the world, Arizona and the rest of the U.S. would be awash in social crises.

And meanwhile, the Soviet-Cuban and Nicaraguan threats would still be there.

ENVOY TO COLOMBIA IS HARD-EYED BUT SIMPÁTICO

BOGOTÁ, COLOMBIA.—Lewis Tambs took a post in the penumbra of the world's spotlight, but he has helped turn it into a diplomatic focal point for peace in Latin America.

Tambs, a geopolitical history professor on leave from Arizona State University, was high on President Reagan's Latin American appointments list from election day on.

However, his hard-eyed approach to the Soviet Union and his thin-stretched theories about the Kremlin's global aims had long been scorned by a diplomatic establishment bent on detente at any cost.

That establishment maintained its foreign-policy influence as Reagan's national-security and State Department teams first took the field.

Instead of Tambs, a European type, Thomas Enders, wound up as Alexander Haig's assistant secretary of state for Latin American affairs.

Nonetheless, Tambs' extrapolations of Mongol empire-building in the modern world and his theories of "choke points" crucial to global shipping were being kicked around the national-security stage.

The White House began calling Tambs for consultations, then brought him to Washington as a full-time counselor.

He was up for ambassador to Panama. The Panamanians weren't up for him; he'd testified in opposition to the Panama Canal treaties. Never mind that he accepts them now as law—and never mind that in Tambs the Panamanians would have seen an ambassador both gracious and honest.

Then Colombia came up. With frontal support from Barry Goldwater and Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C.—and with some peripheral pushes from Sen. Russell Long, D-La.—Tambs waded through some liberal opposition and some fence-straddling non-support from supposed friends to win confirmation.

With his new wife, Phyllis, and with their four-month-old daughter, Greer, Tambs blew into Bogotá amid fears from the career foreign-service folks that they'd be greeting Godzilla at the airport.

He arrived just after the bombing of our embassy in Beirut, and that's what the reporters asked him about.

"I'd ask the people of Colombia to pray for our people there, just as the American people prayed for the victims of the Popayán earthquake," was Tambs' reply—and the foreign service pros knew they were welcoming a diplomat.

Tambs, you see, is simpático—a quality prized in this part of the world.

In less than half a year as ambassador, he has made friends for the U.S. at many levels.

He and president Belisario Betancur get along famously, a point the president underlined by attending the traditional July 4 reception at the ambassador's residence. It had been a very long time since a Colombian president had done so.

Meanwhile, Betancur and the 56-year-old Tambs were talking about peace and freedom in Central America.

Democratic Colombia under the dynamic Betancur was fast becoming the logical member of the Contadora Group to get White House emissary Richard Stone and Salvadoran leftist leader Rubén Zamora together.

After all, Venezuela is approaching a change of presidents. So is Panama. And Mexico—well, as the other three Contadora countries know so well, it isn't a democracy, so what can you expect?

At the end of July, Stone and Zamora met in Bogotá.

Not much happened; no one thought much would.

They agreed, at least, to meet again—and since then, Tambs has been seeing lots of Betancur.

Evening calls to Tambs' home have sent him from the dinner table to the presidential palace for close consultation on what should be the next step through the thickets of civil-war diplomacy.

There are those who doubt that Stone's Latin American mission will amount to much; after all, hatreds run deep and violence lurks at every turn.

Still, it's a start to unsnarling knots too long ignored by Washington. If anything gets straightened out, Tempe's Lewis Tambs—who gives all the credit to Betancur—can at least be proud of his part in trying.●

IN SUPPORT OF MINORITY BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT WEEK

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the resolution declaring the week of October 3-10 as Minority Business Development Week. This resolution reminds us of the importance of minority business in our economy and the need to address the problems these businesses experience interacting in our Nation's economy.

There are roughly 600,000 minority business enterprises in the United States with total sales of $45 billion annually. Obviously, these enterprises play an essential role in our economy. In spite of these impressive statistics, the minority business community is greatly underrepresented in the American business population. A business participation rate only one-fifth that of nonminorities suggests that minority businesses are not as numerous as they should be.

This discrepancy can be explained by the obstacles which confront minority businesses. As Victor Rivera, Director of the Minority Business Development Agency, notes:

Historically, minorities have been at a disadvantage in terms of access to timely information about business opportunities, both ownership opportunities and market opportunities. They also generally lack access to resources, especially capital and management and technical expertise. And then, of course, there are the attitudinal biases.

Thus, it is important to focus our attention and resources on minority business enterprises. To this end, I am sponsoring a Minority Business Conference, to be held October 3, 1983 in the Harlem State Office Building in New York. This conference will offer a step-by-step guide to the Federal procurement process for minority businesses. This conference, and others like it, will help achieve the administration's procurement goal of $15 billion in goods and services from minority firms for fiscal years 1983-85.

Mr. President, I encourage my colleagues to support Minority Business Development Week and minority business in general.●

ORDERS FOR THURSDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 8:45 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 8:45 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR REDUCTION IN LEADER TIME

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the minority leader is agreeable—and I have discussed it with him previously—I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow the time for the two leaders under the standing order be briefed and extend for 2 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that any time remaining after the two leaders have claimed their time be devoted to the transaction of routine morning business until 9 a.m., in which Senators may speak for 1 minute each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, at 9 a.m., the Senate will be back on the war powers resolution, at which time the pending question will be the Byrd amendment, as modified.

I remind Senators that under the act, we must finish this resolution by 2 p.m. in the afternoon tomorrow. I will cooperate, of course, with the minority leader and with all Senators, in seeing that we have a fair allocation of time to accommodate any amendments that may be offered and any votes that may be required.

After we finish this, however, Senators should expect that we will go either to the unemployment compensation extension bill or to the continuing resolution, depending on circumstances that may obtain at that time.

RECESS UNTIL 8:45 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 8:45 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to and, at 6:23 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, September 29, 1983, at 8:45 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, September 28, 1983

The House met at 10 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God, You have created this day for our use and for new opportunities of service. From the morning Sun until the going down of the same, Your blessings give that peace that the world cannot give. Your gifts of life, O Gracious God, are given freely without regard to our worthiness or importance. Give us all forgiveness and hope and purpose, and may Your spirit be with those who labor in this place that justice will reign in our land and world. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 3871. An act to amend the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982 to provide that the figure used in determining hourly rates of pay for Federal employees not be changed before the comparability adjustment in the rates of pay for such employees has been made for fiscal year 1984.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2972) entitled "An act to authorize certain construction at military installations for fiscal year 1984, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1046. An act to clarify the applicability of a provision of law regarding risk retention; and

S. 1146. An act to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 to provide for the revocation of the airman certificates and for additional penalties for the transportation by aircraft of controlled substances, and for other purposes.

A BIPARTISAN CAMP DAVID DEFICIT SUMMIT

(Mr. JONES of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, Members of Congress of both political parties privately lament the size and growth of Federal deficits. These $200 billion deficits which soak up more than three-fourths of all savings in America are bound to force up interest rates, and that will abort this recovery.

Most Members also privately admit what must be done, slow spending growth in military and entitlements and raise revenues to help reduce deficits.

I am convinced that no meaningful deficit reduction will occur unless it is done on a bipartisan basis, just as we did with social security.

Therefore, today I am introducing legislation directing the President to convene a bipartisan, Camp David type summit to develop a deficit reduction plan that can be implemented this fall, which contains a package of slowing military and entitlement spending growth and a tax program. Initial prime cosponsors include Messrs. PANETTA, GEPHARDT, HEFNER, FROST, FRENZEL, and REGULA, a bipartisan group of cosponsors.

I urge others in both parties to join in this effort today. Let us develop an American solution on a bipartisan basis to these deficit dangers. Good policies are good politics for both political parties. In this particular case, the American people are ahead of their political leaders. I hope that we can have a strong bipartisan showing for this bipartisan summit to reduce these deficits.

DEFINING THE AMERICAN ROLE IN LEBANON

(Mr. RATCHFORD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RATCHFORD. Mr. Speaker, I simply cannot support an 18-month commitment to the deployment of our troops in Lebanon. I am voting today to require the President to either invoke the War Powers Act, or to regularly certify that an effective cease-fire is in place.

Eighteen months is a lifetime in combat—some American marines have already lost their lives.

One year ago, we went to Lebanon to help insure that the PLO got out. They did, but we are still mired in the shifting sands of Mideastern conflict.

Mr. Speaker, I do not advocate a unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon. However, we do need a clear definition of our purpose there, the certification of a true cease-fire, or, an orderly, reasonable timetable for removing ourselves from the crossfire of civil war.

A REPLAY OF GULF OF TONKIN RESOLUTION

(Mr. LEVITAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, before the Sun goes down tonight, Members of this House will make one of the most momentous decisions that they will ever have to make as Members of this body dealing with the deployment of U.S. Marine forces in Lebanon. I hope that that vote will be one which will be a matter of conscience for each individual. It is one which can either lead us into a bloody quagmire or it can lead us to peace.

I regret that the rule which has been proposed does not provide adequate opportunity for an awesome issue of this sort to be considered fully by this House. Our hands are being tied as we reach out for the right decision.

I fear that we will see a replay of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution debate during the hours ahead.

I recognize the vital world role of leadership of the United States and, on occasion, the need for deployment of our forces, but someone must tell me or them, what is their mission? Is it something more than simply standing around and being target practice fodder?

I think the President of the United States needs to come before the American people and define our mission and theirs. In the absence of that, I cannot support writing a blank check for the use of our forces in Lebanon for 18 months. However, if the President can outline and explain and justify the role of our marines, then I will support him.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S RECENT REMARKS CONCERNING CRIME LEGISLATION

(Mr. HUGHES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, and again this week, Attorney General William French Smith chastized the House of Representatives for "failing to strengthen pertinent criminal laws."

Last January we lost an opportunity to strengthen Federal criminal law, particularly in the area of drug trafficking, but the lost opportunity was the fault of the Attorney General, not Congress. On December 20, 1982, the House passed 271 to 27 and the Senate passed unanimously, an omnibus crime bill. In the view of the leadership of the Judiciary Committees of both the House and the other body, it was the most significant anticrime measure passed in over 10 years. Among other things, that bill greatly expanded our ability to seize the profits of drug traffickers and raised criminal penalties from their laughably low levels to extremely high levels.

Only after the 97th Congress had adjourned sine die did we hear that a provision which would have created the so-called drug czar, which passed the Senate by a substantial majority in September, was unacceptable to the Attorney General. Yet, between September and December there had been no word that such a proposal would warrant a veto.

In January, the Attorney General was present at a meeting between President Reagan and the leaders of the House and Senate Judiciary Committees. We advised the President that the political reality was likely to preclude the adoption of the administration's entire shopping list in the 98th Congress, and that he should sign the measure with the substantial improvements that he wanted. We stressed that if the Attorney General spelled out his objections to the drug czar provision, we would commit ourselves to making changes in the 98th Congress. The Attorney General refused to cooperate, and urged the veto of the highly desired major improvements in Federal law enforcement, which he now blames Congress for not having acted upon.

Last January in the meeting at the White House one of the Republican participants told President Reagan that Mr. Smith's assessment of the political situation involving crime legislation was "dead wrong." Unfortunately in the months since, Mr. Smith has learned nothing new. He is still wrong.

PRESIDENT REAGAN SHOULD MAKE HIS PROJECTED TRIP TO THE PHILIPPINES

(Mr. RUDD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan's projected trip to the Philippines, where he would visit with President Ferdinand Marcos, has stirred up quite a bit of controversy.

After the Spanish-American War, Spain ceded the Philippines to the United States for a payment of $20 million. On July 4, 1946, we granted the Philippines independence and a republic was established.

Because of the turmoil and the riots in the Philippines, and most recently the assassination of an opposition political leader, Benigno Aquino, President Reagan is being asked to cancel his trip.

Those who oppose his going say that if the American President calls on the Philippine President, it will be, in effect, giving the U.S. stamp of approval on what they perceive to be a very repressive government.

These observers are bitterly critical of President Marcos, they call him a brutal tyrant.

The Philippines are vital to the U.S. defense installations in the Pacific. There is civil strife, but that is nothing new. Our troops fought a 6-year brutal war in the Philippines to suppress a guerrilla uprising from 1899 to 1905. There are three official languages—Filipino, based on Tagalog, Spanish, and English—but 90 other dialects are spoken. The majority of the population is cataloged as Roman Catholic, but the Muslims are extremely visible.

Organizing a republic with the population divided into ethnic groups, speaking a variety of dialects, after years of domination by Spanish rulers, and then as a protectorate of the United States, is a very difficult task.

The very same people who want President Reagan to cancel his projected visit as a gesture of our disapproval, saying that such an act is necessary in order to show the world that we condemn President Marcos as a ruthless dictator, are also urging President Reagan to meet with the Russian dictator Andropov.

The Philippine people deserve our sympathy and our support, but under the martial law, which Marcos felt he had to establish, there is still a great deal more freedom than is to be found in the Iron Curtain countries, or in Cuba, or Vietnam.

Can you imagine how Andropov would have reacted if 5,000 or 10,000 students had marched in protest in Moscow?

There is some personal risk involved in the President's trip to the Philippines. I hope and pray we can protect him. We have a Mutual Defense Treaty with the Philippines. The bases we have there are vital to our defense in the Pacific. There is substantial evidence to suggest at least some of the riots are Communist inspired. And I hope President Reagan makes the trip and continues to deal with President Marcos as an ally and a friend.

CORRECTING PUBLIC LAW 98-63 DUE TO AN ERROR IN ENROLLMENT OF H.R. 3069—VETO MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the further consideration of the veto message of the President on the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 338) to correct Public Law 98-63 due to an error in the enrollment of H.R. 3069.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I spoke yesterday to David Stockman, Director of the Office of Management and Budget. He assured me the administration no longer had any objection to the funds that were included in the joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 338, and inasmuch as those funds have now been included in the continuing resolution, I ask unanimous consent that the veto message of the President, together with the accompanying joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 338, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PRESIDENT'S APATHY CONCERNING MR. WATT IS UNACCEPTABLE

(Mrs. BOXER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, Robert F. Kennedy once said:

> Each time a person stands up for an ideal or strikes out against injustice, or attempts to improve the lot of others, they send forth a tiny ripple of hope. And * * * those ripples build a current that can sweep down the mightiest walls of oppressions and resistance.

And what happens when a person does the opposite? When he destroys that hope and reverses that current that has given faith and confidence to our most vulnerable populations?

If that person is James Watt, nothing happens to him.

No matter what the outrage in this country following on his many insults:

Calling environmentalists Communists; calling pro-choice advocates Fascists; insulting women, blacks, Jews, and disabled with a callous remark which could only demean.

This man, who has one of the highest Cabinet positions in the land, is not content to direct his hostilities toward America's environment; he now has turned this hostility toward America's people.

And where is the President? Has he made a public statement of apology to the people of our Nation? Has he fired this man who does not deserve the position of trust he holds? No; he has not. Mr. President, the American people expect more of their President. Your silence either indicates your approval or your apathy. Neither is acceptable.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 368, CONTINUING APPROPRIATIONS, 1984

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 317 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 317

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order, without intervening motion, to consider the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 368) making continuing appropriations, in the House, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to commit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOLAND). The gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee Mr. (QUILLEN), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 317 is a rule providing for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 368, continuing appropriations for fiscal year 1984. The rule provides for the consideration of the continuing resolution in the House, with the previous question considered as order to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to commit.

Under the normal procedure, continuing appropriation resolutions are not considered as general appropriations bills unless they are reported after September 15 preceding the fiscal year in which they are effective. As such, they are not covered by the provisions of clause 4(a) of rule XI which confers privileged status on general appropriations measures and on continuing appropriations resolutions reported 2 weeks or less before their effective date. House Joint Resolution 368 was introduced within the proper timeframe for a continuing resolution to be considered as privileged; however it was not reported from committee as required in clause 4(a) on rule XI. For this reason, a rule is necessary to provide for the consideration of this continuing resolution.

Because House Joint Resolution 368 is not considered as a privileged appropriations measure, none of the rules usually applicable to general appropriations bills are relevant. The continuing resolution made in order by this rule is not bound by the provisions of clause 2, rule XXI for example, which prohibit the inclusion of unauthorized appropriations or of legislation in an appropriations bill—or in amendments thereto. In the absence of the rule we are considering today, any germane amendment would be in order.

The procedure for consideration of the continuing resolution under the rule precludes the offering of amendments. Under the rule, the joint resolution will be considered in the House under the 1-hour rule. At the conclusion of debate the only motion in order is on the passage of the bill, with the exception of a prior motion to commit the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. Speaker, only 4 of the regular 13 appropriations bills for fiscal year 1984 have been signed into law, and the current fiscal year expires this Friday. Congress is therefore in the position of having to pass a continuing resolution in order to maintain the functioning of the Government after the beginning of the new fiscal year.

As my colleagues are aware, it is somewhat unusual to consider a continuing resolution under what amounts to a closed rule. The Committee on Rules considered some 20 requests to make amendments in order. Many of them in my judgment had merit and could have been made in order in the normal functioning of the appropriations process. It was the judgment of the Committee on Rules that the urgency of the need to pass this continuing resolution outweighed the merits of the individual proposals. In view of this urgency, the committee reported out a rule which eliminates the possibility of becoming embroiled in a lengthy amendment process.

House Joint Resolution 368 provides temporary financing authority during the period between September 30 and November for programs under 9 of the 13 regular fiscal year 1984 appropriations bills which have not been enacted into law. The four bills already enacted into law include appropriations for:

HUD/independent agencies (Public Law 98-45);

Energy and water development (Public Law 98-50);

Legislative branch (Public Law 98-78); and Transportation (Public Law 98-78).

As additional appropriations bills are enacted, the funding levels and other provisions in the continuing resolution applicable to programs under such bills would cease to be effective.

The funding levels for programs in the continuing resolution generally are set at the lower of the level set by existing law or the lowest level contained in differing versions of pending appropriations legislation. Specifically, House Joint Resolution 368 establishes five categories for determining the level of program funding, which are themselves determined by the status of a given appropriations bill in the legislative process. The continuing resolution sets the rates at which programs under the following bills would be funded:

First, District of Columbia; military construction—programs would be funded at the lower of the levels in the House- or Senate-passed bills. If an existing program is omitted for either version, it is continued at lower or current level or the level provided by one body.

Second, Agriculture; Commerce, State, Justice, and the Judiciary; Interior; Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education—programs would be funded at the levels contained in the bills as passed the House of Representatives, except that programs under the Commerce, State, Justice, and the Judiciary appropriations bill would be funded at the levels set by the bill (H.R. 3222) as reported from committee.

Third, programs would be funded at the lower of the level in the fiscal year 1983 bill or the budget estimate.

Fourth, Treasury and Postal Service—programs would be funded at the level set in the fiscal year 1983 bill.

Fifth, Foreign assistance—programs would be funded at the fiscal year 1983 level, which includes the foreign assistance supplemental appropriation.

In addition, certain programs whose reauthorizations have not yet been enacted are funded at the current level.

Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 368 was crafted by its author, the distinguished chairman of the Committee of Appropriations, to contain as little extraneous matter as possible. It is a lean and austere resolution, benefiting its role as a temporary, stopgap measure. The 45 days of continued funding at the lowest possible levels will give the Congress the breathing room necessary to work its collective will on spending priorities through an appropriations process. It is an inescapable fact that failure to pass this continuing resolution will bring virtually the entire operation of the U.S. Government to a screeching halt. I know this House will fulfill its responsibilities to the American people by adopting this rule and allowing the consideration of this continuing resolution.

□ 1020

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself as much time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, the able gentleman from Florida has explained the provisions of the rule and to some extent the provisions of the continuing resolution.

We all know that it is important to get down to business and pass a continuing resolution. It is much to my sorrow that we use the continuing resolution procedure but if it is not passed the Government will come to a halt on Friday midnight.

So time is passing. By the time the continuing resolution gets to the other body, and if any changes are made, and it comes back here, just anticipate that there may be late sessions this weekend.

So hopefully we can get down to business and pass it.

The Rules Committee, dedicated to that end, spent up until 8:30 yesterday evening hammering out an agreement so that the continuing resolution could be brought to the floor of the House without making a Christmas tree out of it. The original continuing resolution as reported by the committee had 19 additional amendments and had that passed the House it faced a certain veto.

The way it is now, under a closed rule, with 1 hour of debate, up or down, I commend it to you. I urge the adoption of the rule and the passage of the continuing resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON RESOLUTION

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 318 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 318

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 364) providing statutory authorization under the War Powers Resolution for continued United States participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, and the first reading of the resolution shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the resolution shall be considered as having been read for amendment under the five-minute rule. No amendment to the resolution shall be in order except the following amendments, which shall not be subject to amendment: (1) the amendment recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs now printed in the resolution; (2) the amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 27, 1983, by Representative Obey of Wisconsin, if offered by Representative Obey or Representative Long of Maryland, and said amendment shall be debatable for not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the proponent of the amendment and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs or his designee; and (3) an amendment or amendments, which shall be considered en bloc, if offered by Representative Zablocki of Wisconsin or his designee, which shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the proponent and a member opposed thereto. At the conclusion of the consideration of the resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions. At any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, in his discretion, hold S.J. Res. 159 or a similar joint resolution passed by the Senate at the Speaker's table, and after the passage of H.J. Res. 364, the Speaker may, in his discretion, recognize for any of the following motions: (1) to consider S.J. Res. 159, or a similar joint resolution passed by the Senate, in the House; (2) to move to strike out all after the resolving clause of said resolution and to insert in lieu thereof the provisions contained in H.J. Res. 364 as passed by the House; and (3) to move to insist on the House amendment to said resolution and to request a conference with the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BONIOR) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. QUILLEN), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 318 provides for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 364 which provides the statutory authorization under the War Powers Act for continual U.S. participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from the country of Lebanon. House Joint Resolution 364 is a crucial piece of legislation dealing with an issue of grave importance to each and every American. In order to facilitate the orderly and expeditious consideration of this joint resolution, the resolution shall be considered as read. The rule allows for 2 hours of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The joint resolution shall then be considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The rule provides that no amendment to House Joint Resolution 364 shall be in order except the following three which are not amendable: First, the recommended Foreign Affairs Committee amendment which is now printed in the joint resolution; second, an amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 27, 1983 by Representative DAVID OBEY of Wisconsin if offered by Representative OBEY or Representative LONG of Maryland; and finally, third, an amendment or amendments if offered by Representative ZABLOCKI of Wisconsin or his designee. The substitute amendment by Mr. OBEY or Mr. LONG shall be debatable for up to 2 hours to be equally divided and controlled by the proponent of the amendment and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs or his designee. The amendment or amendments if offered by Representative ZABLOCKI or his designee shall be offered en bloc and shall be debatable for up to 1 hour equally divided and controlled by a proponent and a Member opposed thereto.

The rule also provides one motion to recommit with or without instructions. After passage of House Joint Resolution 364, the rule allows for expeditious consideration of the Senate version of the legislation. The Speaker, at his discretion, may hold at the Speaker's table, Senate Joint Resolution 159, or any similar joint resolution passed by the other body. The Speaker is also granted authority to recognize any Member for the purpose of making the following motions: First, to consider Senate Joint Resolution 159, or a similar Senate-passed joint resolution in the House; second to move to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the provisions contained in House Joint Resolution 364 as passed by the House; and finally, third, to move to insist on the House amendment to the Senate resolution and to request a conference with the Senate if the second motion is the one made.

Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 364 states that the deployment of U.S. Marines in Lebanon is covered by the War Powers Act and authorizes continued deployment of U.S. forces in Lebanon for an additional 18 months. The joint resolution: authorizes the presence of U.S. Marines in Lebanon for 18 months from the date of enactment of the joint resolution; includes a congressional finding that section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Act became operative on August 29, 1983 and that the marines are now in hostilities which require authorization for them under the War Powers Act; calls for reports by the President every 6 months in the House; includes an authorization for "protective measures" to protect the safety of the marines; and suggests that the United States should withdraw its troops if all our allies withdraw.

House Joint Resolution 364 is historic legislation, what we do here today will have great impact on our country and the world and will have great significance for the legislative process. By signing this joint resolution, the President recognizes and acknowledges the validity of the War Powers Act. House Resolution 318 provides 5 hours of debate and makes in order a committee amendment, a substitute amendment and an amendment or amendments if offered by the chairman of the reporting committee. House Resolution 318 provides abundant time and latitude for the House consideration of a monumental piece of legislation and I urge its adoption.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the rule has been ably explained. We all know what the joint resolution does. Under an agreement hammered out by the Democrats and the Republicans in Congress and the President, the joint resolution provides an 18-month time limit on the stationing of troops in Lebanon.

The Obey substitute is a diversion from that approach, limiting the time, in fact, to 90 days from August 29.

So the House will have an opportunity to vote on two different propositions.

Mr. Speaker, I support the compromise that has been hammered out by both sides of the aisle and the President.

I think it is so important to this country of ours that we stand behind our Commander in Chief. And he has given assurances that if any major change in the situation occurs he will come to the Congress for additional guidance.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of the rule. I urge that the reported version of the bill, be adopted and that the Obey amendment be defeated.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS).

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong opposition to this gag rule on an extremely important and momentous decision.

This is not some matter of governmental structure, it is not even a matter of funding another program or abolishing one.

We are talking about something today that could either lead us down a path to a bloody war and involvement in the death of Americans or could, if handled properly, lead us on a path of peace.

And why it was felt necessary to restrict the Members of this House in the way we are being restricted by this gag rule is totally beyond me.

This House is not being given a choice except between two alternatives; between an amendment to be offered by Mr. OBEY or Mr. LONG, on the one hand, and the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on the other.

Eighteen months of a blank check for deployment of our troops, that is just 1 month less than the U.S. involvement in World War I. But a blank check, without this House having an opportunity to make the determination whether another period of time such as 6 months or 9 months or some combination would be more appropriate to determine whether our forces should remain in Lebanon.

I do not advocate putting our tails between our legs and running because the situation is hot. The purpose of strong military forces is to use them where necessary and certainly, as a world leader, we have that responsibility. But no one has told us who the enemy of the Marines is there. Is it the Druze? Is it the Shiites? Are they going to go fight the Syrians? Or are they just going to sit there and be shot at for 18 months?

That is how the war in Vietnam escalated. I suggest to you the reason we have this type of Gulf of Tonkin resolution before us today is because there are people who do not want the American people, through their Representatives, to make the choice.

I have got to oppose this rule and I urge my colleagues to do likewise so we can have a full debate on this awesome issue.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes, for purposes of debate only, to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

Mr. OBEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose several questions to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BONIOR), if I may, about the structure of the rule.

As I understand it, this rule will provide the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs with an opportunity to offer whatever amendments he deems advisable, either before the Long-Obey substitute is voted upon or afterwards. Is that correct?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. If the gentleman will yield, that is correct. The rule will allow, at the discretion of the Chair, in what order said amendments that are made in order can be posed to the body.

Mr. OBEY. It also would provide—let us assume for a moment that the Long-Obey amendment were to be passed by the House today. As I understand it there would be a technical possibility under this rule for the Speaker to, at that point, simply take from the desk the Senate Joint Resolution 159 or a similar joint resolution passed by the Senate, and simply pass that in the House, and if we passed it in identical form, then obviate the necessity for a conference. Would that not be technically possible under the rule?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. If the gentleman will yield further, it is my understanding that that would be technically possible, yes; but not, I would also say to the gentleman, not unusual.

Mr. OBEY. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the technicalities of this rule bother me quite a bit because I think this is a serious, serious question we are facing today and from a technical standpoint I do not like what could theoretically happen under this rule. I do want to say, however, that I have been given the assurance by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), who is the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that he does not intend to offer amendments which would change in any major way the contents of the committee product, that they are contemplating probably only one amendment which would change the reporting cycle and another amendment which might have to do with a possible partitioning of Lebanon, and that he does not expect to see any other amendments offered.

If that is the understanding, then I have no problem because the theoretical possibility for sandbagging, to be frank about it, would appear not to be real. We would appear to be in a position where those theoretical possibilities would not be exercised by the committee.

□ 1040

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBEY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) has stated the intentions of the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee correctly.

Mr. OBEY. Let me also say that in reference to the theoretical possibility that the Speaker might, in effect, sidetrack the result of House debate if our substitute were to pass and pass the Senate version instead, I have also been assured by persons within the Speaker's office that that is not the intention of the Speaker and that that power is needed because of the peculiarities under the War Powers Act and also would be exercised only in the event that what had passed the Senate was relatively similar to what had passed the House.

And with that understanding, Mr. Speaker, while I do not like the idea that more alternatives are not available, because on something this important I would much prefer that they would be, and while I certainly do not like the theoretical possibilities available under the rule, it seems to me that we have reached an informal understanding about how the provisions of this rule will, in fact, be exercised, and so I would not express any special opposition to the rule.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia for purposes of debate only.

Mr. LEVITAS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I have some questions that I would like to put to my distinguished colleague from Michigan, who is managing this resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BONIOR) has expired.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume. And I yield to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS).

Mr. LEVITAS. As I understand it, no pro forma amendments will be in order under this rule; is that correct?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. That is correct.

Mr. LEVITAS. Second, as I see the rule in its present form, in effect there will be 4 hours of debate unless the gentleman from Wisconsin chooses to offer his amendment at the end.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. If the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) chooses to exercise his right under the rule there would be 4 hours.

Mr. LEVITAS. There would be 4 hours, but of the principal 4 hours that are provided, essentially 3 of the 4 hours will be controlled by individuals who are in favor of the resolution, and only 1 hour by individuals who support the Long-Obey situation, because, as I understand it, the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee and the ranking member of the Foreign Affairs Committee control the first 2 hours and then when the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) offer their amendment, there is a division of 1 hour controlled by opponents. So, in effect, we have got 3 hours of the 4 controlled by Members who are supporting; and only 1 hour made available to those of us who oppose.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. From a very technical reading of what the gentleman just said that is correct, but I would also suggest to my colleague, and perhaps the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) might want to respond to this, that I do not detect from the historic nature of this issue and from what I have heard from the leaders of the parties in this issue that there will be any attempt to squelch those who have differing views. In fact, that has been my policy in managing rules and it is now, as indicated by my willingness to yield and recognize Members who have differing views on the rule, and I suspect the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) and those Members on the other side of the aisle will cooperate the same way.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee fully supports the rule which provides 2 hours for general debate, the time to be divided equally to those who are in opposition to the resolution and to those who are supportive. Two hours is also provided under the rule for the Obey amendment, 1 hour on each side for those who are supporting the Obey amendment, and 1 hour to those who are opposed.

The 1 hour provided for any amendments that may be offered by the chairman of the committee will be equally divided with those who may oppose those amendments.

Mr. LEVITAS. If I may ask one last question, if the gentleman will continue to yield.

First of all, I would like to thank the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee for that assurance. As always he has demonstrated his fairness and his sense of propriety in a matter of this nature. And I appreciate that.

But as I understand it, and perhaps he might clarify this, it is my understanding that the chairman does not intend to offer an amendment as part of the package that he might at the end which would deal with a shortening of the time period provided in the basic resolution. For example, in the event—and I use this simply hypothetically—that during the general debate on the Long-Obey substitute it was clear that a substantial number of Members, perhaps even a majority, would prefer to support the resolution offered by the Foreign Affairs Committee, but for a shorter period of time, rather than the 18 months.

Would the gentleman from Wisconsin, the distinguished chairman, consider offering such an amendment as part of his package?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. If the gentleman will yield to me, at this point, there is no consensus for a shorter period than 18 months.

So in response to the gentleman I must say that the gentleman from Wisconsin at this time does not intend to offer such an amendment.

But I want to make it clear it does not preclude such an amendment from being offered and we will have to play it by ear until that time.

Mr. LEVITAS. I thank the gentleman from Michigan for yielding, for the candor as well as the fairness of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

I regret that we do not have under this rule the opportunity to provide those alternatives and it is for that reason that I must oppose the rule.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, we know that there is controversy on the time limit for keeping U.S. troops in Lebanon and on what should happen in Lebanon. But the Rules Committee labored hard and long up until 8:30 last evening trying to hammer out a rule to give the opposition room for debate on major alternatives. And it would be impractical to draft a rule allowing each individual in the House to express his or her views on the floor by amendment.

So I think the issue is crystal clear. There are those who oppose the measure and that is their prerogative.

But this is not a gag rule. I think it is a good rule. It should be adopted and I urge the adoption of the rule and the joint resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG), for purposes of debate only.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman has indicated before, he said for the Speaker to take over and substitute some other measure for what this House passes is not the usual procedure.

I want to protest that. We spent 4 hours last week in the Appropriations Committee passing an amendment which will be part of the Long-Obey amendment here today to cut off funds for any combat activity in the Middle East unless within 60 days the President should invoke the War Powers Act. And that was passed and a great many other things passed the Appropriations Committee which we considered worthwhile.

Apparently there was displeasure over that. The Speaker promptly nullified that with one device or another. I think the gentleman is right, it is not unusual. And yet I have known that never to happen before in my experience, in my 21 years in Congress. So it does seem to me that what we have here is the beginning of a kind of legislative dictatorship in which we are allowed to play around and do what we think we ought to do, and then if the leadership does not approve of this, they just simply scrub it and introduce something else.

I do not know what the Speaker intends to do this time, whether the assurances from somebody in his office are valid, but I certainly want to protest this type of action.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I thank my colleague for his comments.

Mr. Speaker, before I move the previous question, I yield myself such time as I may consume so that I may make a few comments with respect to the base resolution itself.

This has been for all of us a very agonizing and a very difficult decision. I personally visited Lebanon during the war some 15 months ago, and I met with the various leaders of the different factions. Since that time I have followed very closely in the print media and in the electronic media the day-by-day happenings in that troubled and war-torn land. As I talk to my colleagues on and off the floor of this House, I keep hearing from them their concerns about being pulled into another Vietnam.

We know today that U.S. foreign policy lives in the shadow of the Vietnam war. And as we watch this country extend our military involvement in foreign lands, whether they be in the Mideast or in Central America, it is imperative that we remember the painful cost of that war and certainly exercise extreme caution before committing American troops elsewhere in the world.

For those of us who were critical of the Vietnam war and who are vocal opponents of U.S. military intervention elsewhere in the world, most notably in Central America, it is especially important to be clear about the precise lessons of that venture some 20 years ago. The use of U.S. troops, I would add, is not, I believe, in itself inherently wrong. Likewise, I believe it is not inherently wrong for the United States to be involved in complex situations in remote and sometimes alien parts of the world. Nor is it inherently wrong for the United States to take part in actions that require high and perhaps sometimes very incalculable risks.

The War Powers Act, a principal legislative legacy of the Vietnam era, was designed to ensure that decisions to deploy U.S. troops is fully shared by Congress. The act is used just as effectively—and this is, I think, extremely important—when the Congress chooses to authorize the continued deployment of troops as when it requires that their deployment be stopped, be terminated.

House Joint Resolution 364 is an unequivocal statement of congressional war powers. Passage of this resolution will be the most significant step Congress has taken in a decade to prove it will exercise its authority, even when the President resists recognizing that authority. If the President signs this bill, he may chafe at its restrictions, but his caveats will not change its basic effect. He can ignore it only by placing himself outside of the law. I am convinced that our current involvement in the Middle East can be distinguished from the errors of the past and present U.S. policies elsewhere in the world. In Vietnam before and in Central America today, U.S. involvement has, I believe, been that of an aggressor nation. In the Middle East the United States has assumed a role of a conciliator. In Vietnam and Central America the United States has sought a military solution. Negotiations, at best, have been a facade to legitimatize military action and, at worst, have been ignored in favor of a military buildup.

In Lebanon the thrust of U.S. policy has been to encourage negotiations. Our military involvement has been reluctant and, in general, disciplined by efforts to establish the continuing peace efforts.

I have been impressed by the actions of this administration with respect to their foreign policy in the Middle East. I have not agreed with them with every decision they have made, but certainly our best people in foreign policy have devoted their time and energies to this part of the world. I am confident that people like Mr. McFarland, Mr. Habib before him, Mr. Veliotes and Secretary Shultz have a firm grasp and knowledge of the situation and have been acting and will continue to act in the best interests of this country.

We are now at the next step, which is broadening the base of the Lebanese Government. I think it would be foolhardy for this Congress to take actions that would undermine this administration in that process. For that reason, I would encourage my colleagues in this body to support the rule and then to support the compromise which has been worked out with the leadership of this body and the President.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOLAND). The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 306, nays 91, answered "present" 1, not voting 35, as follows:

Messrs. WEAVER, LONG of Maryland, SIKORSKI, NEILSON of Utah, BRYANT, FRANK, OBERSTAR, YATES, LEHMAN of Florida, SKELTON, McCLOSKEY, and TRAXLER changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. RANGEL changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MINISH). Pursuant to House Resolution 318, and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 364.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 364) providing statutory authorization under the war powers resolution for continued U.S. participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, with Mr. BOLAND in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the joint resolution is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) will be recognized for 1 hour, and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD) will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

□ 1120

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, today is a very historic day in Congress, because today the House of Representatives will determine whether the War Powers Act, enacted over the President's veto in 1973, is operative or whether it is a dead issue.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of House Joint Resolution 364, the multinational force in Lebanon resolution.

Mr. Chairman, the recent increasingly dangerous situation in Lebanon has raised serious questions in this Nation and among many Members of Congress as to the precise role of the U.S. marines in the multinational force, and how that role fits into overall U.S. policy in Lebanon and the Middle East. The death of four U.S. marines and the wounding of 38 others, which illustrated the clear applicability of section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution to the Lebanese situation, demands action by the Congress.

House Joint Resolution 364 addresses that demand in a responsible and effective fashion. The United States has been actively involved in diplomatic efforts over the past year and a half to restore Lebanon's territorial integrity and independence, and to promote national reconciliation in that strife-torn country.

These efforts have had considerable success. An Israeli-Lebanese agreement for the withdrawal of Israel's forces was concluded on May 17. Only a few days ago, a ceasefire between warring factions in Lebanon was concluded with active U.S. participation. As part of this diplomatic effort, the United States, together with France, Italy, and the United Kingdom, have contributed military forces to assist the Lebanese Government in restoring control over the Beirut area.

Without congressional authorization of the U.S. Marine presence in Lebanon, these intense diplomatic initiatives will be largely wasted. Moreover, several disastrous consequences would result if the marines were withdrawn from Lebanon. I will discuss those in a moment.

Let me make one thing emphatically clear: House Joint Resolution 364 is not an open-ended authorization for U.S. military involvement in Lebanon. Nor does it hamstring the President's ability to carry out an effective foreign policy.

It has a balance of congressional controls and Executive flexibility. Specifically, House Joint Resolution 364:

Provides a congressional finding that U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon are in hostilities requiring congressional authorization under the war powers resolution, and a congressional determination that section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution became operative on August 29, 1983 (section 4(a)(1), provides for a Presidential report when U.S. troops are sent into hostilities or situations of imminent involvement in hostilities);

Authorizes the continued presence of U.S. Armed Forces under section 5(b) of that resolution (section 5(b) provides for withdrawal of such troops within 60 days unless Congress has enacted authorization for a different time period);

Limits the functions of U.S. Armed Forces in accordance with the September 25, 1982, international agreement between the United States and Lebanon except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to insure the safety of the multinational force in Lebanon. That agreement limits the marine contingent to the Beirut area; places a ceiling of 1,200 on that force, and allows for self-defense;

Requires a semiannual reporting requirement on the status, scope, and duration of hostilities involving U.S. forces; the activities and present composition of the multinational force; the result of efforts to reduce and eventually eliminate the force; how continued U.S. participation in the force is advancing U.S. foreign policy interests in the Middle East; and what progress has occured toward national political reconciliation among all Lebanese groups;

Declares that other countries should continue to participate in the multinational force, that the United States should promote continuing discussions to bring about the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon, and that the United States should discuss with the Security Council of the United Nations, on an annual basis, the replacement of the multinational force by a U.N. Peacekeeping Force;

Stipulates that U.S. participation in the multinational force shall be authorized for purposes of the war powers resolution until the end of an 18-month period (unless the Congress extends such authorization), and that such authorization shall terminate sooner if all foreign forces are withdrawn from Lebanon (unless the President determines and certifies to the Congress that continued U.S. Armed Forces participation is required after such foreign forces withdraw up to the end of the 18-month period in order to establish Lebanese Government control of the Beirut area); when the United Nations or the Government of Lebanon is able to assume the responsibilities of the force; upon the implementation of other effective security arrangements in the area; or if all other countries participating in the force withdraw their forces;

Provides that nothing in the resolution precludes either the President or the Congress from directing the withdrawal of U.S. forces in Lebanon and that the resolution does not modify, limit, or supersede any provision of the war powers resolution or the requirement in the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983 for congressional authorization of any substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon.

Mr. Chairman, I am well aware there is great concern over the extension of the U.S. military presence for a period of up to 18 months. That concern must be weighed against the likely alternative of not providing such an extension.

The alternative is withdrawal. And the likely consequences of withdrawal are so detrimental as to make that alternative totally unacceptable.

First, U.S. withdrawal from the multinational force will most certainly lead to French and Italian withdrawal and the collapse of the force. Second, the collapse of the force will lead to complete anarchy, the likely disintegration of the Lebanese Central Government, and for all practical purposes the end of Lebanon as a country for the foreseeable future. Third, with the political disappearance of Lebanon, the prospects for the achievement of a comprehensive peace in the Middle East, the primary U.S. foreign policy objective in the region, will have been effectively foreclosed.

In addition to these vital considerations, there are three other sound and valid reasons why the 18-month period was chosen. These reasons are:

First, 18 months is likely to be long enough to prevent Syria from questioning U.S. resolve to maintain troops in Lebanon and wait out the marine presence and instead force it to negotiate in earnest for a comprehensive settlement in Lebanon.

Second, this length of time will carry the authorization for troop involvement past the 1984 elections, thus insulating the U.S. participation from partisan wrangling and election-year politics.

Third, the next administration, if one is elected, will have an opportunity to review the situation without time pressure. Continuity will also be demonstrated since the U.S. Marine presence will remain over the course of two different administrations.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, House Joint Resolution 364 is the product of intense and fruitful bipartisan cooperation. It is supported by the Democratic and Republican House leadership and the President. It represents the first full application of the war powers resolution as well as the first de facto endorsement of the war powers resolution by the executive branch. In exchange, the Congress authorizes the presence of U.S. forces in a properly controlled manner that will serve U.S. foreign policy interests.

I urge support for the adoption of House Joint Resolution 364 in its current form.

Mr. Chairman, to my remarks, I add the letter of President Reagan, assuring us that he will seek congressional authority to keep the marines in Lebanon beyond the 18-month period if necessary.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 27, 1983.

Hon. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CLEM: I know you were as gratified as I with Sunday's announcement of a cease fire in Lebanon. While there were many things that contributed to the cease fire, it is my belief that your ageement to advance the compromise resolution on war powers—and the favorable action by the Foreign Affairs and Foreign Relations Committees—were particularly important. At a crucial point, your agreement and the supporting committee actions expressed a commitment to bipartisanship in U.S. foreign policy. Please accept my thanks.

Let me also take this opportunity to clarify an issue with respect to the interpretation of the compromise resolution. The compromise resolution refers to the requirements of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act; I gather that a question has arisen as to the Executive Branch's understanding and intention in this regard. My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act: It would be my intention to seek Congressional authorization—as contemplated by the Act—if circumstances require any substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. armed forces in Lebanon.

In addition, regarding the Administration's intentions with respect to the 18-month time period, I can assure you that if our forces are needed in Lebanon beyond the 18-month period, it would be my intention to work together with the Congress with a view toward taking action on mutually acceptable terms.

Again let me thank you for your support for the compromise agreement. I believe its prompt enactment will only further improve the chances for the stable peace we seek in Lebanon.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

Mr. Chairman, since the President's letter was released yesterday, expressions of concern have been voiced regarding what some see as ambiguity in the letter's third paragraph.

That paragraph states the President's "intention to work together with Congress" if the marines are needed in Lebanon beyond the 18-month period.

In an effort to eliminate any ambiguity in those words and to make absolutely precise and clear what the President will do, I sought a clarification from high-level White House officials.

From those officials, I now have an assurance that it is the President's explicit intention to seek congressional approval to keep U.S. forces in Lebanon beyond the 18-month period, if that is necessary.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, let me take this opportunity to praise the Democratic leadership of the House for its cooperation in working with the administration to make this joint effort possible.

I am not enthused about the situation in which we find ourselves in Lebanon. It is difficult and dangerous. But it is also crucially important to the future of Lebanon, the entire Middle East, and our own national security.

We can not afford to cut and run. Nor can we afford to telegraph our punches by setting an arbitrary deadline a few months from now when we will cut and run.

This resolution gives the President the flexibility he needs without giving an advantage to our adversaries. And, it involves the Congress in the decisionmaking process.

Congress can be a part of that process, but it can not make battefield judgments 3 or 6 or 9 months in advance. Only the Commander in Chief can do that in consultation with our allies.

I am confident this President is aware of the pitfalls of the past and will withdraw U.S. forces just as quickly as he feels practical.

Let us take a look at Lebanon and the Middle East for a moment so that we can better understand how this joint resolution will play a key role in supporting our foreign policy goals in that region.

Since the October 1973 war, the United States has been continuously engaged in some sort of Middle East diplomacy. That region is strategically located, and we are pursuing our commitments to Israel and to our Arab friends. President Reagan's Middle East peace initiative offers a sound and workable basis for negotiations. His program is designed to bring about a just, secure, and comprehensive solution to the age-old conflicts in that area.

The current problems in Lebanon cannot be isolated from the larger Middle East crisis. It involves the same questions of security, respect for national sovereignty, and peaceful resolution of disputes. To advance toward a peaceful solution in Lebanon will contribute to the broader peace process in the entire region.

Our Nation's objectives in Lebanon include the withdrawal of all external forces from that country and a sovereign, independent Lebanon. In addition, security for Israel's vulnerable northern borders is important.

With the end to widespread fighting in Beirut last summer, President Gemayel began to work toward political accommodation. He called for dialog and national reconciliation.

The United States dispatched about 1,200 U.S. marines to Lebanon in response to that Government's requests for a multinational force. The force is designed to insure the Lebanese Government's sovereignty and authority. It also assures the safety of people in the area. Syrian forces, terrorist groups, and others have challenged the MNF. There are obviously elements in Lebanon who oppose an internal settlement of the conflict. We have responded to attacks on our troops in order to protect our personnel.

It is critical that our marines be allowed to stay. They are part of our overall plan to help create conditions in which stability can be established. Our marines are an important deterrent. Most importantly, they are a symbol of the international backing behind the legitimate Government of Lebanon.

I know there are risks involved. Any important undertaking involves risks.

What is the alternative? Withdrawal of our forces? U.S. withdrawal would almost certainly bring about the collapse of the MNF. Complete chaos would most likely follow along with the collapse of the Gemayel government.

Lebanon would undoubtedly be divided up and would disappear as an independent sovereign country.

What would happen, then, to U.S. foreign policy goals in the Middle East? I believe that all of you will agree that bringing the boys back home is emotionally appealing but disastrous for America's interests in that volatile region.

I am delighted to say that we in this Congress realize that Lebanon is a challenge that all of us face together. The issues are not partisan ones. At stake are the goals of American foreign policy and the integrity of a friendly country.

In this spirit, I ask my colleagues to join me in supporting this resolution. It is one that is in keeping with U.S. policy interests and congressional prerogatives.

□ 1130

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL).

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I think all Members will agree that the action we take today makes one of the most important constitutional statements on the issue of separation of powers in this Nation's 200-year history. I believe that House Joint Resolution 364 strikes a positive and workable balance between Presidential prerogatives and congressional authority. Furthermore, this resolution makes a positive statement of our unshakable commitment as a nation to the achievement of unity, independence, territorial integrity and national political reconciliation in Lebanon, and our larger goal of achieving a peaceful solution in the Middle East.

The tortured path to progress in the Middle East often frustrates Americans who are used to solving problems—whatever their character—in an efficient, expeditious manner. The problems in the Middle East are not of our making, nor have they been created overnight by the citizens of the countries in the region. The problems we see are centuries old. Lebanon alone has endured 8 years of a brutal civil war. The solution will only come about in a slow, often labored manner.

Yet we have made some progress. An Israeli-Lebanese agreement for the withdrawal of Israel's forces was finally concluded on May 17, President Amin Gemayel has made several efforts to achieve national reconciliation, power sharing, and a broad-based national government involving Lebanon's various religious and ethnic groups. In recent days, a fragile cease fire has been negotiated. The United States has encouraged and actively participated in these efforts.

Unfortunately, Syria continues to stand as a challenge and an obstruction to this progress. It has continually refused to withdraw it troops, despite its claims that it would do so if Israel withdrew. Furthermore, Syria has permitted the reentry of armed Palestinian troops into Lebanon in violation of the August 1982, international agreements, thereby further obstructing the process of national reconciliation in Lebanon. In addition, it has instigated political opposition within Lebanon to the negotiation of a cease fire, and armed several factions in military actions against the Gemayel government.

Because of Syria's intransigence, and to insure that the progress made thus far is not endangered further, we must take effective action to insure that the U.S. Marine presence in Lebanon is maintained and congressionally authorized. We cannot withdraw our forces without endangering the entire multinational force and playing into the hands of those who do not want peace in the Middle East.

This resolution is a solid, statesmanlike, and bipartisan act which will underscore the progress already made, and pave the way for the next steps toward national reconciliation in Lebanon.

One of the most important aspects of this resolution is the 18-month authorization of U.S. participation in the multinational force. This period of time was not chosen at random. It is desirable for a number of reasons:

First, 18 months is likely to be long enough to prevent Syria from questioning U.S. resolve to maintain troops in Lebanon and wait out the Marine presence and instead force it to negotiate in earnest for a comprehensive settlement in Lebanon.

Second, this length of time will carry the authorization for troop involvement past the 1984 elections, thus insulating the U.S. participation from partisan wrangling and election-year politics;

Third, the next administration will have an opportunity to review the situation without time pressure. Continuity will also be demonstrated since the U.S. Marine presence will remain over the course of two different administrations.

Mr. Chairman, there are some who disagree with the thrust of this resolution, and who would like to limit Presidential actions more severely by invoking a constitutional crisis rather than applying the war powers resolution as provided in the basic resolution before us.

Specifically, the Obey-Long substitute would require the President to invoke section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution by the end of November or at the end of any month thereafter, unless he certifies that a cease-fire is in effect and is being observed by all parties. Second, this substitute cuts off all funds for U.S. military operations in Lebanon if by the end of November the President has neither certified that a cease-fire exists nor invoked section 4(a)(1) of the war power resolution. Finally, it triggers the war powers resolution if the President fails to make the necessary determinations at the end of any subsequent 30-day period.

This substitute, if adopted, would effectively insure a series of confrontations between the President and the Congress. It would make a mockery of our attempts to produce a workable, effective and coherent foreign policy reponse to the current situation in the Middle East. A 90-day cutoff followed by 30-day certifications encourages continued Syrian obstructionism and increased violence. By contrast, the 18-month extension in the resolution is long enough to prevent Syria from questioning U.S. resolve to maintain troops in Lebanon. It will carry the authorization past the 1984 elections and out of an intense, partisan debate which could harm long-term U.S. foreign policy interests. Furthermore, an 18-month time period will enable any new administration to review the situation without time pressure.

By contrast, the substitute actually postpones congressional decision and on an ultimate policy. In all probability the substitute would produce a Presidential veto and a continuation of the current constitutional impasse.

Mr. Chairman, I believe one more point is important on the constitutional issue. The war powers resolution has not been dormant since its enactment in 1973. On nine separate occasions, Presidents have submitted reports under this resolution. These included three instances related to evacuations at the end of the Vietnam war, the Mayaguez incident, the Iranian hostage rescue attempt, and the Sinai multinational force. In the Sinai case, the dispatch of forces had been authorized by the Congress for specific purposes and the President reported that he did not expect them to become involved in hostilities.

These examples indicate that the war powers resolution is, indeed, workable. Even though there have been instances—such as the case of El Salvador and military exercises in Central America, the transport of European troops to Zaire in 1978, and the evacuation of civilians from Cyprus in 1974 and from Lebanon in 1976—where the President did not report formally to the Congress, the utility of the war powers resolution has been demonstrated. Today, we demonstrate even more clearly that it is possible for the President and the Congress to work together to further U.S. short term and long term foreign policy interests. I commend my colleagues on the Foreign Affairs Committee for their statesmanlike work on this compromise and urge all Members of this body to join us in this historic bipartisan effort.

In summation, I think that the basic question which all of us must answer is: Are the national security and other interests of the United States being best served by the U.S. military force being part of the multinational force in Lebanon.

I think it is quite clear, even on a cursory reading of the record and examination of the facts, that the answer is yes. For a long period of time the United States has had vital security, economic and political interests in Lebanon, the Middle East, and the Persian Gulf, all of which are familiar to all of us.

It seems to me that on the better part of judgment one in making his decision would have to come down on the side of every President since President Eisenhower, in concluding that the vital interests, the national interests, the security interests, the economic and political interests of the United States are at stake in this area, and that it is worth the effort and the sacrifice that must be made. The Congress must join in any decision with the President, for the United States to maintain its presence; to accomplish the objectives which have been defined by the President, by the committee report, and by the facts.

I would add only one other thing: The Congress always has control. We can impeach if we like, if we can make a case. We can cut the President's funds off anytime the Congress wants to, even after this resolution we are considering has become law. We can pass a resolution any time we see fit to pass a resolution dealing with the issue, either withdrawing the troops, making changes in the agreement which now exists with respect to the multinational force or taking such other action as it seems necessary for us to take.

The reason we provided an 18-month limit in this resolution is to give the President sufficient time and flexibility so that it does not disadvantage the position of the United States and our men who are part of the multinational force; to exercise the power and authority of the Congress under the War Powers Act; and to establish, with the President, U.S. policy now—not later—and finally to avoid a constitutional crisis.

For all these reasons, I urge my colleagues to support the pending resolution.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maine (Ms. SNOWE).

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, we meet today to discuss House Joint Resolution 364, which authorizes the continued presence of U.S. troops in the multinational peacekeeping force (MNF) in Lebanon. The situation in that troubled country has improved in the past few days with the establishment of a cease-fire. I believe that the United States has helped to make this possible, and I hope—as we all do—that the cease-fire will hold and permit the process of national reconciliation in Lebanon to take place.

Clearly, there can be no military solution to the problems of Lebanon, problems that precede its existence as a state. Only a political solution, arrived at through the willingness of the Lebanese sectarian groups to compromise and reapportion power, has a chance of renewing Lebanon and creating a strong country no longer susceptible to disturbances from outside forces.

We must be realistic, however, and realize that a cease-fire may not hold. Fighting could erupt at any time. Thus, the situation in Lebanon and the presence of our troops there warrants our continued vigilance.

I did not favor sending American troops to Lebanon last year, even with the limited purpose of supervising the evacuation of the PLO and the 30-day deadline. I was deeply concerned when they returned last year at the invitation of Mr. Gemayel's government for an unspecified period and for the broader aim of restoring "the territorial integrity, sovereignty, and political independence of Lebanon—to bring lasting peace to that country."

It was not clear at that time, nor is it today, how far the United States would be willing to commit itself to achieving this goal. When U.S. forces were sent to Lebanon, they were explicitly prohibited from engaging in combat. Yet as Secretary Shultz pointed out in his testimony before the Foreign Affairs Committee last week, U.S. troops always have the right of self-protection. So, when the marines were fired on, the Marines returned fire. It was then only a logical extension of their self-defense that a naval task force off the coast of Beirut provided artillery support for the Marines, followed by air support.

When the administration said that U.S. airpower and artillery might be used if Lebanese Armed Forces were attacked in positions of strategic importance for the eventual defense of the Marines, it seemed to me that the concept of self-defense of the Marines was being extended to the fortunes of the Lebanese Army. On September 20, two U.S. Navy ships off Beirut fired dozens of shells in support of Lebanese Army units to aid in the defense of Suk al-Gharb, a town with a commanding view of Beirut to the west and of Syrian and Druze-controlled areas to the east.

I recite these facts because it illustrates my greatest fear: that we were reacting to events, not acting in accordance with a clearly defined and limited plan. No one wants to endanger the lives of our Marines by limiting their ability to defend themselves. But, in pursuit of the broad goal of peace and political stability for Lebanon, I fear that our involvement could grow in increments if not limited in advance.

Despite my reservations about the presence of U.S. troops in Lebanon and my belief that the War Powers Act should have been invoked when the U.S. Marines were sent into conditions where their lives were in danger, I voted in favor of House Joint Resolution 364 in the Foreign Affairs Committee.

I supported this bipartisan compromise, which implicitly acknowledges the War Powers Act, because a more viable plan was not presented. The resolution imposes limitations on the administration's actions in Lebanon and requires that the President report to Congress at least every 6 months on all aspects of or troop involvement.

I also supported the amendment, passed by voice vote, requiring that the U.S. troops withdraw if all other participants in the MNF withdraw and are not replaced by other nations' forces. This is essential to insure that the peacekeeping effort remain the concern and responsibility of the community of nations.

The immediate withdrawal of our troops is not a realistic option, however tempting it might be. In addition to destroying the image of the United States as a reliable participant in world affairs, the sudden withdrawal of our troops would unquestionably jeopardize U.S. national interests in the Mideast. The fall of the Gemayel government and the collapse of the Lebanese Army is only in the interest of those who seek to profit from chaos in the region.

Although House Joint Resolution 364 extends the paticipation of the U.S. troops in the MNF for another 18 months, it is clearly the intent of Congress that all possible efforts be made to bring about a speedy resolution to the conflict in Lebanon.

It is also the intent of Congress that the powers of the President to enlarge the scope of U.S. involvement be strictly limited. For this reason, the resolution contains a provisions requiring congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of the U.S. troops in Lebanon. The President affirmed today his intention to adhere to this provision.

It is possible, as some people claim, that the problems of Lebanon defy solution. I believe, however, that the United States can play a useful role and that this may be the one opportunity we can use to advance peace.

□ 1140

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Nevada (Mr. REID).

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, it was Georges Clemenceau who said: "War is too important to be left to the generals."

It was the U.S. Constitution which first said, in effect, that war was also too important to be left to the decision of any one person, no matter how knowledgable or how wise,

The Constitution provides to this Congress, as representatives of the people, the sole and exclusive power to declare war. That power, and its responsible exercise, is our right, and it is our duty. No one can take it from us.

At the same time, under the Constitution, the President is the Commander in Chief of our Nation's Armed Forces. That dichotomy of powers creates an inherent conflict between our branch and the executive, not unintentional on the part of the Founding Fathers.

Like many of the checks and balances in that marvelous document, that conflict is designed to make both branches consider carefully the direction in which they take this country.

And yet, ours is an age of instant information and instant emergency. How can the President fulfill his duty to defend this Nation in emergencies without time for consultation and reflection, and still remain faithful to our overriding law?

The compromise contained in this joint resolution addresses that problem. It maintains congressional responsibility but allows the President the latitude he must have to conduct foreign policy and defend his Nation.

Our troops in Lebanon and off its coast face hostile guns to give that nation an opportunity to construct a lasting peace.

None have more dedication to creating and maintaning peace than those who, like our marines have seen combat. No one could serve his country in a nobler way than by risking his life to enhance the search for that peace.

We all strive for a world without war. The President spoke recently to the United Nations and made it clear that our national goal is peace. Whether and how we achieve that peace will be the ultimate test of our service to our country and to future generations.

There is, however, peace in the silence of the grave;

There is peace in the silence of the vanquished.

Neither is acceptable.

Neither would constitute fulfillment of our duties.

I ask you to support this resolution because it preserves in this instance, and for the future, our congressional prerogatives, but permits the President to apply effectively this Nation's resources to maintaining the peace. It allows our Armed Forces to extend their defense of the peace to those flashpoints of the globe which could otherwise engulf us in instant, terrible, and final war.

The exercise of our constitutional powers to prevent such war is one of our most important duties.

It is also our right.

And, I ask you to join me in supporting this resolution as an exercise of that right and duty.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH).

Mr. ROTH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

It is not easy to disagree with the Commander in Chief. It is painful to disagree with Members I respect so much, like our ranking member, and the chairman of the committee, and the many members of our Foreign Affairs Committee. But as has already been said, today is the day we must all follow our conscience.

> Forward, the Light Brigade
> Was there a man dismayed?
> Not though the soldier knew
> Someone had blundered:
> Theirs not to make reply,
> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do or die:
> Into the valley of death
> Rode the Six Hundred.

But, unlike the soldiers in Tennyson's poem, ours is to ask why. Ours is to make a reply.

For this Congress to give an open-ended commitment to keep the marines in Lebanon for 18 months is to court disaster. Our marines are in a no-win situation in Lebanon and so is America, and here is why:

We must observe Lebanon from the perspective of history and the region. Lebanon was not an independent country until after World War II. Its constitution was based on a fragile relationship and a balance of power between Christian and Moslem communities.

The balance has been destroyed, not only by the civil war but by the fact that the Moslems outnumber Christians in that country. And now the Druze, an offshoot of Islam, want their share of power in Lebanon.

Stop and analyze the situation.

We have 45,000 Syrians in Lebanon, 12,000 Israelis, 6,000 U.N. troops, thousands upon thousands of Moslems and Christian Militiamen, the PLO, the Iranians, and with all of that we are told that we have to have 1,200 U.S. marines to keep the peace.

Why, they could no more keep the peace in Lebanon than you can bring back the dead.

Lebanon is a trap. Lebanon is a quagmire and we are getting in deeper and deeper.

For our marines, Lebanon is a tragedy waiting to happen.

To keep the marines there for 18 months is to ask for real trouble. And as the adage says, if you go around looking for trouble, you will find it.

The Secretary of State has said that the solution does not lend itself to a military solution, that it must be a political solution. Then let us send the politicians and bring the marines back home.

But my revulsion comes when we hear that we need 18 months so as to take this issue past the 1984 election. So that we do not have to face this as an election year issue.

Do not believe it. If you keep the marines there for 18 months there will be many Americans killed. That is a cinch. And it will be the biggest election year issue in 1984, as well it should be, and as well it will be.

No; to keep 1,200 marines in Lebanon is begging for a tragedy to happen. Many young Americans are bound to be killed, and I ask you: For what?

Read the resolution. It is a blueprint for castastrophe. There is no light at the end of this tunnel.

Do not follow this Pied Piper. Do not be stampeded. Do not ride into this valley of death.

No one ever asked me or ever asked you originally about sending marines into Lebanon, did they? So why should we give carte blanche our imprimatur to this action.

My friends, consider your vote very carefully. This is probably the most important vote that you are going to cast in your time here in Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) has consumed 4 minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG).

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, let me make a couple of points clear.

First, the alternative to this amendment is not an immediate withdrawal. To say that it does is setting up a straw man. Under no circumstances do I, or I believe most of the supporters of this measure, propose any immediate withdrawal.

As a matter of fact, I think even the 18 month period sets up a time which the Syrians can then hold out for.

The amendment which we propose to offer sets up no time, but simply leaves it to Congress.

I want to ask this question of the chairman: The Speaker read yesterday a statement from the President in which he said he would ask for congressional authorization if there was a substantial expansion of forces. What is a substantial expansion? Do we have any clarification?

Is it 500 more marines, 1,200 more, 2,000 more? Are the naval and Air Force personnel and equipment included in what they mean by a substantial expansion? Could the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not think we have any precise number that we can give the gentleman. He obviously raises a very good question.

I will give the gentleman my impression. It is that if the administration were to commit an additional unit, such as a battalion of marines to the Beirut area, that would be clearly a substantial expansion.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. But that would be the gentleman's idea and not necessarily the President's?

Mr. HAMILTON. That is my impression on the basis of listening to the testimony, and we have no exact figure.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. That is what bothers me. There is no real clarification here from the President.

The other thing I wanted to ask about, he said if there is an extension beyond 18 months then he would meet with Congress, he would work with Congress, and try to find a more acceptable time.

What does that mean? Does that mean ask for a war declaration? Would he agree to withdraw forces if Congress refused to declare war or otherwise refuse to accept the President's policy.

□ 1150

Would he cancel? Would he pull the people back if he did not get a war declaration?

I think that is what we mean, what we need to know.

Is that what he means by "consult the Congress" or does he mean that he will call a few of the leaders who, he knows, agree with him and get an agreement to go ahead?

Mr. HAMILTON. If the gentleman will yield further, I really cannot go beyond the language of the letter of the President. He says, as I know the gentleman from Maryland knows, that "I can assure you that if our forces are needed in Lebanon beyond the 18-month period it would be my intention to work together with the Congress with a view toward taking action on mutually acceptable terms."

Mr. LONG of Maryland. What we need, would the gentleman not agree, is a commitment from the President that he will withdraw them if he does not get congressional approval and will not, thereupon, let us say, veto some measure that the Congress takes or some expression of disapproval, because if he does that we are dead, because we can never pass, we can never overcome the President with one-third of either House plus one person voting to sustain a veto.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. LAGOMARSINO).

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 364, authorizing continued U.S. participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon, under the war powers resolution.

This resolution, reflecting the bipartisan leadership agreement, represents a compromise with which few are really satisfied. But when you consider the alternatives, none are acceptable in relation to our interests elsewhere. If some say, as they do, that our priority should be in the Western Hemisphere, then it is necessary to emphasize that a demonstration of our resolve in the Middle East underlines our willingness to fulfill our commitments wherever they are made, whether in the Middle East or in Central America.

The truly significant aspect of the issue is that our national security interests must not be overlooked in a debate on the principles of the war powers resolution. For awhile the uncertainty of a U.S. commitment served only to weaken the effectiveness of the United States in trying to resolve the conflict in Lebanon. The accommodation between the President and the Congress as represented by this resolution allows us to focus on our major concern of the withdrawl of all foreign forces from Lebanon; the establishment of an independent Lebanon with a sovereign government; and the security of Israel's northern border.

Frankly, I believe the achievement of this bipartisan, executive-legislative agreement served to pave the way for the cease-fire in Lebanon, because it demonstrated to the Syrians that they were not going to be able to intimidate the United States into withdrawing. As fragile as it may be, the cease-fire is an important first step toward a political, negotiated settlement designed to achieve our objectives in Lebanon.

The presence of the multinational force in Lebanon, with U.S. Marines as a contingent of that force, is designed to help insure the Lebanese Government's sovereignty, security, and authority. U.S. strategy is to help create conditions that will lead to a political settlement in Lebanon and the withdrawal of all foreign forces.

The U.S. presence, as reflected by the marines, cannot provide the sole stimulus for a solution. But they are an important element, and their premature withdrawal would have put both the Lebanese Government and our objectives for peace in the Middle East in jeopardy. Even the anticipation of an early unilateral withdrawal would adversely affect our interests and endanger the lives of the marines.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, no one is truly satisfied with compromise positions, but considering the alternatives, I believe this resolution offers the best approach to an extremely sensitive and delicate issue. I urge my colleagues to support fully House Joint Resolution 364.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution, in support of the long substitute which will be offered somewhat later on in the debate.

As of August 29 the President, under the law, had 2 days in which to report that U.S. forces were in hostilities or in situations where imminent involvement in hostilities was clearly indicated by the circumstances.

That is what the existing law in the War Powers Act says. The House is now faced with two problems. No. 1, how to protect the integrity of the existing law, the War Powers Act; No. 2, even more importantly than protecting the constitutional prerogative, the question of what U.S. policy in Lebanon ought to be.

Whatever our response is today it ought to take into account both necessities.

The answer of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the resolution now before us is that Congress should authorize the continued presence of armed forces in Lebanon for up to 18 months. We believe that would be a profound mistake.

We want Congress to withhold that kind of a commitment for the time being and our substitute would do simply this: It would do two things: It would say that the President is given until the end of November, 90 days from the first American casualty, to either report under the War Powers Act the obvious, that our troops have been in a combat situation, or else to certify that the existing cease fire is holding and that real progress is being made on the political front in Lebanon to try to broaden the base of the Gemayel government and to resolve the political difference between presently divided parties.

If the President refused to do either, either to certify that the cease-fire was holding or to report under the War Powers Act, then we would exercise our constitutional prerogative, of which there can be no doubt, namely to cut off funds for the support of the operation in Lebanon.

If the President did certify under the War Powers Act, then the war powers clock would tick and Congress would have the 60 days listed in the law to decide what our appropriate response would be. And if the President exercised the other option to certify that a cease-fire was in existence, then he would have to report to this Congress every 30 days as to whether or not the cease-fire existed or he would have to report under the War Powers Act that it was not in existence any longer and our troops were in a confrontation situation.

That amendment does not cut and run; that amendment does not withdraw troops; it does not set short deadlines which the Syrians can outwait us on, but it does create equal pressure on the Syrians to negotiate and on the Gemayel government to broaden its base.

It is a reasonable compromise between those who want to commit the Congress to an 18 months presence in Lebanon and those who feel that we ought to withdraw immediately. We try to cut a middle ground, and we defend the prerogatives of the Congress under the War Powers Act by buttressing that prerogative with another constitutional prerogative; namely, the right to cut off funds.

In doing that, we do not force withdrawal, we do give the President more time, but we do enforce the law and I think that is a decent compromise between the two extremes which have been suggested.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBEY. I yield to the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. PEPPER. Is the gentleman's amendment predicated upon the assumption of the validity of the War Powers Act?

Mr. OBEY. Yes; it is.

Mr. PEPPER. I am glad to hear that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCCAIN).

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. Chairman, it is with great reluctance that I rise in opposition to this resolution. I am well known for my respect for the President of the United States and for supporting his policies. I do not believe the President should be restricted in fulfilling his constitutionally mandated responsibility of conducting our Nation's foreign policy. However, when called on to make a judgment, as I am by this legislation, I have a responsibility to my constituents to carefully evaluate the alternatives, using whatever resources are at my command.

I have agonized over this issue, not only because of my personal experiences, but, more importantly, because of my training in military doctrine, strategy, and tactics. Gen. Maxwell Taylor, in an interview given shortly after the Indochina conflict, stated the conditions under which he thought it appropriate to introduce American combat troops overseas. First, the objectives of the involvement must be explainable to the man in the street in one or two sentences. Second, there must be clear support of the President by the Congress for the involvement. Third, there must be a reasonable expectation of success. Fourth, we must have the support of our allies for our objectives. And finally, there must be a clear U.S. national interest at stake. I do not view the U.S. involvement in Lebanon as meeting General Taylor's criteria.

I have listened carefully to the explanations offered for our involvement in Lebanon. I do not find them convincing.

The fundamental question is "What is the United States interest in Lebanon?" It is said we are there to keep the peace. I ask, what peace? It is said we are there to aid the government. I ask, what government? It is said we are there to stabilize the region. I ask, how can the U.S. presence stabilize the region?

Since 1975-76, we have seen a de facto partition of Lebanon. I see little possibility of this changing any time soon. I ask you, will the Lebanese Army ever be strong enough to drive out the Syrians, let alone the PLO? If the answer to this question is no, as I believe it is, then we had better be prepared to accept a lengthy and deeper involvement in the area.

I ask my colleagues, what incentive is there for the Syrians to engage in constructive peace talks? What do they gain from a peaceful Lebanon? Do you really think naval forces off the Lebanese coast is going to intimidate the Syrians so much so that they engage in meaningful negotiations? For this to occur, the Syrians must believe we will use the full military power at our disposal. Are we prepared to use this power? I do not think so nor do I believe the Syrians think so.

The longer we stay in Lebanon, the harder it will be for us to leave. We will be trapped by the case we make for having our troops there in the first place.

What can we expect if we withdraw from Lebanon? The same as will happen if we stay. I acknowledge that the level of fighting will increase if we leave. I regretfully acknowledge that many innocent civilians will be hurt. But I firmly believe this will happen in any event.

What about our allies and our worldwide prestige? We should consult with our allies and withdraw with them in concert, if possible, unilaterally if necessary. I also recognize that our prestige may suffer in the short term but I am more concerned with our long-term national interests. I believe the circumstances of our original involvement have changed and I know of four American families who share this view.

I am not calling for an immediate withdrawal of our forces. What I desire is as rapid withdrawal as possible.

I do not forsee obtainable objectives in Lebanon, I believe the longer we stay, the more difficult it will be to leave, and I am prepared to accept the consequences of our withdrawal. I will vote in opposition to this resolution.

□ 1200

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER).

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak in opposition to the resolution as crafted by Members of this body. And I would also like to compliment my colleague from Arizona. I do not know how many Members have had the opportunity to meet and discuss such matters with our colleague from Arizona. I have gotten to know him fairly well over the last few months. Although we are of different parties, in many ways we are of a similar spirit.

And for those Members who do not know JOHN, who have not had a chance, because he is new here, to meet and talk with him, he comes to this well on this matter with some experience. JOHN spent a number of years, I think 6, as a prisoner of war in Vietnam. He served his country and served it well. He is not one to turn his back on the need for America to be strong, on a strong national defense, on the need for a global presence. He has given a large part of his life to that pursuit.

And so when a man like JOHN MCCAIN stands before this body and says a resolution that gives a blanket OK for an 18-month extension, carte blanche, in Lebanon is not in America's best interest, I think we ought to pay attention to that.

And I thank JOHN for his comments.

Mr. Chairman, I would say further that some Members of this body almost cavalierly say that 18 months is not that much time. Well, that is easy to say when you are not ducking behind a sandbag. That is easy to say if you do not have a historical perspective. America was in World War I for 19 months and 5 days. We have been in Lebanon for 12 months and now we are asking for 18 months more.

I would close by saying, let us kill this resolution and adopt instead the Long-Obey substitute.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN).

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 364 and commend the distinguished chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) and our ranking member, and gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD) for their skillful and diligent efforts in expeditiously bringing to the House this extremely important compromise measure. I believe this legislation, invoking the war powers resolution and authorizing our Nation's participation in the multinational peacekeeping forces in Lebanon for an 18-month period, is a measure which deserves strong bipartisan support. It is a vehicle by which the administration and the Congress can demonstrate each others proper exercise of authority in addressing the troublesome and dangerous situation which has emerged in Lebanon.

Secretary of State Shultz, when he appeared before our House Committee on Foreign Affairs, thoughtfully analyzed our role in Lebanon, stating:

> Our objectives in Lebanon have from the beginning, been essentially threefold:
> The withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon
> A sovereign independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout its national territory; and
> Security for Israel's northern border, so that the inhabitants of northern Israel can live in safety, without fear of artillery and rockets.

Passage of this measure (H.J. Res. 364) will provide the groundwork upon which these objectives can best be achieved, while at the same time providing important appropriate safeguards to protect our Marine peacekeeping forces.

I commend the bipartisan House leadership and the administration in acting quickly and thoughtfully in developing the resolution before us. The critical situation in the Middle East and particularly in Lebanon demands that our Nation demonstrate its resolve to honor its commitment to a legitimate Lebanese Government. A government which is seeking our assistance to protect its fundamental rights against external threats bent only on continued destabilization and violence within the region. The United States and other nations acting responsibly in the search for peace have been able to effect a fragile cease-fire as we further explore ways to achieve a lasting cessation of hostilities—a comprehensive settlement.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to demonstrate a united foreign policy front in implementing this carefully crafted resolution which best protects the interests of the United States, the legitimate rights of Lebanon, and provides the basis for our further pursuit of peace throughout the Middle East.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS).

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that I believe that everyone, the leadership on both sides in this House, is acting from the best of motives. I do not question their good faith.

I do question the judgments which they have made in coming to the policy conclusions embodied in the Zablocki resolution. I oppose that resolution and would support instead the Obey-Long resolution as a substitute.

I want to focus, because of the limited amount of time that we have, on one aspect of this debate which has received scant attention. I characterize it at the outset as what I consider to be the disservice which this resolution and its ramifications will do to America's strategic interests as well as Israel's national security.

□ 1210

I raise the issue because the Secretary of State has been quoted as saying that one of the effects of this resolution and continued American military presence in Lebanon will be to safeguard Israel's northern borders. This from an administration which only 6 months ago was exerting extreme pressure solely on Israel to agree to remove its forces from Lebanon with no corollary pressure on the Syrian Government.

Mr. Chairman, the fact is that Israel has made a very sound national security determination of its own that the area in the Beirut sector was indefensible, and that the way to safeguard Israel's security was to remove its forces to a militarily defensible area. That is what Israel has done.

The danger that I see flowing from the Zablocki resolution is that if the cease-fire breaks, as there is every likelihood that it will, and our Marines start getting shot at again and some more of them are killed, the American people will turn not only against our military presence in Lebanon but also against maintaining support of our strategic interests in the entire Middle East. There are people in this country who will be only too ready to blame Israel for American casualties. There will inevitably be an erosion of American support for Israel. That is the very dangerous path down which the Zablocki resolution and the Reagan policy take us.

Lest you think that I am alone in this projection of likely consequences, let be quote a news item, datelined Tel Aviv, September 24, Reuters, in which Yitzhak Rabin, the former Prime Minister of Israel is reported as stating that:

> If something serious happened to the United States marines who are part of the multinational force in Beirut, the United States would blame Israel.
> We must, therefore, explain to the American people that the U.S. presence in Lebanon serves American interests, that is to save the regime of President Amin Gemayel. We did not ask them, the American forces, to go to Lebanon. They are not serving Israeli interests.

The entire article reads as follows:

> ISRAELI ASSERTS MARINES ARE A PROP FOR GEMAYEL
> TEL AVIV, September 24.—Former Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said today that Israel must make clear to the American public that United States forces in Lebanon are not there at Israel's request.
>
> In an interview with the Israeli radio, Mr. Rabin, a leader in the opposition Labor Party, predicted that if something serious happened to the United States marines who are part of the multinational force in Beirut, the United States would blame Israel.
> "We must therefore explain to the American people that the U.S. presence in Lebanon serves American interests, that is to save the regime of President Amin Gemayel," Mr. Rabin said. "We didn't ask them to go to Lebanon. They are not serving Israeli interests."
> Mr. Rabin predicted that within six months Yasir Arafat, the leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization, would be back in Beirut and Syria and the Soviet Union would be able to claim a significant political success.

Mr. Chairman, we must be very careful that in this misguided effort to give the President what in effect amounts to a blank-check authorization, we not end up undercutting both America's strategic interests and Israel's national security.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. DENNY SMITH).

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this resolution. I cannot continue to support the presence of American peacekeeping troops in Lebanon. In my judgment, they are not fighting for a cause in which American interests are best served.

The only objective we can possibly hope to accomplish by stationing our Marines on Lebanese soil is a "buying of time." Undersecretary Eagleberger made that quite clear in a discussion with some of us here a few days ago. Having served in Vietnam where we spent 12 years, $400 billion and more than 57,000 American lives "buying time," I am fully convinced that so-called military involvement by the United States will not provide any real solutions to the Lebanese mess.

Mr. Chairman, no number of American Marines will bring an end to the many serious religious and political differences that have deeply divided dozens of sects in that region for thousands of years. I maintain the belief that I have held since American military personnel entered Lebanon as a peacekeeping force more than a year ago: They are only a "trip wire for trouble" and more disastrous American involvement in the future.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MAVROULES).

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the joint resolution authorizing the presence of U.S. military units in Lebanon as part of a multinational peacekeeping force.

It was a year ago, when Americans and people throughout the world were shocked by the massacre of innocent people in refugee camps at Sabra and Shatila. South of Beirut, Lebanon, a country gasping for both security and stability, occupied by foreign armies, openly welcomed the return of the multinational peacekeeping force.

Comprised of American, French, Italian, and British units, our Marines were committed with reluctance. Operating under orders of restraint, the placement of the peacekeeping force was necessary if Lebanon and her people were to realize their independence and sovereignty after years of civil war and political turbulence.

Make no mistake, the use of our young men, the sending of U.S. troops into an area of hostility, is one of the gravest and most consequential actions the President and Congress can take.

And, let us be completely honest, our memory of recent history, the failure of U.S. policies in Vietnam, is a lesson and memory not without point in this debate.

Like many on the Armed Services Committee, I traveled to Lebanon this summer. In spending time with our marines, particularly the members of A Company, I was impressed with their discipline and dedication to duty, and disturbed by the difficulty of their assignment.

When A Company suffered its casualties late last month, it became for many of us, a personal loss. No one can visit these men, serving under the most difficult of circumstance, without developing concern for their safety and security.

Recognizing the respective powers of the President, the Commander in Chief, and the Congress, which raises and provides for the military, we today consider this joint resolution.

We face a difficult but important decision.

I support the 18-month compromise, and urge the Members of this body to support the agreement.

What is decided today will have a permanent impact in Lebanon, will affect our relations with other nations in the Middle East, and dramatically influence U.S. efforts to bring a lasting and permanent peace to the region.

Yesterday, the White House provided the Speaker with written assurance that Congress would be notified "if circumstances require any substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon."

In this resolution, we are consenting to the continued placement of a peacekeeping force. We authorize our marines to serve along with the French, British, and Italians.

A very fragile cease-fire now exists in Lebanon. While the presence of the peacekeeping force will not guarantee that it continues, we can feel assured that without them, the civil war will resume and negotiations for a more comprehensive agreement will fail.

The government of President Amin Gemayel, his hopes for a sovereign and independent Lebanon, now rest with the cease-fire and the stability provided by the peacekeeping force.

Let us not forget that Lebanon remains an occupied country. While there is conflict between the Druze fighting for control of the mountains, the Shiites fighting for political power, and the Christian Phalange, there can be no peace until the Syrians withdraw to Damascus, and the PLO no longer operates as a military force.

The government of President Gemayel has asked for our assistance. Our allies, the French, British, and Italians share our responsibilities, hopes, and goals for peace in his country.

In the past month, the United States has taken steps to enhance the security of our marines, and improve the position of the peacekeeping force.

While circumstance and experience will be the only answer to the questions asked today, let us proceed with this bipartisan compromise. We cannot allow our policies in Lebanon to become an election year, political controversy.

If we continue to carefully monitor this situation, the Congress can exercise its constitutional responsibilities, allow the multinational peacekeeping force to continue its operation, and promote stability and independence for Lebanon.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. LEACH).

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, broadly speaking, two issues are at stake in our debate about Lebanon today: one relates to policy; one to procedure. Regarding the policy issue, I have real doubts about the wisdom of our intervention in a civil and religious strife, the antecedents of which date from the fall of the Roman Empire and the Crusades.

Perhaps the two most profound lessons of 20th century interventionist politics are that the weapons of great power deterrence—nuclear missilery, submarines, supersonic aircraft—are largely irrelevant to civil wars and developing country conflicts, and that peoples of the world are prepared to go to extraordinary lengths to determine their own destiny—no matter how mistake ridden—to avert having outside powers dictate to and for them.

Lebanon stands today as an increasingly bloody reminder of how limited power can be and how forlorn options can become. It is simply far easier to commit troops to a distant land than to govern a foreign country and/or get troops back home once they have been ordered abroad.

The problem Congress and the Executive now face is how to define the role and legitimatize or refuse to legitimatize the activity of peacekeeping forces when there is no peace.

In broadest outline, two options are open: withdraw our marines as quickly as possible and cut our losses, or stand firm and accept the costs. Advocates of the first approach point to the increasing violence in Lebanon, the dubious legitimacy of backing a government which is controlled by a minority within a minority, the Phalange Party, whose militia carried out the Sabra and Shatila massacres a year ago, for which so much public opprobrium was heaped on Israel's former Defense Minister Ariel Sharon.

Ironically, the American troop presence may have had the effect of narrowing an already narrow-based government. Because of support from without, the Gemayel government has not had to come firmly to grips with the multiplicity of forces within.

Those who favor a rapid troop pullback also point to the difficulty of defending American servicemen when they are under orders not to take actions of an offensive nature. On the other hand, as Secretary of State George Shultz told the Foreign Affairs Committee last week:

> When America sends it forces to perform a legitimate mission, asked for by the legitimate government involved, and it does so and then the minute some trouble occurs we turn tail and beat it, I think that sends a gigantic message around the world.

Secretary Shultz also emphasized the Syrian and implicit Soviet involvement in Lebanon and the multinational nature of the peacekeeping force. And, indeed it is true that our allies—the French, the British, and the Italians—have suffered similar casualties in this joint endeavor.

The same arguments which can be marshaled to keep troops in Lebanon today will almost certainly apply next year and a decade from now. But no one I know wants to have troops there much, if any, longer. Therefore, my advice to the administration is to declare this cease-fire a victory, invite the United Nations in, and vamoose.

Recognizing, however, that original sin—that is, sending troops into Lebanon in the first place—cannot be repealed by congressional statute, I am inclined to support a procedural resolution to authorize their presence, as long as it is limited in terms and preclusive as to numbers and mission. A resolution of this nature would have the effect of giving our policy the sanction of law. In a country which asserts as our model the rule of law, this is not of light moment. Such a resolution would also make clear to ourselves and our adversaries that a bipartisan, bi-institutional foreign policy can be established within our constitutional framework without either a declaration of war or Gulf of Tonkin-like resolution.

Unfortunately, the resolution brought before this body is to my mind flawed by its specification of an overly long 18-month troop mandate, by its failure to explicitly cause Executive invocation of the full War Powers Act, and by Executive admission that the 1,200-troop limitation is already being violated. In addition, it must be stressed that Secretary Shultz in his testimony supporting the resolution emphasized that the President had not wavered in his view that the War Powers Act may be unconstitutional. The President, Secretary Shultz told the Foreign Affairs Committee, refused to be bound by the limitations placed in the very resolution he indicated to the Speaker that he would be willing to sign. A rose may be a rose to a poet, but according to the Secretary of State, a law need not be a law to the Commander in Chief when unilateral Executive questions of constitutionality arise.

Both Congress and the Executive want to have their cake and eat it, too. The administration wants the political complicity of Congress and the legal authority of statute to sanction past and current policies in Lebanon, but it does not want statute to constrain future Middle Eastern options, nor set a precedent for intrusive congressional involvement in Central America. Congress, on the other hand, wants the President to recognize explicitly the constraints of the war powers resolution but it does not want to share political responsibility for Presidential policy.

My sense is most Americans do not want Lebanon to become either a partisan or an institutional football. They want our troops returned home but recognize that reasonable alternatives may be lacking in the short run. The key is not to get so bogged down that either pride or the logic of policy commitments precludes reassessment and the flexibility of reversing gears. Caution should be the watchword with strict conformity with law the procedural prequisite for national consensus.

Accordingly, I strongly endorse the approach suggested by Representatives OBEY and LONG as the most reasonable procedural solution to the dilemma we all face. It makes the best of a bad situation.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I notice the gentleman mentioned sending troops abroad and the problem of withdrawing troops once they have been landed on a foreign shore. One thing that the American people do not realize is that we have a Marine amphibious group which is in the Mediterranean at all times. Those Marines are not going to come home to San Diego or to Norfolk. We have a Marine amphibious group which works with a naval supporting group in the Mediterranean at all times, landing and having exercises with all of the various nations in that area. That is their job, being in the Mediterranean.

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. The gentleman makes a fair point.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCHUGH).

□ 1220

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee resolution and in support of the Long-Obey alternative. I believe there are two fundamental policy questions we are facing today. The first is whether we have an overriding interest in Lebanon to justify the risks of continuing U.S. military involvement there. Those risks are known to all of us; they include the risk to the lives of our marines, and, beyond that, the risk of being drawn into a Middle Eastern war.

I believe the answer to that first question is yes, there is an overriding American interest in Lebanon, and it is to promote stability in that country, to promote political accommodation, to promote a stronger central government.

The second question facing us is whether there is any reasonable prospect in the future that our continuing marine presence can help to achieve that overriding American goal? I think the honest answer to that question is, we do not know. There is great uncertainly about that. We simply do not know how events will evolve in Lebanon, and therefore we are not able to judge today whether our marines should be committed for 18 months with all of the attendant risks.

Despite this uncertainty, the committee resolution commits us to 18 months of U.S. military presence. In effect, Congress would be washing its hands of responsibility without knowing what is going to happen in Lebanon over the next 18 months.

The alternative, on the other hand, permits us to reserve judgment. It would maintain our marines in Lebanon in the hope that they can help to achieve the overriding goal of stability, but we retain discretion to consider the facts as they evolve, to share with the President the responsibility of maintaining our military presence in Lebanon, a profound judgment which involves a substantial risk to our marines and the risk of further U.S. involvement in a Mideast war.

I think that is the key difference between these two approaches: One, the commitment of 18 months enables Congress to wash its hands of responsibility for this profound judgment; the alternative Long-Obey substitute commits our marines for an indefinite period but reserves to Congress, in conjunction with the President, the ultimate judgment about whether that commitment should be continued. I think that is the fundamental difference, and I urge my colleagues to support the Long-Obey substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will announce that the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) has 35 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD) has 30 minutes remaining.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. SMITH).

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Florida. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the Obey-Long substitute, in enthusiastic favor.

Mr. Chairman, it would be an irresponsible neglect of duty for Congress to give President Reagan a blank check for 18 months in Lebanon. His Secretary of State has told us that the President reserves the right to deploy troops, increase them, or in general to do as he pleases. He has agreed to "consult" with Congress, and we know what that means—it means telling us what he has already done.

The Obey-Long substitute requires the President to comply with existing law—the War Powers Act. It does what the Constitution demands—the involvement by Congress in decisions regarding warmaking.

I urge my colleagues to support the Obey-Long substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Florida. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I stand here today with a rather heavy heart, but nonetheless want to support this resolution as our only credible option in this area.

As the father of a 17-year-old, I understand the perceived impact that this may have on many families. My support does not come easily.

But why do this? Is this an area of strategic importance? Yes, it is, not only to the United States but to our allies. For the first time in a long time, we are as one in our policy in this area.

Are we furthering our policy by doing this? Yes. By the presence of the multinational force, including the United States, we will continue our longstanding policy of help in this area. We have many allies and friends in this area, not just Lebanon alone, that are at risk.

We have achieved great diplomatic successes in this region in the last few years. It has been the United States that created the Camp David Accords. It is the United States that facilitated the Sinai turnover when no one believed it would happen. It is the United States, together with Israel and Lebanon, that concluded the Israeli withdrawal agreement when no one, especially Syria, believed that they would withdraw. We have just helped to conclude the cease-fire over which many of us have been trying to sit for quite a long time.

These U.S. successes have kept the Soviets and others out of a position of strength in this region. Now, when we are to show our determination to continue and cement our successes, there is divided opinion on what to do. Shall we tell our allies that our diplomatic efforts mean little to us if someone challenges our dedication to peace and security in the Middle East, to our dedication to democracy in the Middle East? Shall we tell our enemies that a little hard line will turn us from a good, successful policy? I think no.

Democracy requires, compassion dictates, that we continue to work for peace together with our allies in a multinational force, and this is the vehicle by which to accomplish it.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY).

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, we all recognize how difficult the decision for the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was, and it is with that sense in mind that I stand to urge my colleagues to support the Obey substitute.

To me, there are two essential problems. The first has to do with the constitutional question of what is Congress' proper role. I believe our proper role was defined in 1973 by the War Powers Act, and within the four corners of that agreement and the failure by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to require a report of the purposes, goals, and intentions of the American force makes it fatally flawed in that sense.

Second, if there is a spot on the globe that does not lend itself to a military solution, it is the problems that occur in Lebanon. Clearly, political and peaceful action will speak loudly and more clearly over a long period of time than troops remaining there for any length of time, and certainly the 18-month provision without the reporting requirement is also something that I cannot countenance.

Last, let me say this: This is not a debate, although some will no doubt characterize it as such, over whether or not the troops should stay or leave immediately. Almost no one that I know of who supports the Obey position believes the troops should be removed immediately, but clearly, anyone who has thought about the problems of Lebanon, who has addressed this question, must recognize that a military commitment of a lengthy duration is inimical to U.S. interests and it is my hope that those of you who have looked at this problem will come down on our side.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON).

Mr. SOLOMON. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Ladies and gentlemen, let me say that I rise to support what I, and excuse the terminology, refer to as this lousy but vitally necessary resolution, lousy because it acknowledges to a degree, the constitutional validity of the War Powers Act, and by lending credibility to the War Powers Act, we in the Congress are not only usurping the constitutional authority of the President of the United States, any President of the United States, but we are setting ourselves up as 535 Secretaries of State, and that is the last thing we need in this country.

Under the War Powers Act, just imagine what could happen if, in South Korea, we had a group of renegades who dropped indiscriminate mortarshells on our troops there? Would we invoke the War Powers Act? I think no. In El Salvador, where we had one of our advisers murdered, would we invoke the War Powers Act? I think no. In Honduras, where we are participating in training exercises right now, and if we had a couple of American soldiers killed for one reason or another, would we invoke it? I think not. And we could talk about the Philippines, West Germany, and all other parts of the world where we have to participate today.

These are just some of the reasons why the War Powers Act should not be a part of this resolution.

But now, having said all of that, let me tell my colleagues why I support this vitally necessary resolution. First of all, it is a compromise. It was painstakingly worked out with people like myself who vehemently oppose certain parts of it.

Second, I think it is vitally necessary, whether we like it or not, that we continue our participation in the peacekeeping force because with no peacekeeping force there is no question in anyone's mind that the Lebanese Government would fall under the dominance of Soviet influence through their surrogates Syria and the PLO. And just think of the intimidation that would take place and would occur on Israel, on Saudi Arabia, and all of our other allies in the Mideast. Not only would that seriously jeopardize their national security, but it would jeopardize ours as well, not to mention our own economy, because, ladies and gentleman, we still depend on the oil coming out of the Mideast for American jobs and industry in this country.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, let me just say, as a father of five and as a former marine, that I am just as concerned as any Member of this House about the lives of our marines, and I was happy to see that President Reagan gave them the backup and the authority to protect themselves; and I think that they can.

Second, that is why we have a Marine Corps, to protect the interests of this country abroad. That is what they enlisted for. The Marine Corps is not a welfare program, it is not a make-work jobs program, and any marine who enlists in the Marine Corps does so for the sole purpose of defending his country's interests abroad. Any marine who is serving in the Marine Corps who is not there for that reason, and I doubt there are any, ought to get out, and I will be happy to help them get out if he does not want to stay.

Last, let me say that if we want to achieve lasting peace in the Mideast, if we want to be a credible ally to our allies in the Mideast and throughout the rest of the world, if we want to deter the spread of Soviet brand communism there and throughout the world, we will set aside our differences, as I have, and we will agree to this vitally necessary resolution. It is terribly important for the security of America and the free world.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. HUCKABY).

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the joint resolution today and in opposition to the Long-Obey amendment.

As has been pointed out, we are not in Lebanon alone. The French, the Italians, and the British are there also. We are peacekeeping troops. I think it is time that we stood up as such. We truly have the capability of taking out any position that fires on the U.S. Marines. We should announce that as our policy and take a firm strong stand for peace.

When the Israelis pulled out, when they withdrew, the existing Lebanese Government did not want them to withdraw because they feared that their army was not strong enough to fill this vacuum, because we must keep in mind that 18 months ago the Lebanese Army did not even exist. Today it has some 25,000 troops trained by the Americans; 18 months from now it will have more than 50,000 troops. Our American advisers in Lebanon feel that within 18 months the Lebanese Army will then be strong enough to fulfill the task and fill this vacuum that was created when the Israelis withdrew.

Mr. Chairman, I submit to the Members that the peace that exists today is a fragile peace. Our presence can mean that we have a chance for this peace to last. If we withdraw, it will mean chaos in Lebanon. I submit to the Members that on this page of world history it is not the time for America to retreat.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER).

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in oppositions to House Joint Resolution 364, but as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I am going to be very brief so that other Members not on the committee may have a chance to speak.

First, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCCAIN). His comments were right on target.

We ought as Mr. MCCAIN said "have a reasonable expectation of success," but the key objectives in Lebanon are not achievable. The crucial objective, as enunciated by Secretary Shultz when he testified on this resolution, is to have "a sovereign independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout its national territory," is unachievable. It simply comes down to this: The internal and external forces in Lebanon are too diverse, they are too numerous, and they are too murderously antagonistic for this to be an achievable objective. The sense of national purpose and unity that must underpin a modern nation state does not exist.

As a former platoon leader, I would have a very difficult time telling my men why they were deployed in pursuit of an unachievable objective.

As for the resolution that we have before us, Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that we have it here in the first place, and I would say it is not a matter of either being for the resolution or in favor of immediate unilateral withdrawal. Those are not the only choices.

Mr. Chairman, I invite my colleague's attention to the dissenting views of this member in the committee report on House Joint Resolution 364 where I explain in great detail my views as to why House Joint Resolution 364 should be defeated. American objectivity were agruably achievable in Vietnam, but for better or worse, the policies and resources of this Nation were not pursued or utilized to achieve those objectives. In Lebanon, under the current governmental structure and geopolitical arrangement, the key objective of a sovereign independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout its national territory cannot be achieved.

This Member publicly opposed the introduction of U.S. Marine combat units into Lebanon in 1982, certainly would oppose their introduction into Lebanon with the changes that have occurred since 1982, and opposes the compromise apparently struck between the administration and various leaders in this body as now embodied in House Joint Resolution 364. This view is not born of neoisolationist or ideological orientation but of realism. Neither is this Member unaware and unconcerned about the Syrian involvement in Lebanon or their objectives; the Syrian ties to the Soviet Union are also indeed a fundamental and serious concern. For our marines, Lebanon is a quagmire; they have been placed in an extremely dangerous position without the crucial objectives of U.S. foreign policy being achievable.

Like Secretary of State George P. Shultz, evidenced by comments from his testimony before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on September 21, 1983, this Member endeavors to have a positive outlook on the possibilities for peace and progress in the Middle East. This Member takes pride in having an optimistic attitude toward life and American policies in world affairs. Yet I can see no reason for optimism that the second of the three policy objectives of the United States in Lebanon can be achieved. That policy objective, a worthy objective by and for democratic societies, listed in his September statement, is as follows: To have "a sovereign independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout its national territory."

If that objective is not achievable, then the other two objectives—"withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon" and "security for Israel's northern border" are also placed in deep or impossible jeopardy.

Why is the objective of "sovereign Lebanon, able to exercise control throughout its national territory" not achievable? The political, religious, and cultural factions are simply too numerous, diverse, and murderously antagonistic. The external forces now in Lebanon which are contributing to the chaos and bloodshed are now so diverse and numerous that the conflict in Lebanon makes the Spanish Civil War look like a simple confrontation. It is suggested that the collection of foreign national terrorists and anarchists in the Bekaa Valley alone are unprecedented in world history.

Lebanon in short does not now have, if it ever had, the sense of national purpose or unity as the necessary underpinning for a modern nation state and it cannot now create or restore this crucial consensus in the existing geopolitical framework. One can only look retrospectively at the dubiously contrived governmental framework originally created for Lebanon and wonder how that nation has survived this long, even without the external and internal forces that are now tearing it apart. These and the following similar comments were made by this Member at the hearing of September 21, 1983, and the markup of September 22, 1983, but they are reinforced by the following comments by George F. Will in the September 26, 1983, issue of Newsweek magazine:

> The (Lebanese) ambassador (to the United States) says: "We have received continued assurances from the United States that they are committed to maintaining the sovereignty and independence of Lebanon" Oh? One cannot "maintain" what does not exist. Think of Lebanon as Connecticut (Lebanon is 20 percent smaller) with a government that, on a good day, controls part of Hartford. Imagine Connecticut with 45,000 Syrians, 12,000 Israelis, 6,000 U.N. troops behind Israeli lines, 16 militias and assorted Palestinians and Iranians. Now, put 1,300 U.S. Marines at Harford's airport and tell them to keep the peace.

Democratic Accommodations: Consider the attributes of a nation: a system of essential institutions whose writs run everywhere within recognized borders; a government with a monopoly on the use of force; a minimum of shared civic, cultural and religious values. Even if two-thirds of Lebanon were not occupied by foreign armies, it might be too invertebrate to stand as a nation. Beirut's leading publisher once said: "The government does not exist, and whatever part of it does exist has no authority, and whoever has authority is not in government." Lebanon is the state of nature Hobbes had in mind. It is anarchy leavened by assassination.

Counterarguments to these comments have emphasized the incredible political costs and loss of life that would result from the withdrawal of U.S. Marines from Lebanon. Certainly that is a valid point. The question to be asked then is "How much greater will be the political costs and the loss of life (including U.S. personnel) in a later withdrawal or wider conflict that result from the pursuit of an unattainable objective?"

The most important answer to be offered, however, is to emphasize that those of us who oppose House Joint Resolution 364 are not all, therefore, proposing an immediate unilateral withdrawal. Certainly this Member does not advocate that action. It is unfortunate that the constitutional controversy over the War Powers Act and partisan jockeying and ducking preparatory to a 1984 Presidential election cause House Joint Resolution 364 to come up to the floor of the House at all. It is the license for a marriage of political convenience in which one or both marriage partners will be disappointed while it detracts from any effort to successfully seek our legitimate policy objectives in the Middle East. Our marines are, like pawns, disadvantageously placed on a treacherous chessboard. For the sake of the peace-loving Lebanese and Middle Eastern peoples, we and our allies need to construct a new chessboard or establish a new arrangement.

I urge my colleagues to oppose this resolution.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. BERMAN).

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise is support of House Joint Resolution 364. This resolution comes at a time when many of us concerned Members of this body invoke the memory of the war in Vietnam. We ask: Was the lesson of that conflict to avoid future military engagements in the Third World?

With this resolution, Congress has an opportunity to demonstrate that Vietnam did not paralyze the United States for all time in its attempts to promote peace in the world.

The resolution gives Congress the chance to support the United States as a partner in a multinational force. We will not be lone gunslingers going into some far off land. Lebanon is not Vietnam, and the congressional response is not the same.

When the President sent his Tonkin Gulf resolution to Congress, he received sweeping powers. He had the right to "take all necessary measures * * * to prevent further aggression." This set the stage for excalating bombing raids into North Vietnam and the development of ground operations ranging into the South Vietnamese countryside.

This resolution is no such fatal blank check. It places the actions of U.S. forces firmly in the context of the War Powers Act and the existing arrangements strictly limiting the marines' mission. Even if some voices argue for a broader marine role, this resolution precludes that unless Congress explicitly authorizes it.

Congress still holds final authority to withhold or limit funds at any time during the 18 months this resolution is in effect. Congress with its control over funds speeded our departure from Vietnam. We can ensure that we avoid an open-ended commitment.

The way ahead is by no means clear. There are pitfalls we must make sure we avoid. As we learned in Vietnam, we cannot pursue peace by a program of heavy bombardment with pauses intended to bring combatants to a conference table. This time in Lebanon our goal is helping to promote a political solution. Military force will not remove the Syrians—not 1,200 Marines, not the Lebanese Armed Forces.

Lebanon must differ from Vietnam in that American efforts must be first and foremost diplomatic efforts. Military commitment to a multinational force should continue only so long as it reinforces diplomatic work. Lebanon also must differ from Vietnam in that the United States will negotiate as part of a multilateral team, not as a "Lone Ranger."

The cease-fire this week demonstrated that the neighboring Arab nations' commitment to a Syrian withdrawal is essential. The United States should urge the Arab nations to withdraw formally the Arab League's mandate for the Syrian presence in Lebanon. If Syria resists, the issue should be taken to the United Nations.

We cannot repeat our error in Vietnam of picking our strongman and seeking to destroy all conceivable opposition. We cannot get bogged down supporting a leader who refuses to broaden his political base.

In its dealings with the groups in Lebanon, the United States needs to encourage all the factions in the country to make necessary concessions. Any government that emerges from the conference on reconciliation must fairly represent all the people, guaranteeing individual rights and freedoms.

Our position in Lebanon is different from our position in foreign countries in years past. It is different because we have survived the Vietnam experience. Its lessons are complex and entangled. We can learn one thing this time. Today we seek peace, not victory. We seek to develop peace with other nations struggling to achieve that aim. This time we work in concert with many others. Sometimes, partnership is better than going it alone. I urge passage of House Joint Resolution 364.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER).

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the joint resolution.

Mr. Chairman, last year I had the opportunity to visit Lebanon during its struggle for independence from 7 years of the PLO and Syria. What I saw was a total devestation of a once beautiful and vibrant country, a major world tourist attraction. I learned of the storage of a massive unbelievable stockpile of arms in southern Lebanon. Obviously meant for an imminent invasion of northern Israel.

The country had been devastated not so much by the locals and the civil war but, rather from outside forces that are backed by none other than the Soviet Union. Which is supporting, arming, training, and pushing Syrians and the PLO and now the Druze Muslims into conflict with those who want a sovereign and independent Lebanon.

The United States helped end the PLO grip on the throat of Lebanon, but the Syrian-PLO actions have destabilized the region so much that a new powder keg could explode any minute.

Is peace possible? Can all those diverse forces in Lebanon ever come together for democracy, for unity, and with commonality of vision? My response is that for three decades the Christians in Lebanon and the various Muslim factions did live in relative peace under democracy and with prosperity. They worked together politically, economically, and socially and they still had freedom and diversity of religions. This lasted until 1975 when the PLO and Syria intervened in a civil struggle in Lebanon.

So, is peace possible? I would assure the Members of this Congress that the history of Lebanon would show that Lebanon left to itself can live in peace.

It should be obvious to all of us what really happened to destabilize Lebanon. The situation has been brought about by the Soviet Union's disregard for peace and democracy. The Soviet Union was clearly distressed by the U.S. success in negotiating an end to the war in Lebanon last year. The Soviet Union lost a great deal of face when the Israelis wiped out the Syrian Air Force and the Soviet sophisticated surface-to-air missile batteries without losing a single plane of their own. Their attempts to establish a foothold in the Middle East was set back when the PLO was thrown out of Beirut.

Now, the Soviet Union is instigating violence in Lebanon as an attempt to regain that foothold in the region. The presence of 7,000 Soviet troops and the new SA-5's has put itself in a position of perpetrating untold disaster upon the Middle East.

Why are there 7,000 Soviets? Why have they deployed their most sophisticated SA-5 missile batteries near the Bekaa Valley? Mr. Chairman, I submit that we are facing in Lebanon a situation unparalleled in possibly the history of the world, a time when the mere misguidance of a jet fighter plane traveling at mach 1 speed in less than 4 minutes from Beirut to the Bekaa Valley, could fly over Syrian controlled airspace, and we all know how Soviet gunners feel about their airspace, an SA-5 could shoot down that plane. And that plane could be an American plane or a British, French, Italian—or even an Israeli plane. I would say that we are 4 minutes from a major explosion perhaps from a confrontation of the superpowers.

The Soviets show their callous disregard for human life when the ends justify the means. Their concern for human life, it has been proved, is not the same as ours. They are behind the PLO, they are behind the Syrians, and yes, they are supplying hostile forces despite the truce causing the turmoil in Lebanon today.

But still the question remains, Mr. Chairman, should we turn tail and run? I cannot minimize the concern that I have for American lives in Lebanon. As a matter of fact, I opposed the deployment of American troops before they were sent to Lebanon. I told the President and his staff that I felt it was not a wise idea.

Now that we are there, it is necessary to our national security and to the faith our friends have placed in American commitments around the world. We cannot turn tail and run, we cannot tell our friends around the world that we are not a reliable partner in any peacekeeping force.

The President is not bowing for the first time in American history to the Congress or to the War Powers Act, but rather he is living up to American commitment to freedom, cooperation in a bipartisan manner on foreign policy.

The President has made a commitment. We as the Republican Party have made a commitment. The Democratic leadership has made a commitment and Mr. Chairman, I submit that the actions of Congress on this resolution will show this Nation's commitment to the freedom and integrity of the people of the world.

I urge adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SPRATT).

Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Chairman, this is an occasion of double importance—1,600 marines, for whose support we are constitutionally responsible, are encamped at the Beirut International Airport, in a vulnerable position with a vague mission. Fifteen ships are stationed offshore, with awesome firepower, to protect those marines, and they need and deserve protection. In all, our forces in Lebanon number 10,000—a large commitment in my estimation, all of which has been made without consultation of this Congress. The danger of escalation is not just a risk; it is, in fact, occurring. As the Congress of this country, we ought to be asking ourselves now: What is the mission of these forces? Is it realistic? Can it be accomplished? And we ought to write that mission into this resolution. We should then restate the resolution throughout to make it clear to all that we intend for these forces to have a limited mission, and one which we will monitor closely as it is executed.

This is also a constitutional occasion of precedential importance. The War Powers Act was passed by a Congress which knew that there was something fundamentally wrong about the process by which we became engaged in Vietnam. The act has had a checkered history. No President has ever conceded that it is totally constitutional. The Supreme Court appears recently to have agreed with them. But though the War Powers Act may be imperfect, and may in some particulars be unconstitutional, it is a vital part of our constitutional system; and we should take care that we do not render it a dead letter. We have the power to declare war; and we have the power to raise and support the Armed Forces. My problem with the resolution presented is that it does not responsibly exercise those powers. In effect, we are leaving the definition of our role for another Congress in another crisis.

Read this resolution critically. It is not, in my opinion, the assertion of a Congress that insists on a substantive role in making the gravest of decisions this Government must make.

It extends the time for deployment for 18 months, with no conditionality; no statement of intent to withdraw if the Lebanese Government does not press on with a political solution; no conditions, just a parting reference to the possibility that we might alter our position later with a joint resolution.

It imposes reporting requirements that call for information that will be dated, stale, and useless, by the time we receive it—at 6-month intervals. At the least, we should require the President to report to us on a timely basis, not less often than every 2 months, and we should specify more precisely what we need to know if we are to be informed participants in this process. We should state, for example, that we expect to be advised of the rules of engagement, those rules by which these forces will execute their mission. How else can we keep abreast of the potential for escalation, for deeper and wider involvement, without monitoring these rules? How can we better say to the President that we will be watching our engagement, scrutinizing each step taken, to make certain that we are not drawn, slowly and by degrees, deeper and deeper into a Lebanese civil war?

Of most concern to me is the open-ended, undefined commitment of our marines and naval forces to Lebanon for a period of 18 months. It is true that this will tell the Syrians that we will stay the course; but it may also tell the Gemayel government that they can now mark time, dig in their heels, and not make the concessions and compromises they must make to broaden the base of their government, to reconstitute the Lebanese Government, which everyone agrees is the only way out of this civil war.

I am concerned that the longer we stay in Lebanon, and the more power we assemble there, the greater the danger that we will undercut our proper role, and that is to reconcile through diplomacy the factions who are now fighting. As we increase our firepower and presence, repel attacks with counterattacks, and subtly move from defensive counterattacks to preemptive strikes, we come closer and closer to taking sides in a civil war. Our European allies in the multinational force are warning us of that now. We are coming dangerously close to alienating as enemies the parties who must be placated if a national reconciliation government in Lebanon is ever to be created.

I am concerned also that the longer we stay in Lebanon, the more problematical our mission will become. Key proponents of this resolution have stated on the floor today that our forces there have a "peacekeeping mission," and this appears to be their construction of the mission we authorize in this resolution. But 1,600 marines cannot keep the peace in Lebanon, and they make no pretense of trying. They do not patrol Beirut or the country; it is too dangerous and the possibilities of some provocative incident are too great. They do not man checkpoints to prevent the infiltration of combatants back into pacified areas, which is the typical function of a peacekeeping force. And above all, they are not so formidable in number as to compel peace by threatening any party who disrupts it. This morning, Admiral Wadkins, Acting Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told the Armed Forces Committee that the JCS avoid use of the term "peacekeeping" to define the mission of our forces in Lebanon. Our mission there is to establish "presence," whatever that means, and I think we should ask what it does mean.

What commitments, what obligations does the mission of "presence" imply? If the marines are attacked with overwhelming force, and compelled to evacuate—and that is entirely realistic in the circumstances—what will we do? What does the mission of "presence" call for us to do? Will we seek retribution? Will we return with augmented forces and strike back? What role does the mission of "presence" call for us to assume? If it is a self-defensive role solely, will we defend just ourselves, or will we also defend some Lebanese positions, on the premise that their defeat could jeopardize our presence?

I have been to Lebanon over the past weekend, and I have seen the situation there firsthand. It is fraught with risk. There is a clear and present danger of some provocative incident—an engagement of U.S. and Syrian aircraft, a terrorist attack on one of our ships, or a barrage of our exposed marines—any of which could lead to an escalated response on our part and a wider involvement in this war.

In these circumstances, we should assert our proper constitutional role. We should give function to the War Powers Act, bring it to life, and not render it a dead letter, as I fear we may if we do not strengthen this resolution.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. GIBBONS).

Mr. GIBBONS. Well, Mr. Chairman, here we are again. The chairman and I and a couple others were here 19 years ago when we had this same kind of debate.

In my 2 minutes, let me make one thing very, very clear. If you vote for this resolution, events will overwhelm it. Those little pieces of lines and words on paper will be as irrelevant to the future as the horseshoe is to modern transportation.

I am impressed with those who have had military experience who say that this is a disastrous matter.

We have no clear-cut goal. We have deployed troops, or the President has deployed troops in a tactically indefensible area. Eventually we are going to have to withdraw. Some hopefully believe it will be with honor and with peace.

That same event faced us in Vietnam and we learned bitterly that it was not possible.

If we are there to keep the peace, we are too few.

If we are there to fight, then we are far too few. If we are there to die, then we are far too many.

As one who sat here and voted with every other Member of the House to pass the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution, let me say there is no difference in its effect and the effect of this resolution. Your are requiring at least 1,600 Americans to spend 18 months in an indefensible position and, as I said before, events will overwhelm this little piece of paper, this skimpy resolution, and all of us will forget what was done and said in this debate but we are there and we had better face the consequences of our actions. Let us not make matters worse. I oppose this resolution.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. BROWN).

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I invite my colleagues to consider the following policy statement. There is a lesson for all of us in Vietnam. If we are forced to fight, we must have the means and the determination to prevail or we will not have what it takes to secure the peace.

While we are at it, let us tell those who fought in that war that we will never again ask young men to fight and possibly die in a war our Government is afraid to let them win.

Mr. Chairman, those were the words of Ronald Reagan in 1980. In the President's own words we are again asking young men to fight and possibly die in a war that our Government is not committed to win. The men and women who fight for this country deserve far better than this resolution.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PICKLE).

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that maintaining the peacekeeping force in Lebanon is in our national interest and in the interest of peace in the entire Middle East area. The withdrawal of French, British, Italian or U.S. peacekeeping troops, would indicate a weakening of our resolve to help bring peace to this war torn land. Therefore, I think we should vote for the 18-month extension. It is tempting to choose a shorter period of time—60 days or 6 months. But if we choose a shorter time period, the warring factions will just wait us out—and they have been waiting for centuries. I fully acknowledge that this is not an easy vote. Our instincts are to say—let us get out and get out fast. But I think the consequences for withdrawing too soon would be much worse. Let us give peace a chance to take hold in Lebanon. With a cease-fire now in place—as tenuous as it may be—it is still a cease-fire and one which we pray will be maintained. Now that the cease-fire has been agreed to, I hope President Gemayel will take this opportunity to broaden the base of his government by bringing in other factions outside his government.

Let there be no mistake that we will not permit our marines to be sitting ducks. There is a line between our role as peacekeepers and our legitimate right to defend ourselves. The decision to cross that line should be left to the Commander in Chief, and I still feel enough of an American patriot to believe he will make that decision only if it is in our national interest.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. LANTOS).

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Chairman, a few weeks ago this body unanimously condemned the Soviet action in shooting down a civilian airliner.

□ 1250

Let me remind my colleagues that what is behind the current fighting in Lebanon is again the Soviet Union.

This is, indeed, a dangerous world, and there are some of my colleagues who would like to stop it and get off. Well, you cannot get off.

My heart goes out to the families of the four marines who died as much as anyone's. But let me remind my colleagues that we lost four times as many diplomats this year in Lebanon than we lost military personnel.

Are we to close up our Embassies around this globe if a group of terrorists decides to blow up an American Embassy?

What we do here today will send out a message, and that message will be clear. That message, if we emasculate this resolution, will be a welcome message in Damascus, and it will be a welcome message in Libya, and it will be a welcome message in Iran, and it most certainly will be a welcome message in Moscow.

But it will create trembling among our friends in the Arab world. How would you like to be King Hussein and see a multinational force turn tail and disappear? How would you like to be President Mubarak of Egypt and see the United States moving out when the going gets tough? How would you like to be the pro-Western Government of Lebanon—which is fighting for its very survival—if a multinational force—critical for its very existence—decides to leave?

I rise in strong support of a policy which has the backing of the President of the United States and the Speaker of our own House of Representatives. The alternative is a formula for failure.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANTOS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I want to say in the 9 years I have been a Member of this House, I have never heard a better speech, I have never heard a more insightful analysis of a very frightful, dangerous situation.

This country has responsibilities. We wish it were otherwise. We would like to pull a blanket over our heads. But if you abandon the Middle East to the Soviet Union, we will fight them, we will fight them only on much worse terms.

The gentleman is to be congratulated on a very brilliant statement.

Mr. LANTOS. I thank my friend for his remarks.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANTOS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KAZEN. Let me also commend the gentleman for his statement. I want to assure him of my support for this resolution, and I think that he is on the right track. I think this country cannot afford to back off at a time like this. It is far, far too serious in its ramifications. The word of this country all over this world will mean absolutely nothing if we do what the opponents of this resolution want done. I want to commend the gentleman for his statement.

Mr. LANTOS. I thank my friend. I would just like to say in conclusion that the alternative to our resolution is not a peaceful, placid, bucolic world. The alternative is to see the Persian Gulf, the oil resources of the whole Middle East in danger, the commitment of far greater numbers of American troops with far greater potential for disastrous consequences.

I urge my colleagues to support the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. NATCHER). The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. LANTOS) has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PAUL).

Mr. PAUL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to this resolution.

I think it is a serious mistake. I would like to refer back to a little legislative history. In June of 1981, we were anxious to praise Ambassador Habib for the "peace" he brought about in the Mideast. In that resolution there was a statement that the House endorsed overwhelmingly that actually set the stage for what we are facing today. That resolution said that:

The House of Representatives strongly encourages the President to pursue a comprehensive and coordinated policy in Lebanon including the development of an effective cease-fire, resolution of the issue of Syrian missiles, promotion of the independent sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of Lebanon.

That resolution was passed 398 to 1. That literally set the stage for the involvement we have in Lebanon today.

This resolution, House Joint Resolution 364, I sincerely believe, is a capitulation. It is no compromise whatsoever on the war powers resolution. And we are literally reneging on our responsibilities as Congressmen and Representatives of the people. We are reneging on our responsibility that is given only to Congress that only we can declare war. I do not see how we can prevent the escalation if it is necessary in order to preserve the lives of the marines in Lebanon, and that we, by passing this resolution, literally give license to the administration to pursue a more extended war.

The American people I do not believe endorse the involvement in Lebanon and if a referendum was taken they would wholeheartedly endorse our getting out of Lebanon and not becoming increasingly involved as we have been.

For the past couple of years we have subsidized and helped both sides of the war over there. We have rescued the PLO when Israel was about to do the PLO in. And what do we find now? The PLO is back in Lebanon, shooting at our marines. And we actually financed both sides.

Israel at that time was able to take care of the PLO and yet we marched in, rescued the PLO and now we still have them to contend with.

During the bombing of Beirut, bombing with weapons that we paid for, we on this House floor had a bill with foreign aid in it where we tripled the foreign aid to Lebanon to rebuild Beirut during the time the bombs were still falling. This is a foolhardly policy.

It is time the American people woke up and decided there is a more sensible policy that we could pursue.

We have less peace in Lebanon now than a year ago. There is no peace and yet they say there is no war. If there is no war, there can be no victory. All we need today is one Russian-built missile to hit one of our ships and it be sunk, I believe we would face catastrophe, an international and world catastrophe. I do not know how we could prevent it.

Our purpose there is not definable because we do not know what our purpose is.

The policy of foreign involvement and interference is a policy the American people are questioning. It has failed us for the past 70 years and the sooner we admit it the better.

The numerous mutual defense pacts that we have committed our sons and tax dollars to are unwise investments. How many believe that there is anything mutual about our allies coming to our aid in a time of need? Yet our citizens are continually being drained of their resources and their lives in order to attempt the unachievable. How can we expect to buy peace in the Mideast when there has been war there for so many centuries?

But most importantly our unwise commitments and overextensions throughout the world serves to distract resources and energies that should be directed toward our national defense. Interference in the affairs of other nations precipitates conflicts and invites hostility directed toward the United States. It does not serve the interest of peace; it instead jeopardizes our security. The policy of global interference threatens the peace of the world and prevents the establishment of a policy based on adequate defense and self-confidence in our role in world affairs. Its time to bring the marines home and reconsider our policy of foreign entanglements.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EDGAR).

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult in 1 minute to sum up one's feelings, but let me try to just simply say a couple of very quick things.

First, I rise in strong support of the Obey-Long approach. I think we have to look at this question of the Marines in Lebanon in less than 18 months. The War Powers Act should kick in now. We ought to have an opportunity to thoughtfully look at the issue in a much more appropriate timeframe.

Second, if in fact we stay, whether we stay for 2 weeks, 3 months, 6 months, or 18 months, I think we ought to seriously take a look at the way in which we deploy our troops in Lebanon. The fact that we are not an international unit, under international command, we have no international uniforms for our troops, and little or no international direction makes no sense. The fact that we put our troops by the airport, and one or two terrorists with a hand-held rocket can pick a fight with the United States at will is irresponsible.

I would urge the administration, particularly the Defense Department and the State Department, to consider making it an international force if we stay.

Finally, I think the American people are looking to us for some leadership. The world is looking to us for leadership. We lead by supporting the Obey-Long approach.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. LOWRY.).

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I rise in support of the Long-Obey substitute. Like everybody else, I have the highest respect for the leadership of this committee and this House who I know are doing what they think is right. But to leave our Marines in Lebanon for 18 months is a tragic mistake.

To have our Marines as symbols in a cross-fire between an ages-old religious civil war where there are 35,000 to 40,000 Syrians in the country, where there are tens of thousands of different Lebanese faction troops in the country, where there are tens of thousands of Moslem faction troops in the country, and to think that 1,600 marines are to serve as anything but targets is a tragic mistake.

I urge this body to support the Long-Obey substitute.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. STUDDS).

□ 1300

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Chairman, I will oppose the resolution in its present form, because 18 months is far too long a period to authorize the deployment of Marines under the circumstances presently prevailing in Lebanon. I believe this time period should be shortened, both to force Congress to reexamine the situation periodically, and to leave open the question of whether a prolonged commitment of U.S. Forces in Lebanon will be either necessary or wise.

In testimony before the Foreign Affairs Committee, Secretary of State George Shultz said that the conflict in Lebanon is not a civil war. I think a more accurate statement would be that the Lebanese situation is among other things a civil war. If the Lebanese were a united people, the Syrians, the PLO, the Israelis, and for that matter, the French, British, Italians, Americans, and United Nations would no longer be present in their country.

I support present Reagan administration policy in Lebanon. I think the achievement of a cease-fire was a great accomplishment. I was encouraged by the desire of Secretary of State Shultz before the Foreign Affairs Committee to keep East-West rhetoric on this issue in its proper perspective. Syria has received help from the Soviet Union, but it is no puppet, and its reluctance to withdraw from Lebanon thus far does not mean it will refuse to do so in the future.

But events have dramatically altered circumstances in Lebanon—for the worse and now for the better—within the past 18 days. How can Congress act now with any confidence to authorize troops for 18 months.

Some have suggested that a lengthy authorization is necessary to demonstrate American will. Unfortunately, I think it would say more about our intelligence than about our will. Our role in Lebanon—as defined by the President—is that of peacemaker, not warrior. There are those on all sides who will be eager to modify this American role: To seek active military alliance on one side, to use the U.S. presence as an excuse for others to intervene on another. An 18-month authorization under the War Powers Act is not needed to demonstate American will to continue its peacekeeping role in Lebanon.

Our attitude toward the War Powers Act, itself, ought to be clear. It is the law of the land. The President has a constitutional responsibility to observe and to enforce that law. The proposal we have before us is consistent with the War Powers Act and, if the time period for troop deployment were significantly shortened, this bill would have my support.

If circumstances continue as they are now in Lebanon; if the U.S. presence remains both necessary and constructive; I—and I expect the vast majority of this Congress—would support a Presidential request for the deployment to continue. But that is a decision for another day.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair would like to state that the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD) has 14½ minutes remaining and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) has 17 minutes remaining.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR).

Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MORRISON).

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. I hope this House will support the Obey-Long substitute because I believe this substitute will keep the House and Congress involved in determining the best course in a very difficult situation.

We made a mistake in the first instance in the way in which we became involved and we have not been careful to define the limits of what it is we are trying to accomplish.

I think much that our troops are now doing in Lebanon is not consistent with what we expected when we first got involved. To now give an 18-month blank check to the administration to pursue its course, whatever that may be, in Lebanon would be a mistake and it would be dangerous.

Under the committee resolution, a joint resolution of this body would be required to remove troops from Lebanon. The joint resolution would require the signature of the President, and I do not have confidence that we have two-thirds of the votes in this House, and especially in the other body to change a decision once made to stay there for 18 months.

I am especially troubled by the fact that the President has said that he does not recognize Congress' responsibility under the War Powers Act. There are many imperfections in the Obey-Long substitute. It leaves questions unanswered to which we would like answers. Nonetheless, it would permit U.S. troops to remain in Lebanon as long as the current cease-fire lasts and permit the Congress to reconsider our role in Lebanon if armed conflict begins anew.

I hope the cease-fire will continue and that we will not again have to face this issue and that we can talk about a more constructive peacekeeping role for the United States.

But should the fighting flare up again, as many of us fear, at least the issue will then return to this House and we will once again confront the question of our most constructive role.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. ROGERS).

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the resolution on the floor today and am opposed to the Obey substitute. Because the alternatives are so bad, the choices are so bad, it is a reluctant support. But if you think the choices today are poor, wait until 90 days pass and there is absolute chaos in the Middle East and a probable takeover of the Lebanese free people by Syria as an agent for the Soviet Union, with all of the future ominous results that that portends.

I support the resolution for four main reasons.

One, it allows the President to determine our foreign policy in Lebanon, not 535 Secretaries of State/Secretaries of Defense that reside in these two bodies here on the Hill.

Second, it protects the marines who are already on the scene. We are not talking about deploying forces; we are talking about defending forces already there.

Third, it continues the peacekeeping role of the Marines without explicitly telling our adversaries of our plans.

Fourth and most importantly, it helps keep Syria and the Soviets from overrunning Lebanon, posing a threat not only to Israel and to the Saudis, but all of our vital interests in the Middle East.

The President needs our support on this resolution and I support him. The President should run the foreign policy of this country.

But the support that I give is qualified. We are concerned about what is our role in that country. We are concerned that we not get bogged down in the quagmire that exists in the political life in Lebanon.

So our objectives should be simple and straightforward. I think they are these:

One, let us help get Lebanon back on its feet. Second, let us keep the Soviets from interjecting themselves into the structure in the Middle East.

The very minute these two main objectives are accomplished, and I think we can accomplish them short of the 18 months, we should get out and leave Lebanon to the Lebanese.

And so although my support of this resolution is somewhat qualified, it still is strong. We have to support the President in this instance because he has to be the leader in our foreign policy and particularly with marines on the ground needing our protection today.

I yield back the balance of my time.

□ 1310

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR).

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, the committee resolution amounts to an abdication of the constitutional responsbility of the Congress to declare war, at least for the next 18 months.

In agreeing to this resolution the President, it seems to me, is asking for broad authority that the Congress should jealously withhold. If we pass this resolution, Congress will be washing its hands of the Lebanese issue for the next 1½ years and that is irresponsible.

The substitute charts a much preferable role for the Congress. It establishes a partnership with the President in the formulation of U.S. policy in Lebanon and periodic review of the execution of that policy.

The substitute may not keep us out of a Vietnam-style war, but it will assure that if the United States widens or restricts its military role in Lebanon, we will do so with the full knowledge of the American people, through an open public debate in the Congress, step by step, in response to changing circumstances, without an irrevocable commitment binding us in advance to the President to whatever policy he may pursue.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER).

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I have been troubled on how to vote on this resolution, and to put it succinctly, I have concluded that it is in the interests of the people of my district to vote against it.

I do not want my vote against the resolution to be interpreted as an attack on the decision of the President of the United States in what he has done so far.

If this resolution goes down it does not require that we remove our Marines tomorrow, or in 6 month, or what have you; it puts us back to the bargaining table as to what we shall do.

In the President's judgment he has determined that is in the interests of this country that they be there. I support him in that endeavor.

But I also suggest that my remarks are based on the premise that the War Powers Act is unconstitutional. We can have one President at a time; we cannot have a President in the White House and a Presidential force in the Congress. The President in the White House is in charge of our foreign policy.

I support what he is doing, but I would encourage he and his advisers to determine that it is in the best interests of this country, America, that Israel has a direct interest in the controversy in Lebanon and the United States has an indirect interest in the area.

Mr. Chairman, this is a sobering moment. No Member of this House can view the decision we are about to make with complete equinimity. The continued deployment of U.S. Marines in Lebanon, under circumstances that can only be described as risky, is a serious business no matter how long they remain. The cease-fire that is in effect today could be gone tomorrow, and gone with it could be the lives of more young marines. Furthermore, there is no assurance that the objectives envisioned when the marines were sent to Lebanon can be achieved in the foreseeable future. Thirteen months have passed since the Marines first set foot in Lebanon and the conflict is no closer to resolution today than it was then. Indeed, many knowledgeable people will tell you that it is even further from the resolution, and it can even be argued that the introduction of peacekeeping forces has had the opposite effect from the one intended.

To my way of thinking, the question of whether Congress or the President or both should authorize the terms of U.S. military participation in Lebanon is of secondary importance to the question of whether or not U.S. troops should be in Lebanon at all. And for that reason, I am going to vote against House Joint Resolution 364. In my view, there is more to be lost than to be gained by keeping the marines in Lebanon and the best way to express that point of view is to oppose any resolution that would have the effect of endorsing their continued presence in that beleaguered, war-torn country.

More than anything else, what brings me to this conclusion is a sense of U.S. history. Americans have long been willing to fight for their rights and the rights of others if necessary. But they have also had a long-standing aversion to getting involved in conflicts where their own interests were not directly affected or when winning the fight was not the ultimate and obvious objective. In Lebanon, a lot of people's rights are being affected, and while it is clear that the Syrians have no business being involved, it is anything but clear as to what extent the rights of the Moslems, the Druze, the Maronite Christians, and the Greek Orthodox are being abused relative to one another. The struggle for power and influence among these and other groups in Lebanon has been going on for years. It is reflected in the Constitution under which the Government of Lebanon currently operates and it is not likely to be settled overnight, peacekeeping forces notwithstanding. Beyond that, American interests are not directly affected by the outcome of the ongoing struggle for power within Lebanon. We do have a direct interest in the survival of Israel dating back to World War II and the holocaust. And we have a direct interest in the primacy of the forces of moderation in the Middle East, not to mention the governments that are supporting those forces. But, in the absence of a threatened military assault on Israel, we can fulfill our moral and political responsibilities to the Israeli Government by providing military and economic assistance. We do not need to be a surrogate for Israeli military forces in order to fulfill those responsibilities. Moreover, it is difficult to understand how we can support the forces of moderation in the Middle East by asking one of those forces—Egypt—to help us maintain a military presence that is being perceived as propping up a Christian rather than a Moslem government there. Likewise, are we not using up our political capital in Saudi Arabia and Jordan by asking those nations to assist us in bringing about a compromise between Moslems and Christians in Lebanon when we are already asking them to support a peace agreement between Arabs and Jews in the Middle East? Which brings up one final point. The objective in Lebanon is not victory for any one side but a negotiated settlement which may be difficult to understand much less achieve. As a consequence one wonders—no, one doubts—if the American people are going to tolerate, much less support, U.S. military involvement for very long. Indeed, the polls are already indicating that Americans do not understand what we are doing over in Lebanon and do not favor our staying there. Perhaps if victory were in the cards, things might be different, but with the best prospect being that of more casualties, public opinion is likely to become even more pronounced in opposition to continued involvement. And that, in turn, could bring about a return of the destructive disillusionment that we, as a nation, suffered after Vietnam, the likes of which we do not need again.

Some Americans argue that, if we pull out now, not only will it precipitate a bloodbath by creating a vacuum into which many will attempt to tread but we will compromise further international peacekeeping efforts. They point, with some justification, to the fact that the French, Italians, and British are involved in the peacekeeping effort right along with us. But these arguments fail to turn the coin over, fail to examine the potential risks to further peacekeeping efforts if this mission results in disillusionment, disaster or both. Let us face it, what happens if gunners in the mountains or in the suburbs keep on firing on United States, French, or Italian troops? We can keep firing back, but if that does not work, then what? Do we and our fellow peacekeepers send out search-and-destroy patrols into the suspected hideout areas? And if we do that, what do we do when, after all sides suffer casualties, the guerrilla fighers fade further into the mountains or into Syria? To follow them there might precipitate a world war, yet if they can operate out of sanctuaries, how can the peacekeepers ever be sure of keeping the peace. Surely, the experience of Vietnam, where sanctuaries were a problem as well, should make clear to all concerned the dangers of escalating involvement. The benefits are not worth the cost—or the risks—in which case we should cut our losses, even if it means urging our fellow peacekeepers to do likewise in the face of some criticism. Statesmanship means being able to make tough, objective decisions and in this case the statesmanlike thing to do is recognize that the chances of failure are at least as good as the chances of success and that the risks are far greater. And then we should act accordingly.

Mr. Chairman, let me make one final point. In the past, I have frequently spoken out against Soviet expansionism, pro-Communist subversion and the need for the United States to maintain a strong national defense and a strong stand in favor of the forces of freedom in the world. And I have questioned whether certain conflicts have indeed been civil wars. However, in the case of Lebanon, I think it is fairly evident that, while pro-Communist forces are actively trying to increase their influence there, the conflict is primarily civil in nature. Moreover, I suspect that even if the Syrians or some other pro-Soviet groups were to attain ascendancy in northern Lebanon, they would face the same kinds of opposition the peacekeepers and the present Government of Lebanon are now facing. The religious and ethnic differences in the Middle East run too deep and too much blood has been shed in Lebanon the past 8 years for things to be otherwise. At some point, the various factions will have fought themselves out and will be willing to make the compromises necessary to live together—or perhaps separately—but that time does not appear to have come. And until it does, those in the middle may only succeed in making everyone mad at them.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ).

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SOLARZ. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, if this resolution, with or without the Obey substitute, is defeated it will mean that the War Powers Act now and forever more will be a dead letter.

The President will be utterly unfettered in terms of what he can do with our troops not only in Lebanon but in any other crisis situation in the future.

So what is at stake here is not simply our policy in Lebanon but whether or not the Congress of the United States is going to exert its rightful role in determining the disposition of American forces in hostilities abroad.

If this resolution is adopted, on the other hand, not only will we have asserted the applicability and relevance of the War Powers Act, not only will we have established an important precedent in terms of the right and the role of the Congress in the disposition of American forces in the future, but we will have established some very real and meaningful limitations on the use to which our forces in Lebanon can be put.

This resolution limits the number of troops that can be deployed in Lebanon; it limits the area in which those troops can serve; it limits the mission to which they can be put; and it establishes that in the event all of the other countries in the multinational force withdraw from Lebanon, our forces must be withdrawn as well. It also gives the Congress the right, through the adoption of a joint resolution, to order the withdrawal of our forces from Lebanon at any time.

So this resolution, whatever its inadequacies may be, and there are inadequacies, nevertheless establishes limitations on what the President can do in Lebanon that simply would not exist if the resolution is defeated.

And if the Members are concerned about what might happen to American forces that are in Lebanon, then I urge you to vote for this resolution, because without it there will be no restraints or limitations on what the President can do there.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, one of the problems in Congress is the fact that we have 100 people in the other body who think that they ought to be President and 435 people in this body who think they ought to be Secretary of State.

As a result of these ego problems, we tend to do some very shortsighted things around here. In my opinion we are doing a vry shortsighted thing on the floor today.

The resolution we have before us states "United States armed forces participating in the multinational force in Lebanon are now in hostilities." We are the only body in this country that has the power to declare war. Congress declares war.

By making that statement we are in fact in a quasi-way declaring war with this resolution.

I think that is shortsighted. I think that it makes very little sense to tell the American people that we, as a body, are bound and determined to retain our ability to act, that we ought to declare war.

Compounding that wrong is the fact that we are declaring war and then drastically limiting the President's ability to act in a timely and flexible manner to protect our troops.

It seems to me that the very least of what we ought to do is maintain a great deal of flexibility.

This resolution fails in that regard.

So I would hope that as we think about our vote in this matter we will not further tie the President's hands with amendments around here, but in the end will vote no on the resolution and not have this body go on record as quasi-declaring war in the Middle East.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD).

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. DREIER).

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think it is important, since a number of our colleagues have tried to draw an allusion between the situation that existed several years ago in Southeast Asia for us to realize that there is a three-point objective that this administration has. It has been outlined very well by the Secretary of State. He has pointed out those three points in stating that the withdrawal of all external forces in Lebanon is one of the goals; the second, our quest of a sovereign, independent Lebanon which is dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout its national territory; and of course the third point, security for the northern border of Israel.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I believe it is critically important that we provide support for this resolution.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS).

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution and will support the Long-Obey substitute.

The issue in this debate is not today whether we should withdraw our forces from Lebanon.

The gentleman from California (Mr. LANTOS) made a fine speech; it just was not a speech about what we are debating today.

What we are debating today is whether or not we are going to give a blank check to this President or any President for 18 months to deploy forces and place them at risk without defining what their purpose is.

Are our marines in Lebanon there for any purpose other than to be shot at? And if that is not the case, what is their purpose? Are they to join forces with the Lebanese Army and shoot at the Druze, or the Shiites, or the Syrians or the PLO and involve ourselves in that civil war?

The time has come for the President of the United States to define what that role is.

□ 1320

And the words that I hear today sound terribly like the words that were spoken in this Chamber and in the other body 19 years ago, even by some of the Members who are repeating those words today.

The fact of the matter is that we have got to make a decision as to whether or not we are going to write a carte blanche for this President or whether or not we are going to impose those limitations that say at least tell us why we are asking our men to die. Is that too much to ask?

Those forces went in about a year ago for 30 days, 60 days, with assurances that the armed factions would respect their presence. That does not exist. They are still there today and we are now talking about how we are going to secure the Middle East with 1,200 troops in Lebanon.

I say to my colleagues it is absurd. They are simply a lightning rod until their role is defined and I think it is reprehensible for us to expose these people without a mission.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER).

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I think that a threshold question needs to be answered and that question is: Are we protecting the marines that are presently stationed in Beirut?

To answer that question for myself I went to Beirut a couple of days ago and toured some of the positions of the marines, talked with their commanders and with the leaders of the naval force that is supporting them.

And the fact is that the marines are not sitting ducks in Beirut as has been stated on the floor. No. 1, they are dug in. They are stationed in bunkers. They are increasing those positions. They are undertaking no patrols. That is the time when soldiers are extremely vulnerable, when they are patrolling the city. They are taking no patrols. They have an immense availability of naval gun fire to support them and that includes the John Rogers, the Virginia, and now the New Jersey with its nine 16-inch guns that have a capability of throwing a 2,000-pound shell with great accuracy in excess of 24 miles. So the marines are protected.

It is true they are on the low ground around the Beirut area. They should be on the high ground. A political decision was made not to move them out of the airport. That was a mistake. But they are protected. And the naval protection that is manifested in the presence of those ships is extremely important.

No. 2, some people have talked about bringing the Marines home. Let us get something straight. The Marines are not coming home. Whether it is the 24th Marine Amphibious Unit or the 31st or another portion of the marines, we keep a marine amphibious unit, together with its supporting Navy unit in the Mediterranean at all times. That is its job. It patrols the Mediterranean. It undertakes joint exercises with our allies in the Mediterranean. It is protecting our vital interests in the Mediterranean. So we are not talking about a situation in we either leave the Marines in Beirut or bring them home. The Marines have a job to do in the Mediterranean out there and that is their beat.

One thing that I noticed when I looked at the Obey substitute is that the Obey substitute, I think, manifests a misperception that we have about the role of the U.S. Marines. As I read it, the Obey substitute basically requires the President, within a given period of time, to either declare war or declare peace. And the point is that the marines have been used historically by the executive branch to make peace, to maintain peace throughout the world. The Marines are not simply a force that hit the beach and attack. They are peacekeepers. That is their job.

In my estimation the passage of the Obey substitute would basically eliminate the power of the United States to use the Marines in that peacekeeping role, where it is not appropriate to either certify peace or decline war.

I urge support of the Zablocki resolution.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PEASE).

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Obey amendment and I do so for several reasons.

It seems to me that a vote for the Long-Obey substitute would do the following:

It would affirm the support of the Congress for President Reagan's quest for a negotiated settlement.

It would provide a meaningful way for Congress to exercise a role in the decision to leave the Marines in Lebanon as events change by the day, by the week, and by the month, as they surely will.

It would compel the President to abide by the law of the land.

It would preserve maximum flexibility for the Congress in responding to the progress of the negotiations.

It would more fully take into account the very tenuous prospects for achieving a reintegration of Lebanese society and Government.

And, finally, it would set the stage for the Congress to press the White House to pursue vigorously ways of substituting other forces for the U.S. Marines now assigned to the multinational peacekeeping force.

I do not think that we ought to take the Marines out precipitously, but I do think they should never have been there in the first place. I took to the well in May, as my colleagues may recall, to urge that the Marines be taken out at that time, as I think our involvement is inevitable when we have marines on the scene in a situation as volatile as Lebanon is. And it is also inevitable, in my view, that if they stay there, they will be involved in further hostilities for a war about which the American people have no understanding of the reason.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE).

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, America has never really gotten over its dose of isolationism which characterized this country certainly in the twenties and into World War II. And I got my education as a World War II young man who believed some of the things I heard then when Hitler was the enemy. That "No man is an island unto himself. The world cannot live half-slave and half-free" and that America had responsibilities in a world that was changing in the face of efforts to dominate it by dictators and the enemies of freedom.

Now I still believe those cliches. And I have asked myself what are our interests in Lebanon. What are we doing there in the first place?

Well, I think that question should be broadened to "What are we doing in the Middle East?" What are our interests in the Middle East?

First of all, and most elementary, is that we are there to preserve the peace, to prevent, if we can, the outbreak of World War III, which all of us recognize would be a cataclysmic disaster.

□ 1330

Second, I think we are there to preserve the resources of the Middle East for Europe, for Japan and for the West.

Now, in opposition to our interests, the interests of the West in the Middle East, is the Soviet Union, which has certain aims which are manifested by their support of Syria, which has a dream of Lebanon as Greater Syria, which are manifested by their 130,000 troops in Afghanistan, by their presence in South Yemen, by their presence in Ethiopia and by their watching and waiting to exploit whatever happens in Iran and Iraq.

The aim of the Soviet Union geopolitically is very simple: to isolate the resources of the Middle East from the West and by fomenting strife to deny us these resources.

Now, the projection of Soviet power further into the Middle East will set the stage, I suggest, for a bloody conflict, the likes of which history has not seen, or else the terminal shrinking of the free world.

Now, there is an old saying, "He who rides a tiger dare not dismount." Like it or not, we are the leader of the free world, and this leadership imposes sometimes very onerous responsibilities. I, too, wish we could pull a blanket over our heads, and let the rest of the world go by. Unfortunately, the rest of the world will not let us. And I suggest to abandon Lebanon, in the face of the resolve of France, Italy, and Great Britain, is to yield the area to the Soviet Union.

I have heard Vietnam mentioned time and time again. I tell you there is no petroleum in Vietnam, West Europe does not depend on Vietnam for its heat, for its industry, for its petroleum. Japan did not depend on Vietnam for their life's blood. So the situation is vastly different. Nobody is getting carte blanche. Congress still controls the purse strings, and no administration can persist in an adventure in a foreign country without public support and without congressional support.

We can do two things: We can cut and run, or call it "walk away and abdicate," or we can stay there and attempt to stabilize the area and to achieve a cease-fire so that the Soviet projection of power will be halted in an area which is vital to the free world. Otherwise, when the Soviets overwhelm the Middle East and its priceless resources, Europe and Japan will have to accomodate to the Soviets and we will literally stand alone in the world.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. All time of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD) has expired.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LUKEN).

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Obey substitute. The problem is that once our troops are committed to a hostile situation, it is almost impossible to withdraw. We get in deeper and deeper. So our purpose at this time should be to obtain a negotiated settlement, to obtain a way for the people of this nation to be heard in negotiating that settlement, and not to get us deeper and deeper and not to take 18 months, to take a minimum amount of time to get our troops out of there, because they will be a source of trouble for the situation and for America while they are there.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SCHUMER).

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Zablocki resolution and in opposition to the Obey substitute.

I would like to bring out two points to the Members of this House on this resolution.

First, the Obey substitute will, by its very wording, encourage the cease-fire to collapse, because there is a choice in this resolution. Either there is a cease-fire, at which point the War Powers Act is not invoked, or there is not a cease-fire and the War Powers Act is invoked.

If Obey passes, there will be every incentive for a faction of the PLO, a faction of the Syrians, a faction of the Shiites to shoot at American marines and end the cease-fire, hence triggering congressional action.

I think it is a grievous mistake to vote for the Obey amendment for that reason.

The second point: We have heard analogies about Vietnam. There is one major reason why this is not Vietnam, and that is because Vietnam has happened already. The American people during the early years of the Vietnam war were all for our committing troops and fighting communism. Having learned the lesson of Vietnam. The American people are against any long-term commitment to troops now. And our democracy works. As much as any President would want to send troops in, he cannot, because popular opinion is against him.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. HAMILTON).

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. HAMILTON) is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 364, a resolution providing statutory authorization under the war powers resolution for continued U.S. participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

INTRODUCTION

This resolution was the product of a bipartisan effort to provide statutory authorization for the continued presence of U.S. marines in Lebanon and to promote U.S. policy goals in Lebanon.

The resolution contains several important provisions;

First, it provides a congressional finding that U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon are in hostilities requiring congressional authorization under the War Powers Resolution, and a congressional determination that section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution became operative on August 9, 1983; and authorizes the continued presence of U.S. Armed Forces under section 5(b) of that resolution;

Second, it stipulates that U.S. participation in the multinational force shall be authorized up to 18 months, unless the Congress extends such authorization.

Such authorization would terminate sooner:

If all foreign forces are withdrawn from Lebanon, unless the President determines and certifies to the Congress that continued U.S. Armed Forces participation is required after such foreign forces withdraw up to the end of the 18-month period in order to establish Lebanese Government Control of the Beirut area;

When the United Nations or the Government of Lebanon is able to assume the responsibilities of the force;

Upon the implementation of other effective security arrangements in the area;

If all other members of the multinational force withdraw;

Or if the President or the Congress directs the withdrawal of U.S. forces in Lebanon sooner.

Third, it limits the functions of U.S. Armed Forces in accordance with the September 25, 1983, international agreement between the United States and Lebanon except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to insure the safety of the multnational force in Lebanon. That agreement limits the Marine contingent to the Beirut area, limits its size, and allows only for self-defense.

Fourth, it requires a semiannual report requirement on: the status, scope, and duration of hostilities involving U.S. forces; the activities and present composition of the multinational force; the results of efforts to reduce and eventually eliminate the force; how continued U.S. participation in the force is advancing U.S. foreign policy interests in the Middle East; and what progress has occurred toward national political reconciliation among all Lebanese groups.

And finally, it declares that other countries should continue to participate in the multinational force, that the United States should promote continuing discussions to bring about the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon, and that the United States should discuss with the Security Council of the United Nations, on an annual basis, the replacement of the multinational force by a U.N. peacekeeping force.

U.S. POLICY OBJECTIVES

Mr. Chairman, this resolution is designed to support and promote important American policy objectives in Lebanon. Those objectives have, from the beginning, been essentially threefold:

The withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon;

A sovereign, independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout its national territory; and

Security for Israel's northern border, so that the inhabitants of northern Israel can live in safety and without fear of artillery or rocket attacks.

These objectives are not changing. They are, and have been, a constant of U.S. policy and the outbreak of fighting over the last 4 weeks should not cause us to lose sight of them.

The insistence of Congress through this resolution to show strong support for these U.S. policy objectives in Lebanon must be considered among the reasons for the achievement of a ceasefire in Lebanon on Sunday. That fragile cease-fire now needs strengthening and nourishing in the days and weeks ahead: It remains a critical time for strong American leadership in Lebanon.

CONCERNS BEING EXPRESSED

Mr. Chairman, despite the broad support for U.S. policy objectives in Lebanon, it is clear that many Members are uneasy about this resolution which authorizes the Marines to stay in Lebanon for an 18-month period. Many well-motivated arguments have been advanced against this resolution:

Some are expressing constitutional concerns. They want the President to be forced to invoke the wars powers resolution directly;

Others have political concerns. They want to do nothing and do not want to give the administration political cover for policies in a small country which are not well understood and for actions in an extremely complicated political environment over which we have little control or influence;

Still others are concerned over the duration of authorization for troops. Some want to put more pressure on the administration to withdraw the Marines soon; some do not want any time period and others want a shorter time period than 18 months; and some want only to get all 1,600 Marines now in Lebanon out without consideration of strategic and regional interests.

And finally, other members are concerned about escalation of U.S. involvement. They want ironclad guarantees against such escalation without further authorization.

Each of these arguments has some merit, but it is clear to me, that on balance, they should be rejected and the resolution should be supported.

WHY THE RESOLUTION SHOULD BE SUPPORTED

Mr. Chairman, House Joint Resolution 364 should be supported because it supports U.S. interests and it effectively addresses some of the concerns being expressed. Six points should be highlighted:

First, war powers: This resolution does invoke the War Powers Act and it forces the President to acknowledge the War Powers Act. It provides a significant historical precedent for future executive-legislative actions on decisions to commit troops abroad. Most Members understandably would prefer to see the President invoke directly the war powers resolution. The fact of the matter is, however, that the President would not do so because to do so would, from his viewpoint, erode his constitutional powers.

As a practical matter, this resolution, under which the Congress invokes the War Powers Act, is as far as this administration will go. The President has indicated that he will sign this resolution. In doing so, the resolution would represent the most significant reaffirmation of the war powers resolution since 1973 when the resolution was enacted.

On the war powers issue, House Joint Resolution 364 represents a compromise. The administration wanted no reference to the War Powers Act: Congress wanted compliance with its full procedures. The compromise may not be all some wanted and what we would like, but it does represent some movement by the administration on an issue on which all other administrations over the last decade have refused to budge and have resisted any movement toward the prevailing congressional view.

This resolution clearly maintains a delicate balance between congressional control and executive feasibility.

Second, duration of authorization.

Mr. Chairman, some Members feel that the 18-month period authorized in House Joint Resolution 364 is too long and too open ended. On balance, the 18-month duration period is better than the alternatives being proposed.

A shorter period sends the wrong signals, weakens the American role in negotiations both in Lebanon and in the Middle East, and strengthens the influence of our political opponents in the Middle East, including the Soviet Union, Syria, and rejectionist forces in the Middle East.

Congress simply should not be sending the signals of doubt and indecision to the Syrians and the Soviets about U.S. intentions and policies in the Middle East. We should not send false signals about the resolve of the United States to maintain troops in Lebanon for a sufficient period of time to allow Lebanon to try to sort out its internal affairs, free of outside political vetos.

A 3- to 6-month period of authorization would enable both the Syrians and the Soviets to wait out the Marine presence and free Syria from serious negotiations over the next several weeks. A short period casts doubt on our staying power. It would only strengthen the hopes and resolve of our adversaries.

A period of 9 months or 1 year for the authorization would put this issue into American Presidential politics and that would not necessarily preserve a bipartisan environment on a delicate and sensitive foreign policy issue.

The 18-month authorizations shows a determination by the United States to achieve our objectives in Lebanon; it helps to take the issue out of domestic politics; and it demonstrates continuity of purpose and policy in Lebanon.

Members should remember that, during this period of authorization, a resolution to seek the early withdrawal of the Marines can be advanced by Congress at any time. Congress is not locked in.

Third, the Marine presence: By permitting the Marines to stay in Lebanon 18 months, the Marines will be able to perform important tasks which contribute vitally to U.S. policy objectives in Lebanon. The Marines were dispatched to Lebanon 1 year ago to participate in a multinational force requested by the Government of Lebanon. This force was designed:

To help insure the Lebanese Government's sovereignty and authority;

To further that Government's efforts to assure the safety of people in the area;

And to end the violence which occurred 1 year ago in the Palestinian refugee camps in Beirut.

Its task is a peacekeeping mission, not a war-fighting mission. Its job is, not to take sides in a war, but to provide a sense of security for the legitimate Government of Lebanon as it pursues its national sovereignty and national unity. The rules of engagement of the Marines are that they will defend themselves if military action from any quarter interferes with their mission.

The Marines cannot tip the balance of forces in the country alone and that is not their purpose, but the Marine contingent does represent a key element in efforts to achieve stability in Lebanon.

They must remain in order that diplomacy has an opportunity to work. They, along with the other members of the multinational force—the Italians, the French, and the British—are symbols of commitment to a united sovereign Lebanon.

If they were to be removed, that commitment would become hollow, U.S. objectives in Lebanon would be unattainable, and the future of Lebanon would be in jeopardy.

Fourth, impact of Marine withdrawal: Some believe that the Marine contingent, under present circumstances, should be promptly withdrawn. We all have some misgiving about the continued presence of Marines in Lebanon. There are good reasons for keeping that presence and pushing for the attainment of our objectives in Lebanon. The likely implications of an early withdrawal of that Marine contingent must be examined.

Lebanon: The Government of Lebanon would be jeopardized, if not lost. We would be abandoning pursuit of U.S. objectives in Lebanon which are threefold:

A sovereign independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout its national territory; and

Security for Israel's northern border, so that the inhabitants of northern Israel can live in safety and without fear of artillery and rocket attacks.

Syria: An early withdrawal now would be giving a freer hand to Syria and the Soviet Union to try to accomplish their own goals to dominate Lebanon. Syria now has the largest army in Lebanon, but it has refused to negotiate the withdrawal of its forces, reneging on repeated pledges that it would do so once the Israelis did. At the same time, Syria is using its leverage within Lebanon and has instigated political opposition within Lebanon and armed several factions engaged in military actions against that legitimate government.

Moderate Arab states: A withdrawal would be harmful to U.S. interests in all friendly and moderate states in the region: Israel, Egypt, Jordan, and Saudi Arabia would all be adversely affected by a withdrawal, and alienated from the United States. The United States would see its influence and prestige radically reduced throughout the Middle East. Friends who rely on us will be disheartened, and will feel that much less secure. Moderates in the Arab world whom we are encouraging to take risks for peace will feel it far less safe to do so.

Soviet Union: Soviet efforts to disrupt our diplomacy will have scored a victory and radical and rejectionist elements will be strengthened. In short, if American efforts for peaceful solutions are overwhelmed by brute force, our role is that much weakened everywhere. The Middle East would become an unchallenged target of opportunity for the Soviet Union.

Israel: Israel's security on its northern border will be weakened and the cause of peace and justice will have suffered a setback.

Basic principles: Finally, at stake in Lebanon are some basic principles of international law and international morality that have wider relevance for American foreign policy. At stake is a small country's right to decide for itself how to achieve its sovereign objectives, free from outside pressure, threat, or blackmail.

At stake also is the principle that international disputes should be settled by peaceful means, not by the use of threat or force.

Fifth, limitations on escalation: House Joint Resolution 364 and its legislative history also puts constraints on possible future escalation of U.S. involvement.

First, Public Law 98-43, the Lebanese Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, which requires statutory authorization if there is a substantial increase in the number or role of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon. This means that Congress would have to approve any large expansion of the current marine contingent which is in Lebanon or any new mandate or role for that contingent.

Second, when the President signed Public Law 98-43 on June 27, 1983, he said:

> Section 4(a) of the Lebanese Emergency Assistance Act confirms this administration's announced intention with respect to congressional authorization concerning any future substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. forces in Lebanon.

And third, only yesterday, the President reiterated in a letter to Chairman ZABLOCKI this commitment:

> My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act: It would be my intention to seek Congressional authorization—as contemplated by the Act—if circumstances require any substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. armed forces in Lebanon.

Congress, thus, will maintain its ability to control and shape continued military involvement in Lebanon, even during the 18-month period of authorization.

Sixth, implication of the cease-fire: The September 25, 1983, cease-fire shows both that U.S. determination pays off and that the process in Lebanon is working. That cease-fire urgently needs more time. House Joint Resolution 364 gives the essential political process in Lebanon time to develop. That process is at a critical point. An initial success has been achieved. We must allow that process to proceed. It is time for a strong, clear, and consistent commitment to the task at hand.

SUMMARY

This resolution, then, should be supported for the following reasons:

One. It invokes the War Powers Act;

Two. It permits the marines to stay in Lebanon long enough for diplomacy to work and to help achieve stability in Lebanon;

Three. It gives the United States and its allies a chance to continue to work for America's longstanding foreign policy in he Middle East, including:

A secure northern border for Israel;

A free, united Lebanon without foreign troops;

And a Middle East peace settlement.

Four. It limits escalation of the American military presence and role in Lebanon without congressional statutory authorization; and Five. It allows the United States time to try to build on the success of the September 25, 1983 cease-fire.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would urge my colleagues to support House Joint Resolution 364. There are no easy answers to the problems we confront in Lebanon. But it is clear that current U.S. policy seeks to achieve laudable objectives. Until it becomes impossible to obtain those objectives, the United States should remain in Lebanon and use all instruments available to us to achieve our goals.

House Joint Resolution 364 does present risks. There are no guarantees that, if enacted, our objectives will be achieved.

If Congress were to seek to avoid this debate and let the President stand alone, Congress would be shirking its responsibilities and its legitimate role on the question of the stationing of U.S. Armed Forces overseas.

The United States is a great power and we must accept the responsibilities of being a great power. The United States simply cannot walk away from its stated responsibilities and expect the world to be the same again.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of House Joint Resolution 364.

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Chairman, the resolution we are considering today is one of the most important pieces of legislation likely to come before us this session. House Joint Resolution 364 invokes the war powers resolution and authorizes the continued presence of U.S. forces in Lebanon for the next 18 months.

Like many of my colleagues, I have reservations about the length of time we are committing U.S. forces in the region.

However, this resolution, as reported out of the Foreign Affairs Committee, on which I serve, will provide a clear indication to the parties to the conflict of U.S. resolve to find a negotiated settlement to the hostilities and bring stability to Lebanon.

It is important to remember that the U.S. Marines are just one part of the multinational peacekeeping force.

This multinational force is playing a crucial role in ending the turmoil and preventing the conflict from spreading to other nations in the Middle East.

A congressional expression of support for a continued U.S. role in the multinational force is vital to its success. It will demonstrate our determination to find a solution which addresses the legitimate concerns of the parties involved and which will endure the test of time.

The fact that this legislation has received the support of congressional leaders from both parties may have had a significant influence in achieving the current cease-fire. It is my hope that this cease-fire will help achieve a negotiated settlement to the conflict long before the 18-month time limit provided for in the resolution.

It is important to remember that Congress has not given the President an 18-month carte blanche. This legislation in no way signals any congressional support for an expanded U.S. role in Lebanon. It specifically expresses our disapproval of any unilateral U.S. role in Lebanon. Should the President try to increase the number of U.S. troops, expand their mission in Lebanon, or alter the terms of our participation in any way, he would be required to come back before Congress for our authorization.

The legislation clearly states that our role is to support the MNF and to help the Government of Lebanon restore full control of its country.

We would retain the right to withdraw U.S. participation at any time during the 18-month period by concurrent resolution.

In the meantime, Congress will continue to search for ways to end the conflict so that the presence of the multinational force is no longer necessary.

House Joint Resolution 364 will also insure Congress its continuing, rightful role in the foreign policy process and maintain the integrity of the War Powers Act. Its defeat will almost surely result in a clash between the executive and the legislative branches which could result in a diminished foreign policy role for this institution.

I urge my colleagues to support this important resolution. Congressional approval of it will demonstrate to the world our strong commitment to defending our interests in the Middle East, and to finding a just and lasting solution to the conflict.●

● Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the resolution (H.J. Res. 364). Although I have supported and will continue to support economic and military aid to Lebanon, I certainly share the concerns of most Americans about the safety of the U.S. Marines currently stationed in the Beirut area.

I had many misgivings when the troops were initially sent to Beirut last year on their mission. Clearly, one must recognize that the situation in Lebanon today is greatly different than it was 1 year ago. The current conditions in Lebanon raised the question of the invocation of the War Powers Act in order to provide for congressional support and participation in our Lebanon policy. The compromise worked out this week between the Congress and the President does, I believe, sufficiently provide for congressional input into the development of our Lebanon policy.

Specifically, the agreement that was reached calls for the following:

A joint resolution of the Congress which will declare that "U.S. Armed Forces participating in the multinational force are now in hostilities requiring authorization of their continued presence under the war powers resolution."

Congressional approval for the Marines to stay up to an additional 18 months.

Authorizes President Reagan to take "such protective measures as may be necessary to insure the safety of the multinational force in Lebanon."

Provides a legal precedent for the War Powers Act, which should help lay to rest questions about the constitutionality of this important piece of legislation.

The value of this bipartisan compromise is that the resolution makes it clear that Congress has an important role to play in the shaping of American foreign policy, as well as the fact that when it comes to the Lebanon crisis, the Congress stands by the Marines, and their mission. Therefore, those that oppose our policy goals in Lebanon cannot mistake the invocation of the War Powers Act as a sign that the United States does not have the resolve to stand behind its commitment to Lebanon's democratically elected government. We have also made it clear that Congress supports our Nation's current policy goals in Lebanon, which are: To insure the survival of Lebanon's pro-Western government; to assist in the stabilization and expansion of Lebanese central authority; and to guarantee that southern Lebanon is never again used by outside forces as a base for the operations of international terrorism or attacks on northern Israel. On these points there is almost unanimous agreement in Congress.

There is no question that a stable, pro-Western Lebanese Government is not yet strong enough to stand alone against the hostile factions, or the Syrians who still occupy over half the country and who do not recognize the sovereignty of the Beirut government.

Given these facts, it is clear that our immediate pullout of U.S. forces would have disastrous consequences. The move could cause the downfall of the Gemayel government, and its replacement, by a Syrian controlled puppet government, or perhaps even the outright annexation of Lebanon by Syria. Lebanon would once again become a base for the operations of terrorist groups, including the return of the PLO into the area. This would mean that the area could once again be used to launch attacks on northern Israel, something which I find completely unacceptable. Overall, the result would be that the withdrawal of the Marines would be viewed as a sign of weakness by both our allies and adversaries. It would bring into question our ability to stand behind our commitments to friendly governments in the Middle East and around the world. In short, it would be a victory for the Soviet Union and its surrogates.

I support this joint resolution of Congress for the reasons I have already mentioned, and because I feel that to prematurely withdraw our troops from Lebanon would be to reward Soviet backed Syrian aggression, and would cause us to suffer a serious setback in our long-term strategic and national interests. I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of this important resolution.●

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, the Zablocki amendment is a good one. It will help to insure that this resolution will cause real Executive-congressional cooperation on the matter of our peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

I have remained uncommitted on House Joint Resolution 364, but it is no secret that I have been leaning toward an unfavorable vote. No one can be sure what the War Powers Act means, or how this resolution actually affects it. All we know is that the President, and the bipartisan leadership of the Congress feel it protects the rights and authorities of all parties, confirms our peacekeeping role in Lebanon, and expresses our intention to friend and foe alike.

My chief concern has been the safety of our Marines in Lebanon. The environment there, while rendered more pleasant by the current cease-fire, has not been one of safety. The President's promise to report to Congress and the Zablocki amendment would seem to help, but there is no escape from the conclusion that our people, and the whole multinational peacekeeping force are in a risky position.

Our mission in Lebanon is important. Our forces are concrete proof of our devotion to the cause of peace. Our allies have made similar sacrifices. We should walk the extra mile in search of peace. We are justified in accepting some extra risk for that cause.

I am still not wholly convinced that resolution does any good. I am now convinced that it has become an important symbol to our friends and allies, especially those who share peacekeeping risks with us, that we are committed to peace seeking.

I shall cast a nervous vote for the resolution, and for the President who has assured us he needs it, and even for the Speaker who has assured us it grants no new authority, nor blank check to the President.●

● Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Chairman, I have had a great deal of difficulty with the issue of American troops in Lebanon. It is my duty to seriously question the risking of American lives on foreign soil in any but the most crucial of circumstances. Peace and stability in the Middle East is critical to U.S. interests.

The recent announcement of a cease-fire in Lebanon indicates that the presence of the multinational peacekeeping force has had a stabilizing effect on this strife torn region. The combatants have been convinced of our determination to maintain peace in the Middle East.

House Joint Resolution 364 authorizes the presence of U.S. Marines in Lebanon for 18 months and requires the President to submit reports to Congress once every 6 months on the activities of the multinational peacekeeping forces. Most important, it allows for the withdrawal of our Marines from Lebanon if there is an agreement for withdrawal of all foreign forces.

The purpose of peace is served if the Congress declares that the War Powers Act is involved, and it takes an active role in determining U.S. policy in Lebanon. I believe that we, the representatives of the people, by our involvement, will insure that the President acts responsibly before involving U.S. Armed Forces in foreign disturbances.●

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, we are engaging in an historic debate here today. Fortunately, as we speak, our Marines in Lebanon are enjoying the benefits of a cease-fire. Our President still contends that the Marines are not engaged in combat, although I am sure they would disagree. But at least the imminent threat of physical danger has subsided for the moment.

So here we are, making compromises about the degree of danger our Marines face, while they are holed up at the Beirut Airport. I must say, Mr. Chairman, I find this proposed compromise quite surreal. We are giving the President a blank check for 18 months, and all he is doing is admitting that the situation that exists in Lebanon is one that should be covered by the War Powers Act.

Mr. Chairman, we all know that. Of course the War Powers Act should have been invoked. At the very latest, it should have been in effect since August 29 of this year, when the first marine fatalities occurred. But that is all we have asked for, in return for our approval of an additional 18 months of U.S. combat presence in Lebanon. Mr. Chairman, I think we have been had.

Are we so naive that we believe that even if we do give the President a free hand in Lebanon for 18 months, that he will indeed find a solution and have our Marines home by March 28, 1985, the end of the 18-month period. This is the same President that finds it so easy to make and break other promises, and make the truth whatever suits him at the moment. Let me recall a few examples for you:

First, President Reagan promised us that the United States was not engaged in covert activities in Central America. This has proven totally false, although I suppose the activities are no longer "covert."

Second, President Reagan promised us that the only reason our advisers were in Honduras was to stop the flow of arms from Nicaragua to the rebels in El Salvador. It is now clear, and the Defense Department has basically confirmed, that the real reason we are there is to aid in the overthrow of the Sandinista government.

Third, the President promised, as early as his 1980 campaign, that he would pursue arms control agreements. After 17 months of indecision, he called off the SALT talks. Although he began his own START talks, no progress has been made at all on this front. Remember, this is the same man that at once said he thought a nuclear war was survivable—he of course retracted this statement fairly quickly.

Now, why should we expect a man with that kind of record to follow through in 18 months with promises he makes now? The answer is, we should not. I believe it is our responsibility to get our U.S. Marines out of Lebanon immediately. Let us not wait 18 months. We will only find the situation more difficult.●

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment in the nature of a substitute to House Joint Resolution 364 offered by Messrs. LONG and OBEY. From the very beginning of our involvement in Lebanon, I have been greatly concerned about the safety and well-being of our Marines being sent into that civil war torn country as members of a multinational peacekeeping force. The situation in Lebanon is one of longstanding trouble among many groups. It is a civil war between a Christian group and a number of Moslem groups. I do not feel that the United States or any other country has any business in trying to impose a political solution on these groups. Nor, do I believe that any nation can be successful in working a political solution in Lebanon. The government of Amin Gemayel has been steadily losing support, and must start to make serious attempts at negotiating with the Moslem groups.

We no longer live in a world, nor do I feel we ever really did, where the United States can act as a world policeman in quelling disturbances. The American people do not want this, nor, is the rest of the world willing to let the United States play this role any longer. It is unfortunate, but it appears that our motives will always be treated with suspect and mistrust. The trouble in Lebanon has existed for many hundreds of years and keeping a contingent of American Marines there for 90 days or 18 months will not, in my estimation, bring about a solution to the problem. It will take years of serious negotiations and compromises to bring about a lasting peace.

I feel that the U.S. presence in Lebanon is not helpful to us in improving our relations with the various factions involved in that country. The majority of the Lebanese Moslem groups feel that the United States is on the side of the Christians and that we are not serious about negotiating a true peace. The rival factions in Lebanon have long been at odds and I feel that they will have to eventually work out their differences by themselves. President Reagan should consult with the leaders of the other countries involved in the peacekeeping force and tell them of our intentions to withdraw our forces.

We must leave Lebanon before we become embroiled in a much more dangerous situation, and before there is any more loss of American lives. Many members of this body, today, believe that our Marines should not be in Lebanon, but they say unfortunately we are there and we cannot just walk away. But next time we should see to it that we do not get involved. Well I say that for me, this time is next time, and we should get the Marines out now. I urge all of my colleagues to support the Long-Obey substitute, it is not the best solution, but it is the best one we have before us today.●

● Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, back in 1964, after telling us that American vessels had been attacked in the Gulf of Tonkin, the President came to Congress and urged us to pass—in an atmosphere of emergency—a resolution "affirming the national determination that all such attacks will be met and that the United States will continue its basic policy of assisting the free nations of the area to defend their freedom." The resolution further stated that the United States is "prepared, as the President determines, to take all necessary steps, including the use of Armed Forces, to assist any member or protocol state of the Southeast Asian collective defense treaty requesting assistance in defense of its freedom."

Congress knew the wording of the resolution. We knew that the naked words could be construed to give the President almost complete sanction to involve the United States militarily in anything he considered necessary to the national interest in Southeast Asia. But that was not the Nation's understanding of the administration's intentions in the summer of 1964, nor was that Congress understanding of the administration's intention.

In fact, Congress was repeatedly assured that the administration had no intention of enlarging the conflict and sending vast numbers of American boys to fight an Asian war.

Congress was assured that the resolution was not intended to serve as a perpetual letter of credit. It was intended to be a stopgap measure to let the world know that even though Congress might be dispersed around the country for 3 months of campaigning before the election of 1964, that the President could respond immediately and forcefully as the situation demanded.

So it was that Congress passed the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, recognizing the fact that we were granting or confirming vast power upon the President based upon assurances that he did not intend to use that power to expand the conflict or to extend our involvement in it.

On August 12, 5 days after Congress approved the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, President Johnson said:

Some others are eager to enlarge the conflict. They called upon us to do the job that Asian boys should do. They asked us to take reckless action which might risk the life of millions and engulf much of Asia and certainly threaten the peace of the entire world. Such action would offer no solution at all to the real problem in Vietnam.

Obviously, even after he had the Gulf of Tonkin resolution in his pocket, it was not the President's intention to use it to expand the American presence in Vietnam.

But as we all know, war is hell and, as we learned, it is really hell on good intentions. That conflict stretched to 9 years and the Gulf of Tonkin resolution was used to justify every action taken in Vietnam—action which raised the number of Americans engaged from a few hundred to a few thousand to more than half a million and nearly 50,000 Americans lost their lives.

Today, we are debating a similar resolution. We are told that the powers it grants or confirms are more limited than those given to President Johnson in the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, and on the surface that is true.

This resolution provides an authorization for U.S. participation in the multinational force for only 18 months. There were no time constraints in the Gulf of Tonkin resolution.

This resolution limits the number of U.S. troops involved to current levels. There was not such limit in the Gulf of Tonkin resolution.

This resolution limits the role of U.S. Marines to a defensive posture in the Beirut area. There were no such restrictions in the Gulf of Tonkin resolution.

But, Mr. Chairman, I contend that these limitations and restrictions are nothing more than good intentions—like the ones we heard from the administration in 1964—and we must recognize that a war in the Mideast can be just as hard on good intentions as a war in Southeast Asia was.

There is nothing in this resolution to guarantee that our Marines will come home in 18 months. There is nothing in this resolution to guarantee that the President will feel compelled to abide by the restrictions and limitations it contains. There is nothing in this resolution that guarantees we will not slide in deeper and deeper than we ever intended.

It is not honest or fair for us to pretend that this resolution is any different than the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. What we should be debating today is not time limitations that might not mean anything or troop limitations that might not mean anything. What we should be debating today is whether or not we should be in Lebanon at all.

Our Marines were sent into Lebanon on a peacekeeping mission but there is no peace to keep. They are in the middle of a war.

If Congress approves this resolution, it will be saying—"OK, we will take a piece of the action in this war, but we would like to limit our involvement to 18 months and 1,200 marines, who won't take part in actual combat unless they are attacked." Have we not learned that war is not like a game of parcheesi where the rules are printed on the box top? War is an unpredictable creature and you cannot dictate terms to it, even if you pass a congressional resolution. You are either in it or not in it.

And the question before us today should not be whether or not we would like the war in Lebanon to be short, sweet, and painless—but whether we should be in it at all.

Unfortunately, much of this debate seems to be centering around the age old question of what the proper role of Congress is in situations like this.

This Congress—as have all Congresses before it—correctly wished to protect its constitutionally mandated responsibility for declaring war.

This President—as have all Presidents before him—correctly wished to protect his constitutionally mandated responsibility to serve as Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces.

It would be nice, if we could resolve this question today and lay down specific ground rules so that both Congress and the President would know exactly where their responsibilities lay and where the responsibilities of the other began. It would certainly give the historians and constitutional lawyers something to talk about over their wine and cheese at the club this weekend.

But while we are pondering this question that has gone unanswered for 200 years, American marines are sitting on a powder keg and I think our first responsibility has to be to them. I think it is clear that our first responsibility has to be with those Americans—the vast majority of them—who question our presence in a Lebanon war.

This resolution before us begs the important question—this resolution says that since they are there, our marines can stay if certain conditions are met. It does not raise the overriding issue: Should we be there at all? For that reason, I intend to vote against it. It just reminds me too much of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution.●

● Mr. BIAGGI. I rise in reluctant support of House Joint Resolution 364 with respect to the future of our military presence in Lebanon. My support has three basic premises. The first is the importance to the continued security of Israel of maintaining our presence and that of the other nations in the multination peacekeeping force. The second is based on my longstanding support of the President and his power as our Commander in Chief to make determinations about the use of our military forces without the power being usurped by Congress. Finally, my third reason for support of the resolution is based on a concern about the alternative; namely, an immediate withdrawal from Lebanon which would place in jeopardy the security, even the lives, of those troops there presently.

These three reasons warrant a vote in favor of the resolution as reported by the House Foreign Affairs Committee. There are other reasons also. Thanks in some measure to the ceasefire announced by Syria this past weekend, the door has been opened which may be followed by a lasting and durable political solution. Our continued presence in Lebanon may be critical to keeping that process alive. To force a withdrawal could lead to a resumption of fighting, posing an even greater threat to the security of the Middle East. We are in the position of supporting the Lebanese Army and Government until it reaches a point where it can take matters into their own hands. It is consistent with our Nation's advocacy of the right of self-determination for all people. The presence of our marines has helped to stabilize the Lebanese Government and has allowed the army valuable time to develop as well.

Since the time this resolution was developed, there have been other steps taken to allay some of my other concerns. I have reservations about the 18-month commitment of the troops, yet as everyone knows, the 18 months should be viewed as a ceiling, not a floor, in terms of time; they could be withdrawn at any point prior to the 18 months. I have concerns about the potential for escalation of our involvement if we adopt this resolution. Yet, the President has clearly certified to Congress that he would seek specific congressional authorizations were any increase in either the size or the role of the troops be required in this 18-month period.

I do not take this vote, though, without some serious concerns. Let us not forget that, all told, our marines have been there for almost 1 year. When they first went in, it was for a specific reason—to help in the evacuation of the PLO from Lebanon—a process I had the privilege to see firsthand while on an official visit. Later, they returned in a less specific role, but in response to the barbaric massacre of Palestinians by Phalangist militiamen and the fears about the stability of the government. It was then that the establishment of the multinational peacekeeping force was established.

Today, we have nearly 12,000 Navy and Marine personnel deployed offshore and onshore in Lebanon. These include 1,600 marines in the always precarious position near the Beirut Airport. As the fighting intensified between Druze and Syrian-backed forces, the U.S. Marines found themselves as targets, as compared to peacekeepers. When two brave marines were killed, followed soon after by two others, suddenly a wave of fear began to envelop our Nation over what the precise present and future roles of the marines would be in this new warcharged climate.

The need to be clear as to the precise roles of our marines in Lebanon both today and tomorrow is absolutely vital for the American people to know, for the marines in Lebanon do not want to suffer from the same perception problem as our forces did in Vietnam. This legislation should help clarify the situation as to not only the role of our forces but also the duration of our commitment.

I am persuaded today to vote for this resolution because it is important to the security of Israel for us to maintain our military presence in Lebanon. Clearly, the leaders and people of Israel, much like the rest of the world, would like to see the cease-fire, announced this past weekend, hold up. However, as the American Israel Public Affairs Committee points out, Syria's record in Lebanon leaves one apprehensive about their ability to honor a cease-fire. They have been responsible for the attacks on the multinational peacekeeping forces; they have fostered unrest and open warfare in Lebanon aimed at destabilizing the government. Syria can continue to be the aggressor in Lebanon, thanks to the generous support they receive from the Soviet Union. It is therefore imperative, if we are to maintain a balance of power in the Middle East, that Lebanon be able to attain independence and Israel remain strong. Only a continued American military and diplomatic presence in Lebanon can accomplish this.

I am distressed over the casualties we have already incurred in Lebanon and fervently hope that there will be no more bloodshed. I believe the continued U.S. military presence in Lebanon may contribute to the political and diplomatic solution we all want for Lebanon. I believe an immediate withdrawal will precipitate more problems than it solves and may embroil us in a far deeper conflict with far greater consequences to our national security. House Joint Resolution 364 is the most sensible road for the Congress to travel on. It invokes the War Powers Act and permits the continued presence and action by U.S. Marines for 18 months, but would allow for a shorter duration. It is legislation which respects the extreme sacrifice made by the four marines who have died for a principle. To withdraw would be to make their sacrifice in vain.

I support this resolution and the bipartisan spirit in which it was developed and presented to us. It is a compromise, yet it honors the basic integrity of our involvement in Lebanon. It may prove to be the legislative architect of a lasting peace in Lebanon which, if true, would make this one of the legislative milestones of this or any other Congress.●

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Chairman, as a young Congressman, I watched as the older, wiser, and more experienced hands handled Vietnam; and today I am seeing and hearing the same things about Lebanon. The pattern is the same.

First, we send the marines.

Then we send ships to support the marines.

And then we send an aircraft carrier to support the ships and marines.

And now the battleship New Jersey has been sent there to support everything else.

All of these things are investments, and once heavy investments of blood and treasure are made, the demand is to follow it with more to prove the investment.

Five marines are dead in Lebanon and 43 have been wounded. As we debate, in the passing of a second, it could be 10 and 86.

Shows of force, if they do not work, are followed by the application of force; and if these do not gain what is desired, the temptation is to apply just a little more force to gain what is just out of reach.

And soon a battalion or a regiment is a brigade and a division.

And thus does a peacekeeping force become an army at war.

They say we have allies there whom we cannot let down. We had allies at the outset in Vietnam, but who bore the burden?

The compromise we are offered is no compromise because there is so much room to take these same steps up the ladder, to up the ante. There are far too many "unlesses" and "untils" in what is offered.

The War Powers Act is a proper law and the compromise erodes it. The United States has no business being in Lebanon, a land that has known no peace since Alexander the Great, and this is what this body should say without mincing words.

We have a War Powers Act. We passed it after due consideration for just such situations. Now let us use it and live by it.●

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the presence of the multinational peacekeeping force with U.S. Marines is preventing a much wider civil war and is facilitating the possibility that a peaceful solution can be found in Lebanon. Today, I supported the Long-Obey substitute to the joint resolution invoking the war powers resolution and authorizing U.S. forces in Lebanon. It allows their continued presence, but also provides periodic congressional review.

The resolution brought by the Foreign Affairs Committee to the floor gives the President too much time to keep the troops in Lebanon without a congressional review. If the rule would have allowed for a vote on an amendment to authorize the continued presence of the marines for 6 months, instead of 18 months, I would have supported the resolution.

It is right for the multinational peacekeeping force to be in Lebanon to try to bring peace to the region. I have hoped this administration would try to get more countries to commit peacekeeping forces there. It is needed as a counterweight to Syria, which has never recognized a Lebanese Government and which clearly harbors ambitions for a "Greater Syria." The recent deaths of the four marines would not have happened if Syria had not been aiding its Lebanese allies with Soviet weapons. The United States cannot walk away from this challenge from Syria, and indirectly from the Soviet Union.

However, I would oppose the continued presence of the marines if the administration were opposing efforts to broaden the base of the Lebanese Government. In that case, the marines would be there forever since the present Government, while enjoying increasing popular support, is still to narrowly based. The Reagan administration, in Lebanon—unlike in El Salvador—has said it would support negotiations which would broaden the base of the Government and bring about national reconciliation. And the presence of the marines had been vital in bringing the Syrians and their Lebaneses allies, first, to a cease-fire and, second, to the negotiating table.

However, and this is a big however, we do not know if it is going to work. The divisions in Lebanese society are very deep. Hatred has been intensified in the on/off civil war that has been going on for a decade. Every major and minor religious group has its own or two or three different private militia. In a population just over 2 million, there are 700,000 military weapons in private hands.

I support steps taken by the administration to encourage broad-based negotiations. I think most Members of Congress do. But the Constitution and the war powers resolution say that Congress is an equal partner in all decisions that bring American troops into a foreign war.

The Long-Obey substitute is not only good law, but it is good policy. I would have given the President a little more flexibility by voting for 6 months, but there is flexibility in this substitute. As long as the President can either certify that there is a cease-fire in place and that negotiations are continuing, or invoke the war powers resolution, the marines can stay.

If he invokes the war powers resolution, then there are 60 days for Congress and the American people to openly debate the continued presence of the marines. Congress then can decide, based on the circumstances at that time whether to authorize continued deployment. If the President certifies that a cease-fire is in effect, then the mutually agreed policy is continuing to work and there is no need for a congressional review.

I hope the administration succeeds with its efforts. If they do, I am sure all the American people will applaud. But if they do not, if the continued deployment of marines only leads to more American deaths without any movement toward a resolution, then we, in Congress, must be able to decide if the marines should come home. Only the Long-Obey substitute provides that opportunity.●

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Resolution 364.

I commend the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), the chairman of the committee, for the careful and judicious weighing of executive and legislative interests which the resolution represents, but also because of the sensible limitations which it reinforces on the risks to which our Marine contingent may be subjected in Lebanon.

The lives of those Americans should be paramount in our consideration, whatever one's position on the war powers issue.

For me, however, the resolution of the war powers question is clear.

The Congress has the unchallenged constitutional authority to regulate the expenditures of our Government.

It has similarly unquestioned authority to declare war.

The war powers resolution implements this authority in a clearly permissible way when it restricts the period during which appropriated funds are available to pay for the deployment of troops overseas in hostilities or situations where hostilities are imminent.

Under the framework of the war powers resolution—which House Resolution 364 recognizes and upholds—open-ended commitments are not possible because Congress has limited their duration and asserted the right to be a full partner in the process that would continue to put the lives of our Armed Forces on the line.

I am sure there is no Member in this Chamber today who does not have some reservations about the position in which the marines now find themselves in Lebanon.

Some believe 18 months is too long a commitment, but as we all know, Congress could further restrict that period by subsequent legislation.

The President is conscious of this and will, to the extent that Congress speaks with a strong voice on the matter, respond to developments in ways that satisfy congressional concerns.

Certainly the provisions of this resolution provide particular restrictions—worked out in conjunction with the President—on the role of our peacekeeping forces, the conditions of their continued presence in Lebanon, and clear requirements for congressional approval of any expanded role for U.S. Forces.

This resolution represents a major assertion of sensible congressional control over a perilous deployment of U.S. troops overseas.

Most importantly, it is the fruit of a cooperative partnership between the executive and legislative branches—the kind of shared decisionmaking the war powers resolution was designed to achieve.

I applaud this very significant accomplishment.

It should not only preserve our Nation's influence in efforts to achieve a lasting Lebanese peace but serve as an excellent precedent for future applications of the war powers resolution.●

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, as many of my colleagues know, during the 1960's I was frequently a vocal critic of my own administration's involvement and policies in Southeast Asia. To the best of my knowledge, I voted against every appropriation of funds which kept us embroiled in that unfortunate, divisive war. At first, mine was a very unpopular commitment. Patriotism was defined in extremely narrow terms, and many of my own values and convictions were called into question.

I continued my opposition, however, because I firmly believe that negotiation is the proper vehicle for resolving conflicts. When I returned to Congress in the early 1970's, I supported the passage of the War Powers Act, not because I believed it to be a vehicle for achieving peace or relieving tensions, but because I believed that Congress should have a substantial role in any military confrontation. War, under whatever euphemism, is deadly and destructive; war is not to be engaged in without deep and penetrating examination.

For over 1 year now, the U.S. Marines have been a part of a multinational force (MNF) in Beirut, Lebanon. At first, the marines were there to secure the evacuation of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO). But after the MNF, consisting also of French and Italian troops, left in mid-September, 1982, chaos erupted. On September 14, the President-elect of Lebanon, Bashir Gemayel, was assassinated; on September 15, Israeli troops began to enter the former PLO stronghold in West Beirut; and between September 16 and 18, several hundred Palestinians, and some Lebanese civilians, were massacred by Christian Phalangist forces in two refugee camps, which were under nominal Israeli control.

On September 20, President Reagan announced that a force of 1,200 marines would return to Beirut, along with 3,600 other military personnel from France and Italy. These forces returned on September 29, with each responsible for a particular section of Beirut. The U.S. Marines are concentrated near the Beirut Airport. In February 1983, 100 British personnel were added to the MNF.

The administration has continued to work with the Lebanese Government and others to negotiate the withdrawal of all foreign troops in Lebanon, facilitating the self-determination of the Lebanese. There has been some nominal success. An agreement has been worked out with Israel on condition of the withdrawal of Syrian troops. Syria refused to withdraw under these terms. Meanwhile other factions continue their aggression.

On August 29, 1983, the first of several U.S. marines was killed in action. This violence severely altered American popular support for the commitment of U.S. Marines, even as a peacekeeping force, in Lebanon. The reaction by Congress and the American people underlines the failure of the administration to fully explain the rationale for the forces in Lebanon, including their mission, role, and duration of stay.

In negotiations with Congress over the last few weeks, the administration regrettably has attempted to narrowly define the role of Congress as outlined by the War Powers Act. The War Powers Act was an attempt to insure congressional involvement in any commitment of the U.S. military in international hostilities. It is a wise provision. The 60-day trigger stipulation, prohibiting the continued commitment of troops unless approved by Congress, permits full and complete consideration of a military involvement which could potentially lead to more bloodshed. It was an attempt to avoid another Gulf of Tonkin resolution; 60 days would provide the administration ample time to fully explain its position and provide Congress the necessary information on which to base a decision.

While I am not fully cognizant of all the facts in this situation, I suspect that Congress will ultimately support our continued presence in Lebanon as long as the marines are preceived as a stabilizing force and a negotiated peace appears eminent. Important negotiations involving U.S. emissary Robert McFarlane, the Saudis, the Syrians, the Druze, and other groups are proceeding in Damascus and Cyprus. While Congress, as stipulated by the War Powers Act, should remain a full partner, we must also exercise patience. We must permit negotiations to continue; we cannot undermine the administration's attempts at negotiations.

For these reasons, I felt that the provisions of the substitute offered would provide a balance between the need for Congress to be involved and the need to continue efforts at the negotiating table. It would have provided a flexibility that this rapidly changing situation requires. Without this compromise, we in Congress will be challenged to keep close watch on progress in this area and be prepared, if needed, to take action in the future.

But we have had a vigorous debate today and I think that the message has been delivered that we are watching the situation closely. In spite of my earlier position I will support the passage of this resolution as a sign of my support for a negotiated settlement in Lebanon. I encourage the President to continue to work for a peaceful settlement in war-torn Lebanon. I also encourage the President to continue, as outlined yesterday in his letter to Congress, to work with us so that together we may develop a cohesive policy supported by the American people and aimed at resolving one of the many complexities of the Middle East.●

● Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Chairman, today we are considering one of the most important foreign policy measures that we will take up during this session of Congress. I strongly urge my colleagues to vote for House Joint Resolution 364, to provide for continued participation of U.S. forces in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon for an 18-month period. While I am unsure how long it will be necessary for our marines to remain in Lebanon, I believe we should support this resolution because the President has determined that it is in the foreign policy interest of the United States for the marines to continue their peacekeeping role.

No one is more concerned than I about the loss of American life and limb in Lebanon. Many of the Marines in that country today were stationed at the Marine base in my district, Camp Pendleton, at some point in their careers.

I am committed to seeing our troops leave Lebanon as soon as possible and return to the United States. However, we must not remove our marines from that troubled part of the world if it would reduce the likelihood of world peace. Lebanon must be given the opportunity to rebuild itself as a free and democratic nation. In addition, every oil-consuming nation understands the sensitive, strategic, and economic importance of Lebanon and its neighbors. For these reasons, we must remain an active participant in Lebanon until a lasting, peaceful settlement can be attained.

The terms of House Joint Resolution 364 are reasonable and represent a bipartisan agreement between the Executive and Congress. It deserves the strong support of the Members of the House.●

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Chairman, we are now in the debate that should have taken place at the time when U.S. forces were first committed to the quagmire in Lebanon. This is the debate that should have taken place when it became clear that what had been announced as a short-term commitment had become open ended, and when it had become equally apparent that the dangers of that commitment were growing with each passing day.

Last June, I offered a resolution calling for withdrawal of U.S. forces from Lebanon. The month before that, I wrote the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ask why the war powers resolution did not apply to Lebanon. I was told that my question was valid, that my concerns were well founded, but that the committee did not want to invoke the resolution unless there was some kind of crisis. But I felt that the only time when the Congress could reasonably consider the issues was in a time of relative calm—a time when we would not be presented with a demand for national unity in the face of danger. I was right. In the months since I raised the issue, Israel has withdrawn from its positions in and around Beirut, which set off the fighting that has cost the lives of four U.S. marines, a number of their French compatriots, and brought additional casualties to the Italian forces in Beirut. And sure enough, in the heat of the crisis, we are told that it would be wrong for Congress to insist on a withdrawal, getting out of the conflict. We are told that there must be unity and support for the President. And, so, in this crisis, the debate does not center on the real issue at all, but on the question of loyalty to the President's policy. Today we are not talking about how realistic that policy is, and we are not talking about how attainable it is. We are not talking about how possible it really is for this country to settle centuries of feuds and religious strife with a handful of marines who are pinned down to the Beirut Airport. But that is in fact the issue. That is in fact we ought to be discussing. If we had discussed this question in May or June, when I vainly tried to bring it to the consciousness of the House, that issue could have been addressed head on, and with dispassion.

Even though the conditions today are not conducive to a realistic assessment of the issue, I do not believe we can afford to lose sight of it.

Reality compels us to recognize that the conflict in Lebanon today is a civil war. The President says so, and every other observer says so as well. Any military step the marines take, even in self-defense, puts the United States on one side or another of that civil war. How can it be in our interest to take sides in such a conflict, when our role is supposed to be that of peacekeeper? But the situation is more complex than a mere civil war. It involves feuds between towns and other towns, families and other families, that go back for generations. It involves religious warfare that goes back centuries, and includes disputations between Moslems and Moslems, Christians and Christians, and each against the other. It involves the feudal, generations-old conflicts and blood feuds of warlords of one kind or another. And it is a contest for the sharing of governmental power among competing factions. But that is not all. The situation in Lebanon is complicated by the presense of Syria and Syrian forces, who enjoy the financial and military support of the Soviets. Furthermore, in the southern part of the country, Israel has established new settlements that it does not under any circumstance intend to abandon. In both the north and south of Lebanon, Syria, and Israel have consolidated their positions. The only part of Lebanon that could be said to be in government control is perhaps parts of the town of Beirut. The rest is contested territory, or held by Syria, or Lebanon, or one kind of religious faction or another, or the Palestine Liberation Organization—the remnants of which are under Syrian control. In the midst of this quagmire sit 2,000 marines, and about an equal number of Italian and French peacekeepers. Among the peacekeepers themselves, there is not even clear agreement on what to do, let alone any kind of unified command structure. These forces are merely pinned into their respective areas, hoping not to become targets of one faction or another—unable to take aggressive action against those that threaten them, unable to leave, and unable safely to stay still, and unable to rely on clearly unified governments behind them.

It may well be that the United States, of all the combatants in Lebanon, has the least idea of what it wants and how to achieve its goals.

The Gemayel government knows what it wants, and that is to survive with a continued domination of the government by its own Christian factions. The Druze know what they want, and that is not to be excluded from the government any more, and to hold sway in their traditional areas. The Shiite Moslems know what they want, and that is to increase their share of power in any coalition government, while not giving too much to the Druze who are their allies now but only for the sake of opposing Gemayel. Syria knows what it wants, and that is to dominate Lebanon. Israel knows what it wants and that is to slice off and hold onto a piece of southern Lebanon. But the United States does not know what it wants from any of these contenders, nor do we have any plan to achieve whatever it is that we want.

For example, we say that we want foreign forces to leave Lebanon, but we do not appear prepared to ask Israel to leave the areas that it has occupied and substantially fortified. We say that we want the Syrians to leave, but their condition for leaving is of course for Israel to get out, which is not about to happen. What we should ask ourselves is how the marines sitting at the Beirut Airport are going to break that impasse.

Likewise, the administration says that it wants a government of national reconciliation in Lebanon, but has intervened—or is perceived as having intervened—in behalf of the Gemayel government, which has not been interested in reconciliation at all, at least up until recently, and there is considerable question in my mind that there is any interest in reconciliation even now.

And we must ask ourselves—most importantly of all, what is our policy if the marines are attacked? What would we do in the event that, say, our ships off the shore of Lebanon were attacked by antiship missiles that we know to be in Lebanon, and well within range of those ships? We cannot slide by with the assumption—the pious hope, really, that nobody would dare attack our forces. Such a hope is self-delusion. We have to ask the hard question now, because we are responsible for the consequences later, if the continued presence of the marines leads to a wider, deeper, more tragic conflict. We have to ask ourselves, if we had a son in Beirut, would we be willing that he die for whatever cause it is we are being asked to endorse here today?

The questions are many, and the answers few. That alone is reason enough not to vote for the resolution. We would be writing a blank check to cover a blank policy, a policy that no one can define or explain, and a policy for which no one has an identifiable strategy. We would be endorsing endless risks and setting the conditions for an endless involvement in what has been an endless conflict. I am opposed to the resolution, and urge my colleagues to reject it, in the name of commonsense, and in the name of our countrymen who are today risking their lives in a cause that not one of us can explain, understand, or reasonably defend. To those who are inclined to vote for the resolution in the name of national unity, I say, the real threat to national unity would be a wider and deeper involvement. The Nation would not long support—if indeed it does today—a policy that sacrificed American lives in the civil and feudal wars of another country. To those who say that we are being given a compromise, I say that this can be no compromise—not when the resolution is nothing more nor less than a granting of war powers to the President, a Gulf of Tonkin resolution supposedly bound up in promises and limits. It is not a compromise. It is a gift of power. Our only real choice is either to stay in Lebanon, with all the risk that it implies, or to get out. Nothing I have seen or heard to date tells me that there is any reason to stay. I oppose the resolution, and say that we ought to get our troops out of the middle of this quagmire. Let me add that we should not confine our questions to Lebanon, for the President is committing the United States to military adventures elsewhere—Central American, to be specific.

We are engaged in so-called maneuvers in Honduras that amount to an occupation of that country. We are turning that area into a battleground. And for what? Do we insist on democratic government, on reform, on justice? No; our forces are there to preserve a status quo that not one of us would be willing to live under, if we were ordinary citizens of that area. The administration misled Congress when it talked about a limited commitment in Lebanon. It is misleading us today when it claims that we are on a routine, limited training exercise in Honduras, or that we see the light at the end of the Central American tunnel. It may be too late in the day to ask the questions that should have been asked about Lebanon. But certainly it is not too late to ask questions about Central America. As matters now stand, the Congress is permitting the administration to start fires, when there are not enough fire engines to go around, and when our constituents have the deepest concerns and reservations about the whole matter—and worse, when we ourselves know that the administration has misled us. We have every reason to lack confidence. We have every reason to reject this so-called compromise. I urge that the House vote this resolution down, and let us bring the marines out of the quagmire that have been in for better than 1 year, with no end in sight, and the dangers growing apace.●

● Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to House Joint Resolution 364 which permits American marines to remain in Lebanon for up to 18 months.

I do so knowing the House leadership and the President have worked hard to forge this compromise resolution, which they sincerely believe is in the best interests of this Nation. I do so even though I supported the original commitment of marine units to Lebanon in the spirit of preserving the peace. But, above all, I do so because it has become apparent that our role of peacekeeper has become impossible.

The marines came to Lebanon a year ago at the invitation of the Gemayel government with the most noble goal: Keep the various warring factions apart long enough to give negotiators time to work out a compromise.

The administration talked in terms of the marines remaining in Lebanon for just a few weeks. It has now been a year and where are we now?

The Israelis have withdrawn to a relatively safe area south of the Alawi River, leaving the American marines and their French and Italian counterparts in the middle of a rapidly deteriorating military situation.

The promise of a negotiated settlement to the Lebanese war has faded and all sides in the fighting are pessimistic it will ever happen.

The multinational peacekeeping force has been unable to keep the warring sides apart. We have failed in our mission to keep the peace because the combatants themselves want no peace.

Four American marines have paid with their lives and, I fear, more will be killed as the fighting intensifies. It is apparent the marines were not merely caught in the cross-fire between Christians and Moslems. They were themselves targets of Druze artillery.

In the last 10 days, we have systematically escalated our involvement in the Lebanese war by shelling Druze positions that are not directly threatening our troops. We have changed our policy for the third time, and our latest stance paves the way for an even deeper military involvement.

It is true that the current cease-fire is reason for hope; however, history indicates that any cease-fire in Lebanon is short-lived. In fact, over the last 10 years there have been numerous ceasefires but they average only a few weeks in duration. Unfortunately, there is little reason to believe that the current cease-fire is anything but temporary.

We went to Lebanon strictly as peacekeepers. Then, after coming under attack, we told our marines, rightfully, to fire back but only in self-defense. Now, we are actively aiding the Lebanese Army in its drive to capture high ground east of Beirut.

Each change in policy has drawn us deeper into a war that is not ours to fight. My question is: How far will our involvement go if we remain another 18 months? How many more Americans will have to die before we realize that the United States cannot make the Lebanese get along with one another?

The time is now to extract ourselves from this no-win situation and turn the peacekeeping role over to the United Nations. To remain in our trenches as targets for Druze artillery is unacceptable. To take the offensive and become a party to the civil war is foolish, not to mention dangerous. Let us apply the lesson Vietnam taught us and pull out of Lebanon now before it is too late.●

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Chairman, recently I learned that a marine from my district had been wounded while on duty in Lebanon. Let me assure my colleagues that there is nothing that brings the horror of war home more quickly than a neighbor being a victim of hostile fire. Fortunately, the marine in question was not critically wounded and his father reports that after recuperating he is expected to return to duty in Lebanon.

As eager as I am to act today to insure that the warfare in Lebanon is ended, I have serious doubts that it can be without providing the option of a continued presence of a multinational peacekeeping force. I am disturbed that the burden of this peacekeeping mission has fallen so heavily on the shoulders of U.S. Marines. But certainly there are parents of soldiers in France and Italy who are also asking, "Why must our boys be involved?"

The alternative to the peacekeeping mission is, unfortunately, unknown. It would not be particularly difficult for the countries in the U.N. peacekeeping force to abandon their roles in Lebanon and recall their troops. If so doing would allow the Lebanese to establish a working Lebanese Government without interference from their neighbors, then we should endorse such a move.

Unfortunately, the events of the recent past suggest that this will not be the case. Both the Syrians and the Israelis feel that they have important security concerns with the eventual outcome of the ongoing power struggles in Lebanon. It is not only unreasonable to assume that the withdrawal of the peacekeeping forces would allow the Lebanese to settle their internal differences on their own, it is unreasonable to assume that its neighbors would allow such a settlement without interference.

I am particularly fearful of the potential for U.S. involvement in a foreign country, in a war in which the immediate consequences for the United States are not clear. Yet I would ask my colleagues to be careful in making comparisons between the deployment of U.S. troops as part of a well defined and internationally recognized peacekeeping force and the unilateral deployment of troops at the request of a ruler in search of military support for an unpopular regime.

Mr. Chairman, I do not like having U.S. Marines in Lebanon—I wish that they could be brought home immediately. I abhor the situation which has lead to their being there—the conflict in Lebanon which has brought into question that country's very existence. I am particularly distressed at the apparent escalation of U.S. involvement in that conflict. But I am also distressed at the possible consequences of the United States withdrawing from its peacekeeping role.

The President, for obvious reasons, does not wish to limit his options for ending the hostilities in Lebanon. Yet this Congress cannot and will not allow the executive branch to continue the involvement of U.S. Marines in hostilities in Lebanon unless some reasonable constraints are in effect. I feel that the time limitation placed in this bill constitutes a reasonable constraint and one that is open for review during its duration.

I would remind my colleagues that facts do change, and they will undoubtedly change in Lebanon. Let us not wash our hands of this matter—we have an important responsibility to oversee this situation on a daily basis, and, if necessary, bring the marines home forthwith. This resolution permits, but does not require the presence of U.S. troops in Lebanon. It permits the Congress to stop funds by passage of a concurrent resolution without the President's signature. That is our counterbalance to the flexibility we are giving the President today. I believe it is a fair balance and the best of a tough situation. I urge support of this resolution.●

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 364, authorizing the continued presence of U.S. troops in Lebanon, as part of the multinational peacekeeping force (MNF). I commend the House leaders on both sides of the aisle for their effective efforts in achieving a truly bipartisan agreement on this very sensitive and very controversial issue. In resolving the controversy our House leaders have demonstrated exemplary statesmanship and deserve the highest praise for putting our Nation's best interests ahead of party politics.

For, certainly, it is in the best interests of the United States to do what it can to prevent further deterioration in the volatile Middle East situation. Indeed, it is in the best interests of world peace to resolve the many-faceted conflicts which have so disrupted normal life throughout the Middle East.

Lebanon, itself, has been embroiled in a civil war for nearly all of the past decade. Fanned by the terrorists of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and by intense religious conflicts between the Lebanese Moslems and Christians, Lebanon has been a hapless victim of its own divisions.

Israel's forthright move to clear the PLO out of Lebanon offered an opportunity to end the internal conflict through establishment of a strong central government, and withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

Unfortunately, the opportunity was not realized. The new central government has struggled in vain to gain authority. The multinational peacekeeping force was established in Lebanon in an effort to maintain the precarious balance existing while new peace moves could be explored. In the main, the MNF has achieved its purpose. The recent cease-fire has opened another opportunity to attempt to reach a satisfactory settlement.

The presence of the U.S. Marines in Lebanon is essential to achieving this goal. If we here in the House were to vote to pull out the U.S. forces, as some of my colleagues are urging, it would be a disastrous blow to hopes for peace in the Middle East. It would encourage the PLO to move back into Lebanon. It would encourage Syria to strengthen its hold on the unfortunate nation. And it would bring new threat of conflict to Israel. All of these developments would only heighten tensions throughout the Middle East, and raise serious doubts as to the assurance of the continued flow of crude oil from the Middle East to Western Europe, the United States and Japan.

There is no area of the world in which U.S. interests are more deeply involved than the Middle East. There is no area of the world in which peace could bring more positive results for our country. We must support the peacekeeping force in Lebanon, by maintaining the U.S. presence there.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues in the strongest possible terms, to join in keeping the peacekeepers in Lebanon by voting for House Joint Resolution 364. History will regard your favorable vote as a positive step toward world peace.●

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to House Joint Resolution 364, which would endorse the continued deployment of U.S. Marines in Lebanon for 18 months.

It was my recommendation last year to President Reagan that U.S. troops not be sent to Lebanon because of the very real possibility that they would become involved in the hostilities in that very volatile part of the world. And I continue to believe that the peacekeeping mission of our Marines should, instead, be handled by a U.N. multinational force.

The United Nations was formed with the expressed responsibility of insuring world peace and acting as a mediator in world conflicts. Unfortunately, throughout its existence, the United Nations has failed miserably to meet this obligation and the United States has been called in repeatedly to carry out this mission.

U.S. marines are now being killed and wounded in bunkers near Beirut. While shells are being lobbed into marine encampments, they are not keeping the peace. They are hunkering down in bunkers, once again not allowed to seek out and eliminate the threat to their safety. E. J. Dionne, Jr., a reporter for the New York Times, reported from Lebanon that our marines feel helpless. I would like to include his story in the RECORD following my remarks so that my colleagues can read about the frustration our marines feel as they are crouched helplessly in Beirut bunkers.

The resolution we are voting on today would extend the stay of the marines for another 18 months. It would give our approval to the placement of U.S. marines in the middle of a civil war halfway around the world. A continued deployment of troops would also further increase the problems associated with withdrawing them at a later date. As Bob Pittman, an editor of the St. Petersburg Times which publishes in the district I represent, said in a recent column, "The administration is dangerously close to being trapped in Lebanon."

Following my remarks, I also would like to have reprinted Mr. Pittman's column because it makes another important point about the placement of our troops in Lebanon. He writes of a conversation with Mrs. Joan Porter, a constituent of mine from Largo, Fla., whose son flies U.S. Navy supply helicopter missions to Beirut. She talks of her understanding of the need for U.S. peacekeeping troops in Lebanon, but she said "* * * the original purpose has disappeared."

Perhaps another constituent of mine from St. Petersburg, Fla., better expresses the bewilderment many Americans feel when they read about U.S. marines being killed in the midst of Lebanon's civil war. Kari Mulligan's only brother is a member of the marine company now deployed in Beirut. She wants to know, "How many more marines have to die? How many more have to be wounded?"

My answer to her is that no more marines should die or be wounded because we should defeat this resolution and bring our troops home. For the benefit of my colleagues, many of whom have relatives of the deployed marines living in their districts, I would like to include Kari's letter in the RECORD so that all may understand the fear associated with having a loved one involved fighting, for which there is little the United States has to gain.

By approving the resolution, we would also be setting in action the war powers resolution, which I opposed when it was enacted in 1973. As I said at that time, it would only serve to involve U.S. troops in attacks upon other nations or in "third party" hostilities without a specific prior authorization by Congress. While I totally support the President's powers as Commander in Chief to send troops anywhere in the world to defend our national interests or uphold our international treaty obligations, I opposed enactment of the war powers resolution, because I believed it would endanger the lives of U.S. troops in situations where the United States did not have a national interest.

As I said on November 7, 1973, when I voted to support the President's veto of the War Powers Resolution:

> The lessons of history have taught us that we cannot commit troops to a conflict and then arbitrarily withdraw them without damaging our national interest and jeopardizing the safety of the troops themselves. Once the commitment is made, the tendency is to continue on the deadly course of conflict.

It is that "deadly course of conflict" I hope our Nation can further avoid by successfully defeating this resolution and removing our troops from Lebanon.

[From the New York Times, Sept. 7, 1983]

SOME MARINES FEEL HELPLESS

(By E. J. Dionne, Jr.)

OUZAI, LEBANON, Sept. 6.—At 3:15 P.M. today, the call went out that no marine on the base here likes to hear. "Into the bunkers!" shouted a soldier to his comrades. "Condition One!"

A siren sounded to signal the danger—Condition One heralds the most serious of threats—and troops scrambled into holes in the ground covered over with metal, the walls reinforced by wood and steel and the entire shelter surrounded by sandbags.

NO SHELTER AGAINST DIRECT HIT

Bunkers provide protection against shrapnel and bullets, but not from a direct hit by a shell. And it is in just such a dank, cramped place, in the early hours before dawn that two marines lost their lives, bringing to four the number of marines killed in Lebanon in the last two weeks. Over the same period, Maj. Robert Jordan, a Marine spokesman, said, 24 have been wounded.

All four of the marines who were killed were members of Company A. As he crouched in a bunker during today's alert, Staff Sgt. Alfonzo Hernandez of Oceanside, Calif., said the deaths had cast a pall over any mission that involves visiting A Company's forward positions near Beirut International Airport.

"When somebody's going to go to Alpha Company," he said, "They always say, 'Well, I don't want to go, but I've got to go.'"

Just sitting in a bunker and taking fire is not what Marines are trained to do, and many of the 1,200 members of the peacekeeping force find their work less than fully satisfying.

WE ARE GUINEA PIGS

"You feel helpless," said Pfc. Sidney Decker of Conley, Ky. "We're guinea pigs. What are we doing here?" Then he paused, and his Marine training came into play. "They have reasons for all this stuff," he said, though he still did not sound entirely convinced.

"It's my second hostile duty," said Sergeant Hernandez. "But in Vietnam, I was allowed to shoot back."

The Marines are here as part of a peacekeeping force that also consists of Italian, French and British troops. Major Jordan said the Marines were being told that their mission is "to offset or balance the outside influence of other foreign powers"—an allusion to Israeli and Syrian troops—"and to support the Government of Lebanon and the Lebanese armed forces."

Major Jordan said the Marines were also given courses on the history of Lebanon and on the factional politics that have left this country a divided and violent place.

With such a sensitive, largely political and diplomatic mission, the restrictions on the troops are severe. Col. Timothy Geraghty described the operating procedures in case of attack as follows:

"We will try to limit the exchange to the lowest possible level, and terminate it in the shortest period possible."

That means that the Marines take a lot of fire that they do not return, and Colonel Geraghty acknowledged that the limitations can be dispiriting.

"Essentially we are an offense-oriented unit," he said, "We like to take the fight to the enemy. This mission does call for restraint. That causes frustration."

THEY RATIONALIZE IT AWAY

Perhaps the greatest frustration for the Marines comes from being unable to do as much as they would like for their comrades under attack. That made today's deaths a cause of particular anguish.

"If people knew the guy, they try not to talk about it," said Sgt. Tyrone Talbert of Willingboro, N.J. "They rationalize it away—that they could do anything about it. They keep it inside until later on."

Yet for all their frustrations and fears, the Marines' morale and mood today seems relatively high. One reason is that they have been firing back with heavy weapons and small arms fire at least some of the time when they are attacked. During today's alert, the base rumbled with a loud report from four rounds fired from 155-millimeter howitzers.

Firing back, said James Davis, an electronic technician first class from Modesto, Calif., "was definitely a morale booster."

"The Moslems got used to firing at the Lebanese Army and hitting us and nobody fired back at them," he went on. "They realize now that they can't ignore us anymore."

The Marines also seem to be enthusiasts of gallows humor as a way of keeping up morale. Visitors to the Battalion Landing Team building—and heavily bombed remnants of a hotel—are surprised to find a long quotation from a Soviet newspaper on the bulletin board.

"The appearance of Marines on foreign soil," the quotation goes, "has always in the past indicated the beginning of dangerous military adventures."

Is that true? a marine was asked. "For us, it is," he replied.

For a large share of the marines, Lebanon represents their first combat experience, and Private Decker, who turned 18 years old this week ("I had a maplenut cake for a birthday cake," he said), asserted that no amount of training could fully prepare a soldier for the real thing. "You hear shells and say 'Oh my God, this is it,'" he said. "When you're practicing, you can't get killed."

Sergeant Talbert said most of the troops had volunteered for the duty.

"You've been trained all your time in the military for duty like this and so you want to use your training," he said. "Most marines are adventurers anyway. And it could be good for your career."

"These marines," said Major Jordan, "are probably some of the smartest and best qualified we've ever had. They're very anxious to see that their losses are not in vain."

Hanging on the wall of Major Jordan's cramped, ramshackle office is a Marine recruiting poster with an "I Love Lebanon" sticker pasted beneath the words: "Make it here and you can make it anywhere."

LEBANON A DANGEROUS SPOT FOR UNITED STATES

(By Robert Pittman)

Joan Porter of Largo has a clearer understanding of what is happening in Lebanon than that being expressed by the White House. While Lebanon's ugly civil war slips in and out of the attention of most Americans, she lives with it every moment because it endangers the life of her son.

She felt better Friday afternoon after getting a telephone call through to David. "Don't worry," he told her bravely, but she can't help but worry.

David Porter is a Navy helicopter commander based in Sicily. He takes two-week tours of duty shuttling copters loaded with ammunition between the naval base on Cyprus and the U.S. Marines stationed in Lebanon. Flying a slow-moving helicopter full of explosives into bomb-and-bullet riddled Beirut is hazardous duty in the extreme.

Mrs. Porter fully understands that American soldiers sometimes are asked to risk their lives in the national interest.

"I appreciate and support the reason the Marines were sent to Lebanon," she said. "It was a peacekeeping mission. That was worthwhile. But the situation has changed now. It has deteriorated into a civil war, and the original purpose has disappeared."

The record bears out Mrs. Porter.

When Lebanon gained its independence from France in 1943, its national unity was created with a carefully balanced religious compromise. It was agreed, that, based on the census of 1932, each religious community would be fairly represented in the government and in public employment. By law the president would be a Maronite Christian, the prime minister a Sunni Muslim and the leader of the chamber of deputies a Shiite Muslim. Minor offices were similarly apportioned. The compromise held through Lebanon's years of prosperity during the 1950s, but it begn to break in the 1970s as increasing numbers of Muslims sought a larger share of authority. It was destoyed by the Palestinian buildup in Lebanon, by the Syrian invasion and finally by Israel's invasion last year to drive out the Palestinians. At that time, six armies were fighting for a piece of what had been Lebanon.

In the chaos that followed, U.S., French and Italian troops were sent into Beirut again last September. Their mission, as President Reagan explained it in a press conference Sept. 28, was to keep the peace "while the Lebanese government seeks to reunite its people . . . and bring about a united Lebanon with a Lebanese army that will then be able to preserve order in its own country."

That didn't happen. Instead, the nation disappeared. Israel's abrupt pullback to the Awali River means that Israel will protect its borders by contorlling part of Southern Lebanon, Syria's army will control part, while the Druze militia and the Christian Phalange militia fight over territory they hope to rule.

The U.S. Marines, the French and Italian soldiers no longer are peacekeepers. They are targets of the Druze and Syrians, who see them as trying to install a government of minority Christians. In the last 10 days, four Marines have been killed and 25 others wounded.

President Reagan has promised the Marines "whatever support it takes to stop the attacks on you." That sounds good, but it is not the essential point. The war around the Marines has changed, removing their initial purpose for being there.

The administration is dangerously close to being trapped in Lebanon. If it waits too long, it will appear weak if it pulls out the Marines. The alternative would be to send more troops and more firepower into a civil war where the United States has no national purpose. The fighting in Lebanon has only a remote geographical link to vital U.S. oil interests in the Middle East.

Mrs. Porter in Largo, her vision cleared by danger to own son, knows what should be done. "Our Marines have been there almost a year. They have done an admirable job. Now the whole complexion of the war has changed. It's a civil war now, and we don't have any business being involved in it."

SEPTEMBER 14, 1983.

THE HONORABLE C. W. BILL YOUNG: My brother, Patrick Mulligan, is a young marine on duty in Lebanon. I love my brother very much, and I think it is time for the marines to come home. I am very concerned for his safety.

The situation in Lebanon is deteriorating. Lebanon is on the brink of another civil war. Something should be done immediately to insure that my brother and the other marines return home soon and safely.

Is this going to be another Vietnam type war? In my opinion, we should have never gotten involved in Lebanon's troubles.

How many more marines have to die? How many more have to be wounded? My brother is the only son in our family and he is very special to all of us. Every day I pray for him. My brother has told me that he wants to come home. Do we have to sit back and watch our marines die one by one?

In my opinion, there is no peace in Lebanon to have. We and Lebanon are not going to obtain peace by sending more men and equipment to Beirut. Every day now the marines receive shelling. The marines are sitting ducks, and in the past, they have been fired at and they weren't allowed to shoot back.

Please, don't let my brother die over there or get injured! I love my brother so very much! Please, pull our marines out before more die. We don't have to be involved in the mess over there. Please I am begging you—do something so they can come home!!

Sincerely,

KARI MULLIGAN.●

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Chairman, because I support the role of the multinational forces in Lebanon in the attempt to bring peace and order to the Middle East, I find it necessary to oppose this so-called compromise resolution.

I believe that strict conformity with the war powers resolution of 1973 as it applies to the situation in Lebanon, is in the best interest of the United States. It is also in the best interest of our own reliable ally in the region, Israel. By following the provisions of the resolution, we can encourage all the parties to the conflict to focus on a political rather than a military solution.

All observers agree that the multinational force, to which our 1,600 marines belong, is absolutely incapable of accomplishing offensive military goals. The force cannot engage in combat with the 40,000 Syrian troops in Lebanon. Nor can it even hope to prevail over the Druze militia in the forbidding Shouf Mountains. More to the point, when President Ronald Reagan dispatched the marines, the clear understanding of the Congress and the American people was that they would serve in a geographically and militarily limited peacekeeping capacity. There is no indication that the President has formally altered this policy.

No one seriously disputes that the situation in Lebanon meets precisely the criteria of the War Powers Act. Four marines killed in combat, and more than 24 wounded in combat amply demonstrate that the standards of the act have been met.

Some have argued that the War Powers Act was an unsound measure passed in 1973 in irrational and even hysterical overreaction to the war in Vietnam. I am in absolute disagreement with this theory. The act responsibly and effectively clarifies the respective war powers of the President and the Congress. Under the act, the President maintains all his power as Commander in Chief. Congress gains a firm hold on its constitutional prerogative to declare war and to make appropriations necessary to the conduct of war. The neglect of these congressional powers played a major role in the tragedy of Vietnam. It is not hysteria for a nation to draw obvious inferences from a disastrous chapter.

The War Powers Resolution does not unduly restrict the President's legitimate powers. During the initial 60-day period the President has a free hand in strategic and tactical matters. He also has access to an automatic 30-day extension. All the act requires is that he come before the Congress at reasonable intervals and submit for our approval his basic policy.

Events of the past few weeks have cast America in a position not of a peacekeeping force, but of an ally blindly committed to the survival of President Amin Gemayel's regime. Though this regime is technically the Government of Lebanon, it is important to note that it has no effective control over any Lebanese territory outside the city of Beirut. Further, there are substantial areas of the capital city over which the Gemayel government has no control.

The hope of the United States and Israel 1 year ago was that Gemayel would form a broadly based government which would share powers with the key ethnic and religious groups of the country. This hope was bolstered by explicit assurances by the Gemayel government. To date, these promises have gone unfulfilled. The Government and the army of Lebanon are dominated to an overwhelming degree by Maronite Christians affiliated with the Phalange Party run by the Gemayel family.

The myriad factions in Lebanon cannot possibly coalesce unless there is a wholesale reorganization of the Government. No informed party in Israel or the United States has ever suggested that the Maronites—even assisted by Israel and the United States—can, by sheer military power, impose order and unity on the Druze, Shiite, Sunni, and the numerous other forces in Lebanon—the term "forces" is used advisedly. Most ethnic and religious groups in Lebanon maintain large, trained, well-armed militias.

The only reasonable expectation we can have of the Lebanese Government is that it create an equitable political umbrella to end the bloody strife among its own people. Lebanon cannot, at this point in time, be a vehicle for reducing Syrian power. Nor can it be a vehicle for substantially diminishing Soviet influence over the Syrians. Even its ability to restrict the movement of Palestinians is limited.

Our close ties to the Gemayel government stem from the fact that President Gemayel was willing to enter into a formal cease-fire agreement with Israel. He won our support as a leader anxious to end the Arab-Israeli conflict. Naturally, our positive attitude toward him reflected the attitude of the Government of Israel. It is imperative that we note important changes that have occurred and are occurring right now between Israel and the various forces in Lebanon.

There is currently an open and bitter dispute between Israel's former Defense Minister, Ariel Sharon, and the current Defense Minister, Moshe Arens—both men are considered likely future candidates for Prime Minister.

Arens, who gave up the post of Ambassador to the United States to become Defense Minister, has accused Sharon of destabilizing the situation in Lebanon by giving too much Israeli support to Gemayel. It is Arens belief that the excellent relationship between Druze citizens of Israel and the Israeli Government provide the basis for Israeli-Druze cooperation in Lebanon.

Mr. Chairman, esteemed colleagues, I urge you to note the fiasco which may well be in the making. President Reagan is increasing our support for Gemayel—to help our ally Israel.

At the same time, Israeli Defense Minister Arens, and the new Prime Minister of Israel—probably Itzhak Shamir—may be decreasing Israel's support for Gemayel in a search for rapprochement with Walid Jumblatt's Druzes. I ask, is this a situation in which American troops should play any role beyond that of limited peacekeeping?

I personally support the role of the multinational forces in Lebanon. I do not believe our role should be expanded unless two conditions are met: the President wins congressional approval for a larger role, and the British, French, and Italians concur. In fact, should a larger force be required, it seems to me there are a number of other countries whose cooperation could be reasonably sought.

I further believe that President Ronald Reagan could win congressional approval for a clearly defined American military undertaking in Lebanon.

The failure of Congress to cope with the situation in Lebanon under the 1973 war powers resolution is an insult to the Constitution.

If we are unwilling or afraid to abide by the Constitution and to give the President a fair hearing and debate of his policies we are in fact saying that there is something so irrational or sinister about these policies that they cannot survive the scrutiny of open discussion.

I believe the Constitution and the 1973 statute clearly gives us responsibility for the conflict in Lebanon. Are we afraid to accept the ultimate burden of playing our proper role in reaching the ultimate decisions of war and peace?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. All time has expired.

Pursuant to House Resolution 318, the joint resolution is considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. No amendments are in order except the following amendments, which shall not be subject to amendment: First, the amendment recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs now printed in the resolution; second, the amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 27, 1983, by Representative OBEY, if offered by Representative OBEY or Representative LONG of Maryland, which shall be debatable for not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the proponent of the amendment and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs or his designee; and third, an amendment or amendments, which shall be considered en bloc, if offered by Representative ZABLOCKI, which shall be debatable for not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative ZABLOCKI and a Member opposed thereto.

The text of the joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 364, is as follows:

H.J. RES. 364

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This joint resolution may be cited as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East;

(2) in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory, the United States is currently participating in the multinational peacekeeping force (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon") which was established in accordance with the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982;

(3) the Multinational Force in Lebanon better enables the Government of Lebanon to establish its unity, independence, and territorial integrity;

(4) progress toward national political reconciliation in Lebanon is necessary; and

(5) United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon are now in hostilities requiring authorization of their continued presence under the War Powers Resolution.

(b) The Congress determines that the requirements of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution became operative on August 29, 1983. Consistent with section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, the purpose of this joint resolution is to authorize the continued participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

(c) The Congress intends this joint resolution to constitute the necessary specific statutory authorization under the War Powers Resolution for continued participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CONTINUED PARTICIPATION OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 3. The President is authorized, for purposes of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, to continue participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon, subject to the provisions of section 6 of this joint resolution. Such participation shall be limited to performance of the functions, and shall be subject to the limitations, specified in the agreement establishing the Multinational Force in Lebanon as set forth in the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982, except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to ensure the safety of the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS

SEC. 4. As required by section 4(c) of the War Powers Resolution, the President shall report periodically to the Congress with respect to the situation in Lebanon, but in no event shall he report less often than once every six months. In addition to providing the information required by that section on the status, scope, and duration of hostilities involving United States Armed Forces, such reports shall describe in detail—

(1) the activities being performed by the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(2) the present composition of the Multinational Force in Lebanon, including a description of the responsibilities and deployment of the armed forces of each participating country;

(3) the results of efforts to reduce and eventually eliminate the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(4) how continued United States participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is advancing United States foreign policy interests in the Middle East; and

(5) what progress has occurred toward national political reconciliation among all Lebanese groups.

STATEMENTS OF POLICY

SEC. 5. (a) The Congress declares that the participation of the armed forces of other countries in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is essential to maintain the international character of the peacekeeping function in Lebanon.

(b) The Congress believes that it should continue to be the policy of the United States to promote continuing discussions with Israel, Syria, and Lebanon with the objective of bringing about the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon and establishing an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area.

(c) It is the sense of the Congress that, not later than one year after the date of enactment of this joint resolution and at least once a year thereafter, the United States should discuss with the other members of the Security Council of the United Nations the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping force to assume the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon. An analysis of the implications of the response to such discussions for the continuation of the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be included in the reports required under paragraph (3) of section 4 of this resolution.

DURATION OF AUTHORIZATION FOR UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 6. The participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be authorized for purposes of the War Powers Resolution until the end of the eighteen-month period beginning on the date of enactment of this resolution unless the Congress extends such authorization, except that such authorization shall terminate sooner upon the occurrence of any one of the following:

(1) the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, unless the President determines and certifies to the Congress that continued United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is required after such withdrawal in order to accomplish the purposes specified in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters providing for the establishment of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(2) the assumption by the United Nations or the Government of Lebanon of the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(3) the implementation of other effective security arrangements in the area.

INTERPRETATION OF THIS RESOLUTION

SEC. 7. (a) Nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the President from withdrawing United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon if circumstances warrant, and nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the Congress by joint resolution from directing such a withdrawal.

(b) Nothing in this joint resolution modifies, limits, or supersedes any provision of the War Powers Resolution or the requirement of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, relating to congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon.

The CHAIRMAN. Three hundred ninety-six Members have answered to their names, a quorum is present, and the Committee will resume its business.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JACOBS).

PREFERENTIAL MOTION OFFERED BY MR. JACOBS

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JACOBS moves that the Committee do now rise and report the joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 364, back to the House with the recommendation that the resolving clause be stricken.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the question that every thoughtful American has on his or her lips at this hour. When did the 300-year-old religious war in Lebanon become important enough to the U.S. Government and the security of this country for the Congress to be willing to endorse a policy that sacrifices the lives of young Americans there?

I did not hear about the importance of that religious war in this administration's inaugural address. I heard nothing of the importance of that war to us a year ago or 2 years ago.

Needless to say, the Russians were already supplying equipment to the Syrians at those times, and needless to say, as history shows, the Syrians were already in the Lebanese religious war at those times.

Why then, the American people would like to know, has this religious war suddenly become vital to American interests?

I know what people across this country are thinking at this moment. They are thinking, many of them, what must have been thought in the early days of the Vietnam disaster. "Well, the President must know something that I don't know. The Members of Congress, the smart people in Washington must know something that I don't know."

My message to everybody in this country is that that is not true. The so-called best and the brightest are not necessarily knowledgeable about everything.

Take the case of the carpet salesman who came into a home, took a sack of dirt, dumped it upside down on the front room carpet and said, "Lady, if this vacuum cleaner doesn't pick up every bit of that dirt, I'll eat it."

And she said, "Well, you better get yourself a spoon, because we got no electricity."

It is possible for the mighty Government of the United States to overlook something. This administration and its calculations about the behavior of the Syrians in Lebanon from the start has been mistaken and all of the administration's lofty predictions have been falsified by events, as history has shown. The administration thought the Syrians would agree to withdraw with other foreign forces. That was a four times fatal miscalculation.

This resolution is nothing more than an endorsement of a blunder, a blunder not unlike the blunder made by the previous administration that brought about the Iranian hostage crisis.

The President has already repudiated this resolution and says it means nothing to him.

President Andrew Jackson, at the time of the Indian cases in Florida when the Supreme Court made an adverse decision, made the ringing quotation: "Marshall has made his decision. Now let him enforce it." That is the posture of the present administration with regard to any part of this resolution except for the part that endorses the blunder.

□ 1410

I hear people say that the important thing is to keep the "process" alive. I say the important thing is to keep these young men alive, the ones who have not been killed yet, and not to cover up this blunder with the graves of these young, laughing, breathing, happy marines. To die for something is noble. To die for nothing is ignoble. And in this case, the nothing is extra time desired by the administration to find a political figleaf to cover withdrawal. Pride goeth before the unnecessary fall of many more marines.

Buying this resolution is like buying cancer for cash.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion.

Mr. Chairman, our greatest concern is that the war powers resolution, which was enacted in 1973 become operative. We struggled for weeks, in many meetings, in order to avoid a confrontation.

We all want the marines out of Lebanon. We all are deeply concerned about the loss, the casualties of our military men anywhere.

I submit if we adopt this motion we cut off all further consideration of this legislation. This legislation has been, I must again say very carefully structured. We have the bipartisan support of the House leadership and the President. If this resolution goes down the drain, we are endangering our marines in Lebanon, undermining our foreign policy in the Middle East. This resolution does not deal with only Lebanon or specifically Beirut. All of the Middle East and our interests in the gulf are involved.

The gentleman from Indiana has made a proposal that I believe is very irresponsible. And I hope that it is soundly and roundly defeated.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I want to thank my friend, the chairman, for yielding.

I would just like to state that I think the distinguished gentleman from Indiana has mischaracterized the struggle in Lebanon as a 300-year-old religious war. Indeed, centuries of religious strife has tainted the relationships between the various tribes and factions of Moslems and the Israelis over there. But the struggle is not a religious war primarily. The struggle is a struggle for the assets and the priceless resources of the Middle East. Petroleum is not more important than people, but petroleum runs the farm equipment which helps grow the food for the people of Western Europe and of Japan and many areas in the world. And that petroleum must be available so people can be kept warm and can be fed. And it is the struggle for that petroleum by the Soviet Union through its surrogate, Syria, and other troublemaking elements over there, that is at the bottom of this terrible conflict.

And, so, we hope and pray to stabilize that area and to being peace. Egypt, and who would have believed it, has made peace with Israel. That peace can be widened. But we cannot turn our back and walk away and expect to have a single ally left in the world. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time.

The question here is are we going to encourage the negotiations that are taking place, in Lebanon, or are we going to pull the plug from those efforts. If we withdraw, we will find Lebanon in a very serious situation which would give Syria an invitation to come into that area and cause more bloodshed. We would probably have the responsibility for the bloodshed of our Marines if the war was broadened.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JACOBS. The gentleman from Illinois' reference to petroleum in the Middle East reminds me of when I was in college and troops were sent into Lebanon at that time. I wrote a couplet:

"Though we now send your boys to foreign soil, we will not spill a drop of American oil."

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I urge a "no" vote on the motion.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the preferential motion offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JACOBS).

The preferential motion was rejected.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. LONG OF MARYLAND

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. LONG of Maryland: strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This joint resolution may be cited as the "United States Armed Forces in Lebanon Resolution".

REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS

SEC. 2. (a) After the end of the 90-day period beginning on August 29, 1983, no funds appropriated by the Congress may be obligated or expended for peacekeeping activities in Lebanon by United States Armed Forces unless, before the end of that 90-day period, either—

(1) the President has submitted to the Congress the report required by section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution; or

(2) the President has certified to the Congress that a ceasefire is in effect in Lebanon and is being observed by all parties and that significant progress is being made in negotiations to broaden the base of the Lebanese Government and achieve a political resolution of existing differences.

(b) If the President makes a certification under subsection (a)(2), he shall, at the end of each 30-day period thereafter, submit a report to the Congress pursuant to section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution unless at the end of such 30-day period he makes the certification described in subsection (a)(2). If the President does not submit either the report or the certification required by this subsection at the end of any such 30-day period, then the report required by section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution shall be deemed to have been submitted for purposes of section 5(d) of the War Powers Resolution as of the end of such period.

INTERPRETATION OF THIS RESOLUTION

SEC. 3. (a) Nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the President from withdrawing United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon if circumstances warrant, and nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the Congress by joint resolution from directing such a withdrawal.

(b) Nothing in this joint resolution modifies, limits, or supersedes any provision of the War Powers Resolution or the requirement of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, which relates to congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) will be recognized for 1 hour, and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG).

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the House, the Long-Obey amendment has two broad features. First, it uses the power of the purse to force the President to invoke the War Powers Act.

□ 1420

That, in itself, has no limits on its constitutionality. That feature of the amendment which uses the power of the purse to force the President to invoke the War Powers Act passed the full Appropriations Committee, by a strong vote of 20 to 16.

Basically it cuts off funds unless the President does invoke that War Powers Act.

After that passed, it was scrubbed by the Speaker and by the chairman of the full committee. Since that time we have had the cease-fire. That created a new problem.

The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) has brought up language and added language to this amendment which I think is very ingenious. What it does is to insist, insist that the President every 30 days either invoke the War Powers Act or report to Congress on the progress of the cease-fire. That is very important.

That puts the President on a very short leash intentionally. Just think, 30 days. Is that too short a time?

In the last 10 years, according to a Christian Phalange newspaper just published yesterday, there have been 179 cease-fires in Lebanon. The administration admits it is fragile. It does not admit it is that fragile, but that is pretty fragile. That means an average of 1½ cease-fires a month for the last 10 years.

Now, obviously we need something.

They will tell you that 30 days is too short a time; that forces the President to come back too often.

Just think what has happened in the last 30 days. This amendment begins on August 29 when the first marine was killed. Since that time we have had 40 casualties including 5 marines killed. We have had the marshalling of one of the greatest naval forces in the history of this country in the Mediterranean, off the shores of Lebanon. We have had another several thousand marines stationed there. We have had Air Force pounding and shooting up in Lebanon in support of our forces, as I think they quite properly should if they are fired on.

In addition to that, of course, we had a cease-fire just a couple of days ago, all in 1 month. Is it too much to ask the President to keep us posted on what he considers to be the situation in Lebanon?

What we have here, of course, the argument is that this is an admission by the President that the War Powers Act qualifies. As a matter of fact, the President has insisted that the War Powers Act is not going to be observed.

The argument is "Well, he signed it, didn't he?" But let me tell you, General McArthur signed the Japanese surrender; did he not? We were glad. We are always glad to get a total and unconditional surrender from the enemy. The President was glad to get that surrender, glad to sign it, but it does not mean a thing.

In fact, he said, the Secretary of State has said repeatedly, "We will not be bound by this time, by the time limit, or by the escalation."

That, of course, made it an absolute surrender.

Now, since that time they have conditioned it. They have conditioned it by saying they will come to Congress if there is a substantial escalation of the forces in the war.

But what is a substantial escalation? Is it 500 marines, 1,200 marines, 2,000 more marines? There is nothing in here to indicate what a substantial escalation would be.

Or does that include the naval and Air Forces and so on that are brought in?

So we are not told what a substantial escalation would be that he would have to come to the Congress for authorization.

Second, he said that if the war goes beyond 18 months he would work with Congress and meet with the leaders before taking action on a mutually acceptable basis. Does this ask for a war declaration? Will he agree to withdraw the forces if he does not get a war declaration at the end of that time?

I do not see anything, any admission in here that the President is willing to use the War Powers Act. So I think the War Powers Act is a surrender here. It is being surrendered by the gentleman, incidentally, who took the lead in passing it, and we are turning language upside down.

George Orwell ought to be turning over in his grave. He said, he wrote years ago in "1984" that totalitarians would take language and turn it upside down, "war is peace," "peace is war," and all of that kind of thing.

Here we call it a peacekeeping operation which is basically a military operation. We started out to take the side of one side in a war and now we call it peacekeeping operation in that area, in an area, Mr. Chairman, where there has never been from the very beginning any peace to keep.

I urge you to vote for this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) for 1 hour.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield so that I may ask him a question?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Is it your intention to yield half of the time to our side in opposition to this amendment?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I would like to ask you one further question before you make your comments.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. It is also my understanding, if I may say to the gentleman, that the proponents of the amendment will also yield time to Members on the other side of the aisle who support the amendment.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. That is correct.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could address one question to you. There has been a change in the procedure here. It was my understanding that you were going to offer an amendment that would reduce the reporting time from 6 months down to 60 days, and also provide for the amendment by the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR) which would say in effect that the Congress is opposed to any partition of Lebanon and the annexation of its territory by any foreign country.

The question I would like to ask the chairman of our committee is if the Obey amendment is defeated, is it your intention then to follow with the other amendment which would reduce the reporting from 6 months down to 60 days?

And also include the question on the partition of Lebanon?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. The intention of the gentleman from Wisconsin is to call up just such as amendment for consideration.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I thank the chairman.

Mr. OBEY. Would the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. OBEY. I really do not want to get into an argument with my good friend and my dean. But I want to make certain that I heard what I think I just heard.

The gentleman from Michigan, I believe, and if I am wrong please correct me, the gentleman from Michigan, I believe, asked the chairman whether he intended to offer an amendment to the committee proposition which would relate to the Oakar language on separation or the division of Lebanon, and also which relate to the reporting cycle.

I think the gentleman responded in the affirmative, that that was the amemdment the gentleman intended to offer. Is that correct?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. That is correct. Of course, within that amendment there will be some further reporting requirements that would be requested every 60 days.

Mr. OBEY. If the gentleman will yield further, that is my problem, because, as the gentleman knows, those of us who are opposed to this resolution, were unhappy with the rule that was brought out because it gave the committee the theoretical option to offer almost any amendment they wanted, under which we would not be in a position to offer any amendments to our own alternative. This morning, during debate on the rule, I asked the gentleman what his intention was. I said as follows: "I want to say, however, that I have been given the assurance by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) who is the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, that he does not intend to offer amendments which would change in any major way the content of the committee product that they are contemplating, probably only one amendment which would change the reporting cycle," not the reporting language, but the reporting cycle, "and another amendment which might have to do with the possible partitioning of Lebanon, and that he does not expect to see any other amendments offered.

"If that is the understanding," I went on to say, "then I have no problem 'with the rule' because the theoretical possibility for sandbagging would appear not to be real. We would appear to be in the position where those theoretical possibilities would not be exercised by the committee."

Then the chairman responded by saying: "The gentleman from Wisconsin has stated the intentions of the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee correctly."

□ 1430

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, could I get some time from the gentleman since he is consuming all of my time?

Mr. OBEY. It is the gentleman's time.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I was going to argue against the gentleman's amendment. I am not prepared to debate with you as to what you understood me to say or what I actually said. I honestly responded to the gentleman's question. I certainly do not interpret adding certain requirements in the report as very substantive changes in the policy contained and the positions that I spelled out in the resolution. And I do not yield any further to the gentleman. I would be very happy to respond privately to any further questions.

I think I honestly responded to his question. I presume that he would have had in mind whether the gentleman from Wisconsin intended to change the 18-month authorization, or any amendment of that sort. And I honestly responded there would be no such major substantive changes. The amendment that I intend to offer is not a major substantive amendment.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Yes; I yield.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. OBEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Is the gentleman saying that he intends to offer the amendment which he just showed to us, but that there will not be an amendment offered which would change the 18-month authority period to 9 months? Because under the rule, as the gentleman knows, only the chairman or his designee could offer any amendment.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. It was not my intention but since the gentleman raised the question and questioned my integrity, I wonder whether I should not withhold that commitment and not give him a definitive answer right now.

Mr. OBEY. Well, I will leave that up to the gentleman.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. But the gentleman does confirm what I am sure he understood and was seeking from the gentleman from Wisconsin as an answer to his question, which was honest at the time, and I stand by it.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment that is before us is almost as bad as the motion deleting everything after the enacting clause that we have just defeated. This substitute would really gut the resolution that is before us. This substitute is clearly unworkable and highly detrimental to U.S. foreign policy.

The substitute would force a series of confrontations between the President and the Congress. We could be arguing with the President virtually every month as to whether a cease fire was in effect or whether a report under section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution was operative.

Do the Members of this body want to confront this issue every 30 days? This substitute would inevitably lead to a spasmodic "fits and starts" foreign policy that would seriously undermine our strategy in Lebanon. The substitute also would insure partisan wrangling and election-year politicization to the detriment of the U.S. foreign policy.

By contract, an 18-month extension would carry the authorization past the 1984 elections.

Mr. Chairman, House Joint Resolution 364 is based on hard, unavoidable foreign policy and political realities. It is not an open-ended authorization nor does it mean the U.S. Marines stay in Lebanon for 18 months regardless of the circumstances.

In fact, the resolution provides for termination of the marines' presence sooner under a number of different conditions and situations.

By contrast, the substitute effectively cripples Congress ability to exercise its rightful role in defining the scope and direction of the U.S. policy in Lebanon because it will lead to a Presidential veto and a continuation of the current constitutional impasse. It will effectively bury this legislation; it would effectively pull the rug out from under the war powers resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I urge its defeat.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD)?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I so yield.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD).

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, have the proponents of the substitute amendment yielded any time to the other side of the aisle?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, we will be yielding time on an individual basis, not on a bloc basis.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD).

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I want to join the chairman of our committee and say that this is probably the most important amendment we will be voting on in this matter. This amendment that is being offered would certainly undo the very careful and painstaking compromise worked out between the administration and the bipartisan leadership of the House, which the President has said he will sign.

I can almost assure you that if there is any major change in substance, that the President would veto it.

Mr. Chairman, first, the amendment would postpone the invocation of the war powers resolution by the Congress for at least 3 months. Then, it would establish a situation of potentially short-term, recurrent confrontation between the President and Congress, beginning at the end of November, when the President must recertify the existence of a cease-fire every 30 days or invoke the war powers resolution.

If the substitute is adopted, it will undercut the bipartisan legislative and executive commitment to crucial U.S. foreign policy objectives in Lebanon which the compromise embodied in House Joint Resolution 364 represents. It is fair to say that the negotiation of this compromise and its approval by a wide bipartisan majority in the Foreign Affairs Committee contributed significantly to convincing Syrian-supported elements in Lebanon to agree to the recently established cease-fire. Adoption of the substitute might very well encourage Syrian and Soviet-backed, armed factions to seriously break that cease-fire before the end of November.

Even if the marines are subsequently authorized to continue to participate in the Multinational Force (MNF), at a minimum, diplomats will have to start again back at square one trying to reinstitute a cease-fire. If the marines are forced to withdraw after the end of November under the substitute, which might well occur, it will seriously destabilize the situation in Lebanon, possibly destroy the MNF, and reward Syrian recalcitrance. If indeed Lebanon's Government should fall, this would amount to a strategic notch in Moscow's belt. Such a result will have grave implications for the security of Israel, our primary ally in the region and a democracy. Ultimately, it may lead to the permanent partition of Lebanon with increased influence in the area for Syria, the U.S.S.R., and Syrian-supported radical PLO elements.

Further, such results as appear likely to flow from adoption of the substitute will demoralize our allies, especially France, Italy, and the United Kingdom, and will severely damage our credibility with concerned moderate Arab States such as Saudi Arabia and Egypt. In short, the substitute could work directly against the objectives we all share and I urge my colleagues to oppose the substitute.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, just about a year ago American troops were first sent to Lebanon and their mission then was to fly the flag, to show their moral authority, to keep the lid on the situation by keeping the parties separated and to help prevent further massacres.

□ 1440

We all understood the necessity for that, although we had some misgivings about the clarity with which the Marines' mission was defined at that time and said so.

The mission has changed since then. It has now become, by the administration's own admission, an effort to support the creation of a strong central government in Lebanon. And over the last few months we have, for all practical purposes, been fighting on the Government's side against other Lebanese, as well as against other outside parties.

The inventory of the wide variety of competing forces in Lebanon, both internal and external, has already been mentioned today. We have now had 5 Americans killed and 38 wounded, I believe that is the number.

The law provides that as of August 29 the President had 48 hours to report to Congress that, in the words of the War Powers Act,

> U.S. forces were in hostilities or were in situations where imminent involvement in hostilities was clearly indicated by the circumstances.

And the House, as I indicated earlier, is now confronted with two problems. No. 1 is how to promote and protect the integrity of the existing law under which we are operating, the War Powers Act. While that is important, as I indicated, it is not enough for Congress simply to vindicate a procedural prerogative. There is a second, more important issue. That issue is what should our policy in Lebanon be.

The answer of the Foreign Affairs Committee is that Congress should authorize the presence in Lebanon and the involvement in Lebanon for the next 18 months, of American military forces.

Those of us who are offering this amendment believe that to be a profound mistake. We want Congress to withhold a commitment of that kind for the time being—underlining the words "for the time being"—and we are offering a substitute which does two things.

It says that the President must report as the law requires. It says the President must report under the War Powers Act that our forces are or have been engaged in military situations. The only difference is that we give him an extra 90 days to make that report and we also give him another option.

We say, "Mr. President, if you do not want to do that, then you do not have to if you can report to the House at that time that we are in a cease-fire situation which is holding and that decent and major progress is being made at the negotiating table in order to broaden the base of the Gemayel government, without which none of our involvement can succeed, and to help assure that the divisions between the parties are being settled on a political basis."

If the President certifies as to that, then he must report under the terms of this amemdment every 30 days to the Congress. He must either report under the War Powers Act, if we are in situations of armed conflict and warfare, or he must report that we are in a cease-fire situation, if, in fact, that is the situation in which we find ourselves at the time.

This amendment, despite what has been said a number of times today, does not cut and run. This amendment does not withdraw troops. This amendment does not set short deadlines for troop presence in Lebanon because many of us believe that it would be a mistake to set an extremely short deadline because the Syrians could then simply wait out the U.S. resolve in that area.

So what we are saying instead is that under this proposal we create equal pressure on the Syrians to negotiate and on the Gemayel government to make the concessions that will be necessary to save itself.

This, we believe, is a compromise between an 18-month here-and-now, forever-more commitment and an immediate invoking of the War Powers Act.

It does recognize that we need most of all to have a political resolution to the problem. It does protect congressional prerogatives under the War Powers Act. And it does so by buttressing those powers with another constitutional power of the Congress; namely, the constitutional power of the purse, the most vital of all powers of this body.

We use that power not to force withdrawl at this time, but to enforce the law, to enforce the law as it exists today, and in fact we ease that law in two circumstances.

It gives the President more time to work out the problems before Congress must make a decision.

I just want to make one more point. I had the unpleasant duty to go to Minong, Wis., about 3 weeks ago to visit the father and the mother of one of the marines who was just killed in Lebanon, a marine by the name of L.Cpl. Randy Clark. And his father told me, he said, "Mr. Congressman, I appreciated the President's call after we lost Randy. But," he said, "I was bothered by that call because," he said, "the President kept saying, 'I want, I want, I want.'" He said, "I understand the jam he is in but I want to tell you something, if you fellows look at that situation hard and if you tell us that you have decided that it is necessary for us to stay involved, then I might be persuaded."

But I submit to my colleagues that if our answer to him is to give the administration 18 months carte blanche to do whatever needs to be done during that time, within the limitations laid out by the resolution, we will not have exercised our prerogatives, we will not have exercised our responsibility, we will not have defended the law, and we will have committed us to 18 months of possible chaos. I do not think the Members want to do that. There is no need to do that at this time.

And I ask my colleagues to recognize again that this proposal simply withholds for the moment the kind of long-term commitment that we are being asked to make by the Foreign Affairs Committee today.

I would urge the Members to give it serious consideration.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I wonder how his amendment changes the constitutional power of the Congress which the gentleman from Wisconsin has correctly suggested is the power of the purse. I submit the greatest single constitutional power on the face of this Earth in a democracy is the power to withhold funds. Congress still has that power and the gentlemans' amendment does not alter or enhance our power of the purse.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. NATCHER). The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. OBEY. The answer is it does not change that power, it uses it to enforce the law.

Mr. KEMP. Does it change it? We still have it. Do we have it or not?

Mr. OBEY. That is correct. We have it, but if we want to enforce the law we must use it or we will lose not only our power to influence the Lebanon situation, we could lose, for all practical purposes, our power to save the War Powers Act.

Mr. KEMP. But we can use it any time we deem necessary, that is my point.

Mr. OBEY. That is correct.

Mr. KEMP. It does not change it one whit to have the Long-Obey amendment set up a procedural contest between the Congress and the President. We have the power of the purse. To accept this amendment undercuts our efforts to negotiate a settlement in the interest of an independent Lebanon.

Mr. OBEY. Except it states now that those funds would be cut off unless the President complies with the law. And if you believe in the War Powers Act, you ought to believe in compliance with the law or else admit now you are just trying to find a way to finesse it.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Tennessee (Mrs. LLOYD).

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. LLOYD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to House Joint Resolution 364, and in support of the amendment offered by Mr. LONG and Mr. OBEY.

The situation in Lebanon is a complex one. The country, wracked by years of strife due to internal disorder and its central location as a staging ground for fighting between other powers in the Middle East, has been ravaged both economically and politically. Today it remains in a precarious state because of recent fighting among its several religious and political factions, its continued occupation by foreign forces, and its unwanted role as a buffer zone for opposing countries in the region.

However, if the situation remains a complex one, I believe that one thing is clear: No satisfactory resolution of Lebanon's internal problems can be reached unless the current Lebanese Government allows all those religious and political factions within the country a legitimate voice in determining that country's future.

In my opinion, there are two issues central to the debate surrounding this resolution. First, we must assure the safety of the U.S. Marines stationed in Lebanon as part of the multinational peacekeeping force. Second, we must make it clear to the Gemayel government that our role in promoting peace is contingent upon its making real progress in allowing the participation of all factions in Lebanon's political process.

It is in these two critical respects, I believe, that House Joint Resolution 364 falls alarmingly short. The resolution authorizes the commitment of U.S. troops for 18 months from the date of the measure's enactment. Thus, the resolution, if approved in its current form, would signal President Gemayel of a lengthy, open-ended U.S. commitment to the region. Once assured of U.S. involvement, I am fearful that President Gemayel would be less concerned about opposition from Syrian-backed factions in the country, and thus would feel less compelled to bring these factions into Lebanon's political dialog.

In addition, I believe that the resolution fails to provide the oversight and accountability that is necessary to assure that U.S. forces receive adequate protection and that their role is properly defined.

Despite the fact that four U.S. marines have been killed and several wounded as a result of our role in the multinational peacekeeping force, this administration has only recently, and very grudgingly acknowledged that U.S. forces are involved in hostilities or likely hostilities as required under the War Powers Act. Consequently, I am opposed to granting the same administration a nearly free hand in determining the future course of our role in Lebanon, as provided in the resolution.

The amendment offered by Mr. LONG and Mr. OBEY would properly assure that the Congress has a role in shaping our policy toward Lebanon, and that that policy remains flexible. The amendment would require the President to invoke the war powers resolution by the end of November or at the end of any month thereafter, unless he certifies to the Congress that a cease-fire is in effect and is being observed by all parties, and that significant progress is being made in negotiations to broaden the base of the Lebanese Government and to achieve a political resolution of existing differences.

Thus, the Long/Obey amendment would assure that continued United States involvement in Lebanon would be subjected to continued oversight and a regular accounting, and the Gemayel government would be put on notice that its failure to negotiate in a serious and timely way a broad-based resolution of its country's civil disorder will invite the withdrawal of U.S. troops.

I respectfully urge the adoption of the Long/Obey amendment.

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Obey substitute. My decision to do so was not made in haste. This decision is one that has required many, many hours of consideration of the facts and some deep soul searching.

I wish with all my heart that we would never have to place our troops in this area, in the far reaches of this Earth. I remember as a teenager, the sorrow of my family when my brother's B-17 was shot down over enemy territory. He was in a prison camp for 20 months. And now I realize full that I have a 19-year-old son, who could also be involved in this present conflict.

But I also know that the freedoms we enjoy in this great Nation have never been free, and they are never going to be free, and that we have made a commitment to our allies that we would offer them support and back them up in their struggle.

I think they have a right to remain free, and I am convinced that the multinational peacekeeping force is the main tool to resolve the Lebanon crisis. I think that without it, it is very obvious that the Syrians are going to continue their shelling and the Soviets will continue to back the Syrians in their effort to destabilize Lebanon.

I think this will further isolate Israel and also deprive the United States of a valued ally in Lebanon. If our forces are pulled out at this time, we will have shown to the world that we cannot be relied upon to fulfill our commitments. One moment we are saying to our allies that, "We are going to help you," and the next moment we are saying, "Well, we have changed our mind and, therefore, we are going to leave you on your own."

If we let this happen in Lebanon, I am very sure that our adversaries will use it as a great propaganda speech to say that the United States cannot be trusted. We are in Lebanon now at the request of that Government. We have made a commitment to peace, to a moderate pro-American government and an ally.

I feel this commitment must be honored. I do feel, though, that we should not debate the importance of 18 months but rather that we must emphasize that the job must get done and to bring our forces home as soon as possible, be it 1 month or 18 months, and we must do so with honor.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MCCOLLUM).

Mr. MCCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strongly oppose the substitute amendment. If it were to be adopted, it would play into the hands of the Syrians and totally undermine our President's efforts in Lebanon to achieve our goals—and we do have some goals over there.

Mr. Chairman, we are really debating two issues today. One is whether or not our marines should be immediately withdrawn from the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon, and the other is if we are not to immediately withdraw, should Congress pass a resolution supporting the President's keeping our forces in Lebanon for up to 18 months, or for some shorter duration, and under stricter conditions than this resolution proposes.

Whether or not one believes we did the right thing in involving our marines in a multinational peacekeeping force with the Italians, French, and British in Beirut months ago, the question of whether the Congress should support the continued presence of these troops for several months to come as the President has requested must be decided by examining the probable consequences of withdrawing them under present conditions, and the realistic risks involved in keeping them and the chances of success in achieving the intended goals.

The whole reason for our involvement in the Middle East is to prevent the Soviet Union from dominating the entire region which would result in the loss to the Soviets of a very critical strategic region of the world and the closing down of the Persian Gulf oil supply to the United States and our allies. Short of direct United States troop involvement, the only real buffer we have to prevent this Soviet domination is Israel. We can debate all we want whether we agree with some of the things the Government of Israel does from time to time, but there should be no debate over the fact that Isreal is a critical and true ally of the United States, whose continued existence, strength, and vitality are essential to our national security.

Last year, the Israelis drove the PLO out of Beirut and occupied that portion of Lebanon from Beirut south to Israel. The Palestinian forces became factionalized, but they remained in that portion of Lebanon occupied and controlled by Syria. The United States tried to negotiate a peaceful settlement of the Lebanese question and in the process get both Syria and Israel to withdraw and allow a Lebanese Government to function again. To this end, we joined with the Italians, French, and British in forming a multinational peacekeeping force to occupy Beirut and the Israelis began a withdrawal to the south, which was demanded by Syria before they would agree to withdraw. The problem is that the Syrians have not withdrawn. Instead, they supported a civil war begun by the Druze, one of the tribal factions in Lebanon.

The Syrians and Soviets sensed an opportune time to destroy American public support for the presence of the peacekeeping force and take advantage of the Israeli Government change to seize Beirut and put the PLO back in business. If we were to withdraw now, this is exactly what would happen. In time, the Israeli forces might go in and retake the region, but damage to the United States by loss of confidence in it by its allies and from the signal of weakness that this gives to the Soviets who would then be encouraged to press forward that much harder is tremendous.

There are risks in leaving the marines in Lebanon, but it appears to me that the chances of succeeding in our immediate goals as evidenced by the recent cease-fire are fairly good and the odds against a complete collapse of the Lebanese forces or a decision on the part of the Syrians and Soviets to move directly against our marines are great. The administration adamantly assures Congress that it has no intention of sending more troops to Lebanon and should conditions deteriorate to the point that we could not continue a presence in Beirut without substantial loss of American lives we would withdraw—that is the worst case unlikely scenario, but therein lies the risk.

The current American objective is to keep a presence in the critical Beirut area sufficient to deter the Syrian/Soviet aggression into the area until the Syrians become convinced that they cannot achieve their objective of taking over the area in the near term at which point it is believed that they will go to the bargaining table and agree to a settlement securing on favorable terms to us the strategic region which the United States is seeking to put in the hands of an independent Lebanese Government. Long term we hope for an independent Lebanon totally free of all foreign occupation. The real lever on Syria to come to an accommodition is the unstated threat they perceive that Israel will move back into the conflict and actually invade the Bakka Valley.

The Lebanese question is a complicated and serious one over which reasonable persons may disagree. However, it is my judgment that the responsible course of action at the present is to support this administration's efforts.

This includes the compromise worked out in the pending resolution for approval of a stay of our forces for a period of up to 18 months under stated conditions. Therefore, I support the resolution as introduced, and oppose all amendments thereto.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. EDWARDS).

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I believe the United States has a role to play in Lebanon. I believe there is sufficient evidence of involvement by non-Lebanese influences to suggest that this is more than a civil war and that the United States does have a security interest to be protected in Lebanon. And I believe that the Congress of the United States should recognize that that interest exists and join with the President in working to achieve a solution that will: First, bring peace to Lebanon, and second, do so without damage to American interests.

How we achieve that result, however, is no less important than the result itself. One of the principal elements of American political conservatism is a belief in the sanctity of the Constitution. Some would argue that we must unconditionally accept the leadership of the President because we have only one President. The concept of an all-powerful head of state is not only foreign to the principles of constitutional government but a serious threat to it. And the concept that at times the details of the Constitution should be set aside if doing so will achieve a desired result is a dangerous concept.

The war power of the United States is vested not in the executive branch but in the Congress. The President, as the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, has the authority under the Constitution, to decide on the placement of American troops; he does not, however, have the authority to decide whether American troops may be committed to hostilities. That power resides in the Congress and in my opinion the War Powers Act is a perfectly proper exercise of that authority. It is simply wrong, and dangerous to the basic precepts of our Government to seek ways to avoid the clear mandates of law and the Constitution to achieve the goal we seek to achieve.

This amendment need not change in any way the result sought under the agreement between the President and the leadership of this House. Under this amendment, the President could report to the Congress immediately if he chose, and the Congress could then grant to him before the week is out the same authority now proposed by the Zablocki resolution.

I support the President. I believe he has good reason for wishing to show strength, resolve, and American commitment in Lebanon. I believe the Congress should support him in doing that. But there is a transcendent issue, an issue of constitutional government, that must frame the process by which we act. It is for that reason, not opposition to the President's policies, that I will vote for this amendment to require the President to obey a law enacted by this Congress in exercise of its clear constitutional power and authority.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER).

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Chairman, the war powers resolution was purchased at a terrible price: rivers of blood and mountains of dead from Vietnam. The American people, whether it be in Central America or in the Middle East or in any other part of the world, are determined not to have another Vietnam.

The most precious thing that we can preserve in this debate is what we have gained in the War Powers Act. I understand and appreciate the good motives of our President, I think 18 months is too long to commit ourselves to, but I am going to vote for that commitment in the pending resolution on one definite understanding, that that is by both the War Powers Act and this resolution, Congress may bring those troops home whenever it resolves to do so.

In 5(c) of the war powers resolution provides: "such forces shall be removed by the President if the Congress so directs by concurrent resolution."

□ 1500

The Foreign Affairs Committee evidently felt that the Chadha decision, the immigration case required us to act until a clarification of that decision can be obtained by joint resolution. So this pending resolution says:

SEC. 7(a) Nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the Congress, by joint resolution, from directing such withdrawal.

I want it clearly known as a part of the legislative history of this act that many of us on this floor are voting for the 18 months for our troops in Lebanon with the definite understanding that we have express authority as Members of Congress to terminate the endurance of the troops in the Middle East whenever we choose to do so, either by concurrent or by joint resolution.

That is the important thing I think we must remember in this debate.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP).

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, at this very moment there is in Lebanon a National Lebanese Cease-fire Committee that is meeting as a preliminary step toward forming an organization toward national reconciliation. Our hopes, of course, and our prayers go with that cease-fire committee, leading toward Lebanese reconciliation among the indigenous factions.

That effort is something, of course, that is tenuous and uncertain but nonetheless, it is something that ought not to be undercut. If that effort is to stand a chance of succeeding, this Congress must stand united with the President, and demonstrate strong bipartisan support for the President's determination to work in Lebanon for a rational reconciliation effort.

The statement has been made by the gentleman from Maryland as well as the gentleman from Wisconsin that somehow, by their involved and curious substitute amendment, they are invoking an act that implements the Constitution of the United States. Vietnam has been mentioned as an analogy several times. With all due respect, I think one of the most prevalent and erroneous myths in America today is that somehow Vietnam was done surreptitiously, without congressional control or support. I do not know how many votes were taken in Congress in authorizing and appropriating funds for Vietnam, but a reasonable guess would be approximately 100 votes, if not many more; and every one was taken in full view of the American people. I would dare say some of the strongest critics of our policy in Vietnam during the 1960's had several votes in which they, themselves, were supporting the incumbent administration in its conduct of the war.

The Congress of the United States has the strongest power that has ever been given to a legislative body in history—the power of the purse. That power cannot be taken away or impaired by the War Powers Act or by any other legislation. It is part of our Constitution, integral to the system of checks and balances so artfully constructed by that document. The powers of Congress do not need strengthening; indeed I think they could be very well undercut by forcing a constitutional confrontation, as is set up in the Obey-Long amendment.

I just want to make one further point. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. MCCOLLUM) suggested that those who have the most to gain from a show of irresolution at this point would be the Soviet Union and Syria. What do we want in Lebanon? We want to see an independent, stable, and sovereign Lebanon, secure from foreign intervention and exploitation.

We hope that the Camp David peace process is enhanced by another democracy in the Mideast supporting Camp David. This would be in the interest not only of Lebanon; it would be in the interest of Israel; it would be in the interest of peace.

I would urge that there be a decisive vote against the Obey-Long amendment and a strong show of support for the President.

I support the Zablocki resolution, not because I concur in all its particulars, but because I believe that a successful foreign policy requires unity between Congress and the Executive, not disunity.

If we have learned anything from our recent past, it is the moral vacuity of sacrificing American lives in a cause we are not committed to win. Therefore, I believe there must be no mistake about our objectives in Lebanon, and our resolve and national unity of purpose in achieving those objectives.

I believe that our objectives are clear. Our presence in Lebanon is necessary to help give Lebanon the opportunity to reclaim its sovereignty and the integrity of its democratic government, to insure that Israel will have a secure northern border, and to facilitate the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon. If instead we were to abandon the cause of stability and allow hostile forces to reclaim Lebanese soil, we would be insuring the spread of Soviet influence and power in the Middle East, and we would forfeit any hope of stability or security or peace in the region.

In sending a multinational force to Lebanon to insure the peace, the free world recognized that the turmoil and foreign intervention in that country posed a threat to vital Western interests. The Zablocki resolution should be adopted so that the world will understand that the Congress of the United States is committed to securing our interests in the Middle East as surely as the administration and our allies are dedicated to that goal.

At the same time, this resolution is far from perfect. In particular, I must express my disagreement with the committee's decision to specify a set time limit on the deployment of U.S. forces in Lebanon. Either the stability and integrity of Lebanon are essential foreign policy objectives of the United States, or they are not. If they are, then setting an artificial time limit on our commitment makes no sense, and can only give false encouragement to Syria and others that we may tire of our responsibilities and falter in our resolve.

In this regard, amendments to the Zablocki resolution that would shorten the time period are doubly ill-advised. The Government of Lebanon is doing all it can to reassert its sovereignty and to effect national reconciliation. Israel has agreed to withdraw. Syria alone remains recalcitrant. Whose interests would be served by our pulling out at a set, early date: those who are working for peace, or those who are stalling for time, growing daily more entrenched and more bold in their efforts to thwart the peacekeeping mission of the multinational force?

The illogic of those advocating a shortened time period is carried to full absurdity by the Long-Obey amendment.

The Long-Obey amendment would substitute 30-day review periods and congressional micromanagement for the President's conduct of foreign policy. Elaborate reporting and certification requirements are no substitute for responsible evaluation of the requirements of our national interest. This amendment is a vehicle for instituting procedural divisiveness at the very time the need for national unity is uppermost.

By calling for an automatic cutoff in funds for U.S. Forces in Lebanon, unless the President submits the issue under the war powers resolution, the Obey-Long amendment would subordinate national security concerns to a procedural contest between the executive and legislative branches. The procedural reporting requirement is a separate question from the merits of our presence in Lebanon. There are many ways in which we in Congress can make our voice heard on foreign policy, short of handcuffing the country's ability to protect our security interests.

The cease-fire that was announced on Sunday was an important step toward the goal of national reconciliation. Let no one doubt that the interested parties will look to the action we take today to see whether this country stands united behind a firm policy in Lebanon, or whether we are uncertain and disunited. The chances for an enduring cease-fire and the eventual achievement of Lebanon's national reunification depend on our national unity as expressed in part in our vote here today.

America's leadership of the free world is not an easy undertaking. It demands sacrifices, as we have seen in Lebanon, and it incurs risks, as we continue to see in that country. Our resolve and unity of purpose in securing our interests and the interests of liberty in Lebanon become even more critical now, as opponents of freedom seek to deny our success.

President Reagan is determined to protect our interests in the Middle East, to pursue stability, freedom from terrorism and the curtailment of Soviet power and influence in that strategically vital region. And he knows that America's response to challenges in Lebanon will be seen by friend and adversary alike as a key test of our will as a nation to fulfill our role as leader of the free world. In this critical undertaking, the President deserves our steadfast support.

Adoption of the Zablocki resolution will not resolve the serious questions that remain about the constitutionality—or the wisdom—of the War Powers Act. But it will resolve any doubts that our friends and adversaries might have about America's will. It is time we put those doubts behind us. On that basis, I urge passage of the Zablocki resolution.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT).

Mr. BENNETT. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, my staff tells me that I have cast more votes than anybody in the history of Congress. It is about 15,000 votes. If I were going to take back any of those approximately 15,000 votes that I have cast, it would be the vote that I cast for the Gulf of Tonkin resolution.

We have a good Constitution. I am an amateur historian. I write history books as a matter of hobby, and in my study of the Constitution it leads me to see that the President was made Commander in Chief of the military forces because of the experience between the militia and the regulars in the Revolution. It was in order to have a coordinated, combined activity under one person.

On the other hand, as far as war powers were concerned, it was clear that the President was not given that power and Congress was given that power. I, myself, did not vote for the war powers law because I thought it improperly gave power to the President.

The testimony before our Committee on Armed Services leads me to think that we are in a situation where things may well get worse as far as ourselves and other countries are concerned in this particular area. Lebanon has had an adequate time, in my opinion, almost a year now, to come forth with some forthright ideas about how they are going to give and distribute democracy more thoroughly in that area. I am sympathetic with them, but it is not the responsibility of the Government of the United States.

The Obey-Long proposal requires Congress to make the decisions which the Constitution puts upon the Congress. It does not put them on the President; it puts then upon the Congress, and this was done for a very good, historical reason. The Constitution did it because of the experiences between Jefferson and Washington, Jefferson on the side of the French, Washington on the side of the British, during that period when we were arriving at the Consitution.

In order to keep that sort of thing out of the hands of the President, they gave it to the Congress. Congress has to make these decisions. Therefore, I am for the Obey-Long provision, which I think is a sounder provision in that direction.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. SKELTON).

Mr. SKELTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Obey amendment. This is not the answer that we are looking for this very serious issue.

I think we should face this issue head on. I think that we should face it by, No. 1, recognizing the War Powers Act as it is and following it as best we can, and requiring the administration to follow it as well.

I also think because we have been in Lebanon 1 year already that any additional time, and the computation thereof, should have begun from the moment that they went there.

Mr. Chairman, I wrote three letters to the President, one last December, one this February, and one this March, saying in essence that the War Powers Act was being violated. I was very disturbed over the responses that I received, which were completely inadequate.

I would also like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that the purpose, that is, the mission of this force in Lebanon has been enlarged. From the moment that the President sent us a letter in September 1982, he set forth one mission. That mission was one of peacekeeping. Yesterday, before the Committee on Armed Services, we heard testimony by Rear Admiral Howe, representing the State Department, that set forth three reasons why our forces are there, one of them being that of training the Lebanese forces, which was entirely outside the scope of the President's letter initially, and the third one included was that in essence of being a participant in a civil war.

The letters to the President and the answers from the State Department are offered herewith:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., December 2, 1982.

Hon. RONALD REAGAN,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I was distressed to learn today of your consideration of a proposal to commit additional U.S. troops to the Multinational Peacekeeping Force in Lebanon.

During the past couple of months, our men in Lebanon have been in almost constant danger. One man has already lost his life, and three others have been seriously injured. The continued violence and bombings during the past several days demonstrate the increased dangers our men will be asked to face if we continue to station them in Lebanon.

While I support international efforts to bring peace to Lebanon by facilitating the withdrawal of all foreign troops from that nation, I believe we need to have the answers to two questions:

One, will increased U.S. participation bring a more rapid and smooth transition to peace, or merely place additional U.S. men in jeopardy while maintaining the status quo? and

Two, what contributions can we expect from other nations which have just as much at stake in bringing peace to Lebanon?

In the interest of the young men in our armed forces, I urge you to carefully evaluate the advisability of such a decision, and to "Keep our troops home this Christmas".

With best regards,

Very truly yours,

IKE SKELTON,
Member of Congress.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., January 7, 1983.

Hon. IKE SKELTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SKELTON: Your letter of December 2 has been referred to me for reply. I deeply appreciate your concern for the interests of our young men in the armed forces. You can rest assured that the decision to send U.S. military personnel to serve in the Multinational Force (MNF) in Lebanon was made only after carefully weighing all relevant factors including the possible risks to which they would be exposed.

To date no decision has been made to expand the U.S. contribution to the MNF. If we pursue that course of action, it will be done only after careful review of the mission, the risks, and the prospects for success. We will, of course, continue to consult with the Congress as part of this ongoing process.

As you know, France and Italy are already deeply involved in the MNF and have been consistently supportive of this effort since the MNF was first introduced into Beirut. In addition, we are actively engaged in consultations with other allies and friendly nations about possible troop contributions and other support.

I hope this information is helpful.

With cordial regards,

Sincerely,

POWELL A. MOORE,
Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., February 10, 1983.

President RONALD REAGAN,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Two weeks ago, I addressed my colleagues in the House of Representatives, urging them to reexamine the involvement of our 1,200 Marines in Lebanon. That action was prompted by news reports that many Marine leaders view the situation in Lebanon as "an accident waiting to happen". Last week's incident, where a U.S. Marine Captain faced off against three Israeli tanks, and a later incident involving a 75 mm tank round which exploded 50 yards from another Marine position, cause me to appeal to you personally to bring our troops home.

The current contingent of Marines was sent to Lebanon in September of 1982. At that time, you submitted a report to Congress in keeping with the 1973 War Powers Act. You stated that the deployment would be for a limited period and that there was no intention of our troops becoming involved in hostilities.

It has become apparent that neither of these criterion exists at this time. In his testimony before the House Armed Services Committee last week, Secretary of Defense Casper Weinberger reported that our troops have been involved in three hostile incidents, and that it was his "continuing worry" that they could escalate to the point of causing "serious loss of life". Similarly, Nicholas Veliotes, Assistant Secretary of State for Near East and South Asian Affairs, told a House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee that it was his "personal guesstimate" that the Marines would stay in Lebanon another year.

Under the War Powers Act, your authority to commit troops into hostilities or potential hostilities without a Declaration of War or statutory authority is limited to 60-90 days. It also requires reporting under section 4(a)(1), allowing for a Congressional veto, if troops are introduced into hostilities or imminent hostilities. Inasmuch as the situation in Lebanon is becoming increasingly precarious, I am compelled to ask under what exact circumstances will you determine that U.S. troops are in a hostile situation? Secondly, what do you envision as a "limited" time period? Your candid answers to these very important questions would be reassuring to those who are interested in preserving the integrity of the War Powers Act and to protecting the lives of American servicemen.

Thank you for your attention to this matter. I look forward, with you, to a speedy and equitable solution to the problems in the Middle East.

With best regards,

Very truly yours,

IKE SKELTON,
Member of Congress.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., March 1, 1983.

Hon. IKE SKELTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SKELTON: Your letter of February 10 to President Reagan has been referred to me for reply. I appreciate your concern for the well-being of our Marine personnel serving with the Multinational Force (MNF) in Lebanon. The U.S. Marines are in Lebanon for the specific purpose of assisting the Lebanese Government to reassert its authority and control of its sovereign territory. Strengthening the central government of Lebanon is an important step which will facilitate the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon. The U.S. contingent to the MNF is a critical element in the restoration of peace and security to the capital city of Beirut. The U.S. role is an essential contribution toward a successful conclusion of the current negotiation efforts between Israel and Lebanon. As you know, Ambassadors Habib and Draper have been in Lebanon and Israel almost constantly for several months now as personal envoys of the President in an effort to lend our support to these important negotiations.

I can assure you that we are not unmindful of the continuing need to consult with the Congress on U.S. involvement in Lebanon and the Middle East situation in general. We have made a concerted effort to keep the Congress informed in a manner which I believe exceeds any requirement inherent in the War Powers Resolution.

In response to your specific questions, I would like to make clear that we certainly do not discount the danger inherent in any U.S. presence in Lebanon. However, as the President's report to the Congress under the War Powers Resolution stated, there was no intention or expectation that U.S. Armed Forces would become involved in hostilities. This remains the situation at this time. All parties involved clearly understand the guidelines under which the MNF was provided to assist the Government of Lebanon. With the MNF in Lebanon, there is additional assurance that hostilities will not resume.

The U.S. Marines are in Lebanon for a limited period of time. We do not envision an open-ended commitment. The U.S. component of the MNF will depart Lebanon as soon as the objectives of the MNF are achieved.

I hope this information is helpful.

With cordial regards,

Sincerely,

POWELL A. MOORE,
Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., March 1, 1983.

Hon. RONALD REAGAN,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am distressed to learn of your administration's speculation of increasing the size of the U.S. Marine contingent in Lebanon. Once again, I must appeal to you to bring our troops home.

At the time of their deployment in September of 1982, you advised Congress that the Marines would be in Lebanon for a limited period of time and that there was no intention of our troops becoming involved in hostilities. It has become apparent that neither of these criterion exists at this time. Inasmuch as the 1973 Wars Powers Act limits to 60-90 days your authority to commit troops to hostile or potentially hostile areas without Congressional approval or a declaration of war, and considering that your compliance with the War Powers Act has already been called into question, I think you would be poorly advised to increase the U.S. presence in Lebanon under current circumstances.

In the interest of protecting the lives of American Servicemen, I urge you to bring our boys home.

With best regards,

Very truly yours,

IKE SKELTON,
Member of Congress.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C.

Hon. IKE SKELTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SKELTON: Thank you for your letter to the President of March 1 expressing your concern over the possibility of increasing the size of the U.S. Marine contingent in Lebanon.

During the recent visits to Washington of Lebanese Foreign Minister Elie Salem and President Gemayel's special emissary Sa'eb Salam, we were extremely gratified by the firm reiteration of their thanks for the assistance the Multinational Force (MNF) is rendering to Lebanon. They told us that virtually all segments of Lebanese society are deeply appreciative of the international backing the MNF symbolizes, particularly as it has afforded the Lebanese army the moral support it needs to re-assert its authority on behalf of a strengthened central government. The army has now assumed responsibility for control of greater Beirut, including the sensitive port area; it is providing a secure environment for the capital's inhabitants for the first time in over eight years. The presence of U.S. troops in the MNF is a crucial element in the emergence of a strengthened, independent Lebanon, and symbolizes U.S. determination to stand fully behind the Lebanese in their effort to regain control of their country.

The Lebanese government some time ago asked the MNF contributors to increase the size of their contingents. Lebanon did so in anticipation of possible new tasks that could emerge from on-going negotiations for the withdrawal of the Israeli, Syrian and PLO occupying forces. We have stated only that we would consider the request sympathetically. It is our view that no decision can be made on such a matter until withdrawal negotiations have been completed and we have a clear idea how international troops—MNF or UNIFIL— would be used.

It remains our firm position that the U.S. Marine contingent will remain in Lebanon for only a limited period of time. There is no expectation or intention that they will become involved in hostilities while in Lebanon. However, there may be isolated incidents perpetrated by those determined to undermine the withdrawal negotiations and the growing strength of the Lebanese authorities. Let me reassure you that we will continue our close consultations with the Congress on questions related to the deployment of U.S. forces in Lebanon.

With cordial regards,

Sincerely,

POWELL A. MOORE,
Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations.

□ 1510

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. RAHALL).

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the distinguished committee chairman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, having traveled extensively in the Middle East in the height of the Israeli bombardment of Lebanon during the summer of 1982 and having met with five heads of state and six foreign ministers, I know full well the low esteem in which American foreign policy in the Middle East was held during that summer of 1982. Respect for our foreign policy was greatly improved when in November 1982 I returned to Lebanon and spent time visiting with our Marines there.

Our presence in that country has improved respect for America. Our presence in that country is vital to maintain the current cease-fire. Now, today in this pending amendment before the Congress we are being asked by some of those very same individuals who helped further that policy in the Middle East that brought us such low esteem among our moderate Arab friends to abandon the country of Lebanon, a country that, because of the arms and the military aid that this Congress has provided certain countries in the region, has been destroyed via the misuse of that aid.

I think it is wrong for those same individuals to ask us to abandon the country of Lebanon and the Lebanese Government, a country that is trying to rebuild itself from the U.S. policies that have torn it apart over the past decades.

To those who say that we are giving a blank check to the President by the adoption of this resolution I say, "read the resolution." It is not a blank check. There is a limitation upon our Marines as to the number of Marines that the President can send, there is a requirement upon the President to invoke the War Powers Act, there is a requirement upon the President to report to this Congress more than he is willing to do today, and I say that we are not giving a blank check to the President by approving the Zablocki resolution.

We are faced with the difficult decision of defining the role of the United States in Lebanon and the role of our marines. While all of us would rather see these brave men safe at home with their families, we must remember why they were sent to Lebanon in the first place.

In an effort to remove all foreign forces from Lebanon following the events of last summer, the United States agreed to help form a multinational peacekeeping unit to establish the authority of the duly elected central government rather than allow the many warring factions to take control. The commitment of the United States was a vital element in negotiating the withdrawal of foreign forces from a country that has known nothing but constant war and occupation in recent years.

The future of any American influence in the Middle East would be jeopardized—if not completely eliminated—as a result of pulling the rug out from underneath our Marines. We have made a firm commitment to the people of Lebanon, indeed the entire Middle East, to do all we can to work toward a just and everlasting peace. To renege on this pledge would demonstrate a lack of belief in our commitment. Whether or not that original commitment was correct is certainly debatable.

Today, in Beirut, a meeting is being held between the leaders of the Lebanese Army, the Phalange Militia, the Druze, and the Shi'ites. I see this as an important first step toward a national reconciliation that President Gemayel must pursue. He must pursue negotiation and not military conquest. President Gemayel is willing to reach out and has done so.

A national reconciliation will bring with it the peace that our marines are in Beirut to help keep. We cannot pull them out now when there is a glimmer of hope for a peaceful coexistence. The fact that the cease-fire has held for almost 3 days now is a very significant one. The meeting in Beirut will, hopefully, produce a solid agreement for a cease-fire and remove the danger facing our marines.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. RAHALL) has expired.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. PETRI).

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the substitute amendment.

The substitute provides the administration with the flexibility that it may need to extract our forces from Lebanon gracefully while making it clear that Congress will itself remove them if prudence so dictates.

Mr. Chairman, the small Marine contingent should not be in Lebanon. The United States, which is the world's preeminent economic and military power, must be cautious not to enter militarily in situations where our strength will likely be insufficiently utilized to achieve our objectives but where the presence of our forces will allow others to weaken or exploit us.

That is the prospect that we face in Lebanon. It may be that there is a need for a modest outside military contingent to buttress the Lebanese Government until it can gather sufficient strength to stand in its own country on its own, but the prospects of that happening are not assured. Should it not happen, then down the road we face either being pushed out, which a great power ought not to allow happen, or escalation merely to maintain ourselves in a deteriorating situation. This is a burden we should not permit ourselves to bear alone.

Therefore, if there is a need for a military presence in Lebanon, we should help fill that need by participating in an international brigade wearing its own uniforms and flying its own flag so as not to engage directly the prestige of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, as we negotiate to bring peace and stability to Lebanon, I ask that we also negotiate with other interested countries the creation of an international force to replace the national forces present in that country.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. LANTOS).

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Chairman, there are a lot of people listening to this debate, but there are two people who are listening to this debate with extraordinary interest. They are Dr. Rafic Jouejati, the Syrian Ambassador, and Mr. Anatoly Dobrynin, the Soviet Ambassador, because in the ultimate irony of this debate, when we are allegedly discussing how much power the President has and how much power the Congress has in determining U.S. policy, we are surreptitiously transferring the decisionmaking authority to the Syrian and Soviet Governments. So I say to Dr. Jouejati and Ambassador Dobrynin, "If you are watching us here, do not think that we are going to hand over to you the decisionmaking power over U.S. foreign policy."

The substitute resolution is a victory for vacillation and a formula for failure. It is a procedural nightmare. It does not give the Congress or it does not give the President any power. It transfers to the Syrians and the Soviets authority to make decisions on the fundamental conduct of American foreign policy.

Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleagues to reject overwhelmingly this ill-conceived, counterproductive measure.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from California (Mrs BOXER).

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment. This is not a run-and-hide amendment; this is not an immediate withdrawal amendment; this is not a weak-kneed amendment;

On the contrary the Obey amendment is a real true compromise between those who feel we should immediately withdraw from Lebanon—that this it is not our war—and those who feel that an 18-month blank check is a totally inappropriate congressional response.

The Obey amendment merely asks the President to declare to Congress and the people exactly what the status is in Lebanon. If the status is peace—I know of few who object to a peacekeeping force. If the status is war, then this Congress has a right to know. This amendment has teeth—the teeth being our appropriations power; to give that up is to be a paper tiger.

I believe there is hope for the Middle East and that Lebanon is an important element of that hope. This amendment keeps the heat on the Syrians because their is no firm withdrawal date; it keeps the heat on the Congress and the administration because of the reporting requirements and it keeps the heat on the Gemayel government to broaden its base. It deserves our support.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished whip on the minority side, the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT).

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Chairman, over the years I have watched this body in effect dismantle in many instances our effective leadership team on both sides of the aisle. We have not always had strong leadership, and we certainly have not very often had very good followership around here.

In this instance our leaders are leading. I am talking about the Speaker, the majority leader, the minority leader, the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, our ranking member on the Foreign Affairs Committee, the leaders in the Senate, and the administration, all of whom got together and hammered out this compromise resolution.

It is not a resolution that those Members on the other side of the aisle are all happy with, and I can assure them that we are not all happy with it over here. Probably we would prefer a multiple-choice opportunity, because as "leaders" each one of us has our own opinions, and we do not want to follow the leaders.

We do have strong leadership in this instance, and we need support because we have a good resolution. It is the best that we can provide right now. We cannot have 535 prima donnas deciding what we are going to have as foreign policy. We have got to have leadership from the Commander in Chief, we have got to have leadership in the House and the Senate, and we have got to pay attention to those leaders because they have done a good job here.

I urge the Members to vote no on the Obey-Long substitute and for this resolution. We do have a policy in Lebanon. The resolution does invoke the War Powers Act now. The Obey-Long substitute, as I understand it, would not invoke it until the end of November; the resolution we have before us as the base document does it now.

Our policy in Lebanon, I think, is very clear. It tries to give time to the Lebanese Government to get on its feet and survive with all the different factions involved. It tries to give stability to that region.

□ 1520

Now, when did we change our strategic and national interests in the Middle East, I ask my colleagues?

Lebanon is an important part of the overall strategy in the Middle East and we should not forget that.

Another policy in Lebanon is to try to find a way to get a coordinated withdrawal of our marines and get them out of there. The best way to do that is to support the Zablocki resolution, the compromise resolution we have before us.

I urge my colleagues to vote against the Obey amendment and for the original resolution as reported.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN).

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of resolution 364 and against the Long-Obey amendment.

The odds for peace in Lebanon are long ones. The last decades give reason for despair.

The issue today is whether these difficult odds are worth pursuing and worth maximizing, and how.

The resolution does not provide a blank check. The amount on the check already has been written, with clear limits on the amount of money and the number of troops.

The issue is not whether we are giving the administration unlimited authority. It is whether we should maximize the chances that already limited authority can work effectively.

There is a cease-fire in Lebanon today. Cease-fires in Lebanon have been broken before, so the odds may be against the durability of this one.

I believe, however, that we should maximize these odds. However difficult, as long as we do so within a framework that—

First, does not allow the President to escalate substantially the U.S. military involvement without congressional approval.

Second, preserves Congress right to take a further look and to act at any point.

The resolution satisfies these two criteria—not in each detail, perhaps, but in major respects. It does by its incorporation by reference of the limitations on U.S. troops in Public Law 98-43 and by the terms of section 7(a).

It is not clear why the present ceasefire in Lebanon occurred, but it is likely that one factor was the continuing presence of the multinational peacekeeping force.

The Long-Obey amendment would cast a shadow over the role of the multinational peacekeeping force.

It would do so because the resolution would be vetoed and would set off confrontation within the U.S. Government.

It would do so on its own terms because it would establish conditions that could be read as signifying equivocation on our part and that would give some external forces now in Lebanon too much power to determine the course of events here in Washington.

I speak as one who believed and believes that our role in the Vietnam war was a tragic mistake and who believes that this administration has drastically over-relied on military means to the detriment of other factors in Central America. But easy analogies can be dangerous ones. We are dealing today with the particular situation in the Middle East, not Vietnam nor Central America. The particular circumstances in the Mideast today militate in favor of support of House Joint Resolution 364 and defeat of Long-Obey.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. WOLPE).

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Long-Obey substitute and in opposition to the proposed 18-months authorization contained in the original resolution.

I want to speak to those of my colleagues who suggest that we need the 18-month authorization in order to show sufficient resolve. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The substitute resolution offered by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) says nothing whatsoever with respect to the time frame within which American forces will be committed to Lebanon. It speaks only to the question of the method by which that decision shall be made.

Yes, American policy historically has been characterized by too many fits and starts, precisely because American administrations have gone their own way without regard to the feelings, sentiments, and understanding of the Congress and the American people.

The whole philosophy of the War Powers Act, embraced within the Long-Obey substitute, is that the Congress if it is to fulfill its clear constitutional responsibilities must be involved on a continuing basis in the decision to place American troops in a zone of conflict and hostility. Only by full congressional involvement and open public debate can we develop the kind of national consensus that is a prerequisite to a sustainable foreign policy.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FRANK).

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Michigan just said, the Obey-Long substitute, which I support, is not seeking to hasten the withdrawal in its terms of our troops. Where it differs is that it insists on full congressional participation in the decisionmaking process.

What I am distressed by, what I find literally subversive of our Constitution, is the argument that has been made again and again that asking for congressional participation in the decision is equivalent to deciding that they withdraw.

We have had a carefully crafted substitute which seeks to insure that we can be continual participants in the decision about how long and under what terms they stay. We are told that that will signal that we are going to withdraw. Equating a desire by Congress to participate with a decision by Congress automatically that people withdraw will undercut our constitutional participation. When we have to make a decision, which is a terrible one for all of us, to send young Americans into a situation where they may be killed or may have to kill, the American public has a right to have it made with full constitutional participation.

The issue here is, on the one hand, do we give the President an 18 month—not blank check, but a check as big as the national deficit—because it is more than he asks for, and by which he says he will not be bound.

Do we acquiesce in a Presidential assertion that he, and he alone, will say where and how we commit troops, even into hostilities, or do we seek by this substitute to regularize the process of decision so that we can now and continuously join in that decision.

The young people who were sent, and I am for leaving them there now, but all of us ought to make that decision and remake it, and not put it off for the sake of convenience or for any other sake.

If there are those, whether it is Syria or the Soviet Union or in the White House or in this Chamber, who do not understand the American Constitution and who equate participation by Congress with a negative decision, then they are going to have to relearn the American Constitution. We cannot give away our prerogatives.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE).

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, in this debate today, our first concern should be to protect the U.S. Marines who are currently stationed in Lebanon as part of the multinational peacekeeping force. That should be our first goal.

The House today is considering the resolution authored by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) and an amendment by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

I plan to vote against the resolution from the committee, because I believe it goes too far in giving carte blanche power to the President to permit the marines to remain on duty in Lebanon for an additional 18 months, too long a period of time.

I am in favor of extending their stay for a shorter period. This would give Congress the opportunity to fully review the situation and to determine whether there exists a need for the marines to remain in Lebanon.

By passing this resolution, Congress would be abdicating to the executive branch its responsibility under the Constitution to develop and declare war policy. We must retain some control of congressional warmaking powers; this resolution would destroy that power.

However, I will also vote against the Obey amendment because I believe it goes much too far in tying the President's hands. The amendment places far too many restrictions on the President's power to direct the activities of the marines in Lebanon.

It would invariably lead to a constitutional confrontation between the President and Congress over actions to be taken in Lebanon and the Middle East.

If Congress is to authorize the presence of the marines in Lebanon, it is the President's responsibility to handle the day-to-day details of the U.S. peacekeeping mission in that country. In my mind, this is in keeping with the responsibilities of Congress and the executive branch, under the Constitution.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I think the real argument here is over the 18 months. It cannot be over insufficient genuflection toward the sanctity of the War Powers Act, because if you read the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin, House Joint Resolution 364, the War Powers Act is mentioned almost on every page. The title says, "Providing statutory authorization under the war powers resolution."

The last paragraph on page 7 says: "Nothing in this joint resolution modifies, limits, or supersedes any provision of the war powers resolution," and this will be signed by the President.

So what are we arguing about, that the White House is not going to comply with every jot and tittle of the war powers resolution? No. There is recognition here in a compromise that has been fashioned by the Speaker of the House, by the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and the White House, a carefully worked out compromise which preserves the constitutional posture and prerogatives of both branches of Government and it ought not to be lightly abandoned, despite the acknowledged expertise of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) of the Appropriations Committee. Because the Long-Obey substitute will subject our presence, and that means our marines, to constant uncertainty, it gives the troublemakers over in Lebanon a continuing ongoing incentive to disruption, by breaking the cease-fire just before the 30-day period is up or actively dragging their feet in the negotiations.

Under Long-Obey, the President must certify a cease-fire is in effect and progress is being made in the negotiations every 30 days, and the troublemakers have a blank check for disruption by simply breaking the cease-fire or dragging their feet in negotiations.

□ 1530

That is what the gentleman from California (Mr. LANTOS) meant by saying we are handing over the control of our foreign policy to the Syrian Ambassador or to the Soviet Ambassador.

There are many factors which create violence in Lebanon. Dr. LONG's and Mr. OBEY's substitute will create one more cause for causing violence in Lebanon, because the troublemakers can achieve their aims by initiating fighting every 30 days.

Unfortunately, conflict do not run like Amtrak, on a timetable. When you shorten the period of a possible congressionally mandated pullout, you destroy our credibility, our flexibility, our negotiating strength, and you handicap, you do not help, preserve the peace. The Zablocki resolution certainly does not capitulate to the White House.

Eighteen months is an outside perimeter. It is long enough to prevent Syria or any other country over there from doubting our resolve. It eliminates the involvement of this difficult issue in Presidential politics which will be all over the place next year, and of course, Congress always retains the power of the purse. We are a continuing body. We will be sitting next year. The President cannot continue maintaining troops in Lebanon without congressional support, without popular support.

So, I hope and pray that you will let the Speaker and let Mr. ZABLOCKI and his team, which negotiated this important compromise, have the day rather than precipitate a constitutional crisis while our marines are in difficulty in a very volatile part of the world.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. YATRON).

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Long-Obey amendment. The Zablocki-Hamilton resolution does not give the President carte blanche with our marines in Lebanon. The Zablocki-Hamilton resolution is a well-crafted compromise which invokes the War Powers Act and insures the role of the Congress in the formulation of U.S. policy in Lebanon.

Mr. Chairman, I am not at all pleased with the prospect of maintaining U.S. Marines in Lebanon for another 18 months. However, if we are to achieve peace and national reconciliation in Lebanon, it seems to me that we do not have a better alternative. A Lebanon free of foreign forces and united under a stable, democratic Lebanese Government clearly serves American security interests in the Middle East. These goals can only be realized through a political solution based on negotiations and diplomatic compromise. The recent cease-fire worked out by Saudi and U.S. mediators is the first step toward achieving a peaceful settlement in war-torn Lebanon. This cease-fire was brought about, in part, by the presence of our marines in the multinational peacekeeping force.

Maintaining our marines in Beirut sent a strong message to the Syrians that the United States will not abandon efforts to negotiate a peaceful settlement in Lebanon, hence opening the door to further military provocations.

If we pull our troops out of Lebanon prematurely or impose strict time limitations on their presence, we risk losing whatever leverage we have over the Syrians to participate in peace negotiations. The Long-Obey amendment weakens the U.S. commitment to a cease-fire and diplomatic mediation. The Syrians realize that they will not accomplish in negotiations what they have been trying to achieve militarily. If the Syrians believe that the U.S. commitment in Lebanon is lacking, it will give them the incentive to wait us out, thereby undermining the negotiating process and escalating the conflict.

Mr. Chairman, I am fairly optimistic that a diplomatic resolution can be achieved in Lebanon. However, it will be a very difficult and sensitive process. Thousands of innocent people have died in Lebanon and thousands more will perish if a political solution is not realized. The Zablocki-Hamilton resolution puts the U.S. Congress and the President squarely behind negotiations and peace in Lebanon. The resolution does set the war powers in motion and insures the role of the Congress in the decisionmaking process. Therefore I see no reason to adopt the Long-Obey amendment, and I urge its defeat.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SCHUMER).

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, among the many points made this afternoon, I think one point bears underscoring, even for those, many of those very hesitant about the 18 months that is in the Zablocki resolution.

That is that the Obey resolution is the wrong way to show our concern and show our limitations. Because once again the Obey resolution will encourage a breakdown of the cease-fire. Very simply, if the cease-fire continues, no War Powers Act is invoked; if the cease-fire ends, then the Congress must invoke the War Powers Act.

If I were a Syrian, if I were a Palestinian, if I were any of the groups that do not want to see the cease-fire, and want to see the partition of Lebanon, there would be one simple thing for me to do—shoot at our American marines and then invoke the War Powers Act.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. JENKINS).

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Obey substitute and in support of the Zablocki amendment. I have watched this House for some 6 years in attempting to direct foreign policy from the floor of this House. I simply believe that it does not work, regardless of what we believe individually. It simply is not in the best interests for us as 435 Members of this institution to attempt to direct foreign policy on a day-to-day basis.

We must at least let the President, our President, whomever he may be, have the opportunity to formulate foreign policy. If we keep the executive branch in constant turmoil and confusion, then any President does not have the opportunity to direct foreign policy. I saw this happen when we attempted to implement the Panama Canal treaties and in many other instances. It simply does not work.

All of us want our troops out of Lebanon at the earliest possible moment. Most of us, including myself, believe that it was a mistake for us to commit troops there in the first place. Nevertheless, it would be a worse mistake to pass the Obey substitute and send the message to the Soviets that this Nation has no real policy in our foreign affairs and that they have a free hand in the Middle East. The risks are too great to allow that confusion.

I urge the defeat of the Obey substitute.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak again at this point. But I just have to observe after the statement by the last speaker that both he and a previous speaker on the other side earlier this afternoon seem to be in the quaint position of telling us today that we ought to send the marines to Lebanon for an 18-month commitment, but on a previous vote a number of months ago, when we were voting on among other things the provision of assistance to Lebanon to build up their own army, I assume so that we do not have to send our marines there that both he and another speaker who are speaking in support of the Zablocki resolution voted against that resolution at that time. I do not think that it makes much sense to say no, we will not send money to buttress the Lebanese Army but we will send our own troops.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. RICHARDSON).

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my reservations about the proposed compromise resolution which would allow the administration to station U.S. combat forces in Lebanon for the next year and a half.

I believe the War Powers Act must be invoked because the Congress should participate in decisions affecting the lives of American troops.

The administration's contention that our marines are not involved in combat makes little sense. Four marines have been killed and more than two dozen have been wounded in recent weeks.

Congress has a fundamental constitutional obligation to insist that the President obey the law. I believe a better course of action would be to impose a 6-month time limit—that would be short enough to prevent the United States from being hopelessly bogged down in Lebanon's civil war, and it would allow the Congress to continually monitor our policy in that area.

This 6-month substitute would not only take advantage of the current cease-fire, but it would help preserve the full range of American options, and it would insure congressional review of Presidential actions in Lebanon.

Mr. LONG of Maryland, Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER).

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Chairman, on September 29, 1982, the President wrote the President pro tempore of the other body, Senator THURMOND, a letter announcing that the marines had been sent to Lebanon, "The presence of which will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority."

The President's letter went on to say:

> I want to emphasize that as was the case of the deployment of United States forces in Lebanon in August as a part of the early multinational force there is no intention or expectation that U.S. Armed Forces will become involved in hostilities.

Obviously, those two salient points of the President's letter of a year ago have not been achieved. The Gemayel government has made no progress whatsoever in restoring its sovereignty and authority, and the marines are obviously involved in hostilities as there have been 5 dead and 38 wounded.

As a result, our country is involved in a morass, and it is hard to tell on a day-to-day basis who our friends are and who the enemy is among the multifaceted factions and religious militia.

□ 1540

The only way to extricate ourselves from this morass is through the adoption of the Long-Obey resolution which sets definite timetables. It does not turn Lebanon over to the Syrians and the PLO through an immediate withdrawal of our forces, but it also does not grant an 18-month blank check to the adminstration to keep the marines there, as does the Zablocki resolution.

One thing we should have learned in our Vietnam experience is that the United States cannot become the world's policeman.

The failure to adopt the Long-Obey resolution will set the stage for another hostage crisis situation which did our country no good.

I urge the adoption of the Long-Obey resolution and the defeat of the Zablocki resolution.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. SABO).

Mr. SABO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Long-Obey substitute. In my judgment it makes much more sense than the resolution that is before us.

It is a resolution that maintains flexibility. It assures that the Congress can come back, look at the issue, and maintain our options for what our future policy in Lebanon should be.

I have listened with intent interest to the arguments on behalf of the 18-month resolution. The primary argument that I hear is that we should adopt an 18-month resolution so that we do not have to deal with the issue of the War Powers Act again during an election campaign.

I would suggest to the Members of the House that if there is any resolution before us that is a cut and run resolution, it is the resolution that came out of the Foreign Affairs Committee. That resolution really asks the House to cut and run from its most fundamental responsibility to deal with the question of war.

I hope we do not do that. I hope we take the best alternative that is available to us today and that is to vote yes on the Long-Obey resolution.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER).

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, today I urge support of the Long-Obey substitute. It allows the cease-fire to grow. It protects the marines. It follows the law. It does not regulate time and it anticipates circumstances.

If Lebanon is anything, it is volatile. The Long-Obey substitute allows that if the cease-fire continues, as we hope, then the marines can stay.

But if there is, in fact, war, hostilities, then the clock begins to tick on the War Powers Act.

The Long-Obey substitute anticipates circumstances in which the President of the United States will have to report to the people and the people's Congress about why our marines should stay. The Long-Obey substitute does not tie the President's hands. It loosens his tongue.

The President cannot avoid in times of war a report to the American people.

Under no circumstances will I vote for an 18-month blank check. Under no circumstances will I vote to subject our marines to the roles of sitting ducks, fish in a barrel, or political hostages, if you will.

If I had to choose, frankly, given two choices: A, to bring them home; or B, an 18-month blanket extension, I would bring them home.

The value of Long-Obey is that it gives us a third and perhaps a better choice. That choice says that if the cease-fire continues, let it grow. If the cease-fire dies aborning, the President must report under the War Powers Act.

There are those who say we do not need 535 Secretaries of State. I agree.

What we need is a President willing to speak to the issue of war, and peace in times when American lives are at stake. The advantage of Long-Obey is not that it is perfect. It is not.

The advantage of Long-Obey is not that it is the key to success in Lebanon. It is not.

The advantage to Long-Obey is that on the question of war it requires the President to speak to the American people. If his voice is filled with reason and resolve, the people will hear him and will deem him right to risk American lives in Lebanon.

If, on the other hand, his voice does not ring true, the people will speak. "Bring our boys home," they will say.

Support Long-Obey, for it is the right thing to do.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. LEACH).

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I rise simply to stress that what we have with the Committee resolution is a situation where both Congress and the Executive are attempting to have their cake and eat it, too. The administration wants the political complicity of Congress and the legal authority of statute to sanction past and future policies in Lebanon, but it does not want statute to constrain future Middle Eastern options, nor set a precedent for intrusive congressional involvement in Central America or elsewhere. Congress, on the other hand, wants the President to recognize, however weakly and reluctantly, the existence of the war powers resolution but it does not want to share political responsibility for Presidential policy.

The Obey-Long substitute causes both branches of our Government to face reality. It forces the administration to recognize explicitly the limits of law and forces Congress to face up to its responsibilities, however unpopular, in foreign policy. It establishes the methodology by which a bipartisan, bi-institutional foreign policy can be drafted within our constitutional framework without either a declaration of war or Gulf of Tonkin-like resolution.

The Obey-Long approach represents above all a carefully balanced defense of the constitutional process. It should be adopted.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES).

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the resolution.

I know that many Members of Congress—myself included—were skeptical of the original decision to send our marines into Lebanon as part of the international peacekeeping force. We were deeply concerned that, in effect, we would be left in the thicket of a complex internal dispute that we were not a direct party to, and which was not of our making. Moreover, we ran the clear risk that our own forces would become a lightning rod for the pent up anger and hostilities among the various feuding factions in Lebanon.

Unfortunately, today, we do not have the luxury of dealing with our involvement at an abstract or theoretical level. We must deal with the situation as it exists—not as we would like it to be.

That situation is one in which we have voluntarily assumed an active role as part of a multinational peacekeeping force. Having done so, it is incumbent upon us to act responsibly. There can be little question that the precipitous withdrawal of our troops at this time would create a major void—one that would quickly be filled by the Syrians on the pretext of quelling the violence and bloodshed that would inevitably occur—and call into serious question our credibility as a nation and reliability as an ally.

It is that predictament, particularly the possibility that Lebanon could become a Syrian clone, that the President is trying to avoid. We must avoid closing off any of our options. Denying to the President reasonable flexibility to deal with a very difficult and complex foreign policy dilemma would be a serious error.

By the same token there is a constitutional necessity for the Congress to maintain its proper role in any decisions that could lead our Nation into open hostilities. We must not allow ourselves to be drawn into any de facto or undeclared war—a war which does not have a consensus of support among our citizenry as reflected in a vote of this Congress.

The resolution before us today, while not totally satisfactory, represents the best means of dealing with our current situation responsibly. It does not put the President, who has the ultimate responsibility for carrying out our foreign policy, on so short a leash that the Syrians can just play a waiting game.

It does, however, make this Congress an active participant in any final military commitments. As amended it requires the President to provide us with status reports every 60 days. Any major change in the size or the role of our force must be authorized by Congress. The President is also directed to explore the possibility of replacing the current multinational force with a U.N. Force within 12 months.

More, importantly, however, this resolution leaves intact the power granted to the Congress by the war powers resolution to mandate the recall of our troops or simply cut off funding for military involvement in Lebanon at any time we deam it in the public interest.

At the same time, this resolution leaves the necessary room for the President to conduct American foreign policy in a manner that is responsible to our allies as well as to our troops. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

□ 1550

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. LOWRY).

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Long-Obey substitute. I am concerned that regardless of when American troops pull out of Lebanon we will then see after that a continuation of the same religious civil war that has gone on for centuries.

To say that 1,600 marines stationed in Lebanon is going to be able to maintain stability where warring factions have warred for years, have warred for centuries, which have troops in strong conflict now in the same area, our 1,600 marines will sit in a crossfire. That is a crossfire between 35,000 to 40,000 Syrians, 10,000 PLO's, 1,000 to 2,000 Shiites, 1,000 Sunni Muslims, 1,000 to 2,000 Jumblatts, the Druze, 4 different other factions of the Lebanese front in religious wars that have gone on for years and which the administration and House leadership want to put our troops on the ground in the middle of for 18 months.

American troops, American marines should not be symbols of a policy that the United States cannot possibly make work. Have we not learned? Have we not learned?

I rise in strong support of the Long-Obey substitute.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, will the distinguished gentleman from Washington yield?

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KAZEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in what the gentleman said about this being a religious war; religious war is all the gentleman has talked about.

Does the gentleman mean to say that Syria's part in this conflict is a religious rather than a political interest, than a desire to obtain additional territory, that of the sovereign country of Lebanon? Certainly the gentleman does not mean that.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. What I mean to say, I would respond to my friend from Texas, is that there are warring factions that are religious factions that have been there for years and the Syrians and the Russians take advantage of that.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY).

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Chairman, it is with a deep sense of history and recognition that we are addressing a precedent-setting situation that I rise today. The Founding Fathers, fortunately for us, had a very clear sense of history. They had learned the lessons of the 18th century very well, the lessons of willful despots who had led their countries into one war after another, draining treasuries, and having innocent men and women slaughtered.

That is why they vested the authority to make war in the legislative body. That authority would rest with the Congress which was closest to the people.

Mr. BENNETT discussed the Commander in Chief's role, that the Founding Fathers wanted him to be one of coordinator between the standing Army and the Militia. Indeed, President Washington, in the Whiskey Rebellion, construed the role of Commander in Chief literally and actually led the forces of the United States against a group of willful and rebellious Americans.

It is clear that the lawmaking authority of the Congress is not subordinate to that of the Executive's prerogative as Commander in Chief. Let me quote one of the "fathers" of the War Powers Act on this question because it seems to me that we have forgotten the lessons of Vietnam; we have forgotten the fact that in order for us to cooperate, in order for us to jointly make policy we have to do it on an ongoing basis.

Mr. ZABLOCKI said about Presidential authority, in 1973:

> In recent years Presidents, in practice, illegally arrogated to themselves more and more authority. Congress therefore believes it necessary to pass war powers legislation which establishes a procedure, and close cooperation of the two branches consistent with the Constitution.

This 18-month resolution is not close cooperation, it is a copout.

It says to 1,600 men on a beach that we are prepared "to leave you there because we are not prepared in the House of Representatives to deal with this very meddlesome and difficult problem on a monthly or 6-month basis."

How can we say that to them? How can we suggest to ourselves that this is only an issue where the United States is going to confront the Syrians and the Soviets?

It is clear that the Syrians, the Russians, and their proxies are not interested in a united Lebanon or for real "peace" in the Middle East. But do we really believe that 1,800 marines are going to fight the 30,000 Syrians or the 7,000 Soviet troops?

That is not our objective there. Our objective should be simply one of extricating ourselves militarily from this situation and applying the greatest amount of political pressure in coordinations with our allies that we can.

The 18-month resolution does not provide the President with that flexibility. It does not recognize our constitutional prerogatives to make war and to set policy. It arrogates to the President the authority that, 10 years ago, right here, we refused to let him have.

We are rolling over on the question of war powers; we are not requiring a report; we are not requiring the sort of consultation that the visionary Members of this Congress 10 years ago wanted us to have.

I implore my colleagues, 10 years is too short a time to have forgotten the lessons of history. The dictates of the Long-Obey amendment require very difficult and ongoing consultation between the President and the Congress, and that is far preferable a situation to an open-ended commitment which is the alternative.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair would like to state that the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG), has 18 minutes remaining, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), has 9 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD), has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. WINN), a member of the committee.

Mr. WINN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I had not intended to speak, but I must speak against the Long-Obey amendment.

As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I spent many, many hours in hearings listening to arguments pro and con. This last week I spent the better part of 6 days with members of the European Parliament as a cochairman of that parliamentary delegation.

Certainly they questioned the reason that we are in this conflict and that we have our marines there. But, of the 23 members representing 10 European parliamentary countries, not one urged that we pull our troops out of there at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about the credibility of the United States in this world. We are just now securing some credibility with the Arab countries. We have not had much of that. We are working closely with them to secure a permanent cease-fire.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PAUL).

Mr. PAUL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I thank the chairman and I rise to state my strong support for the Long-Obey amendment. It certainly does not do as much as I think we should do in restraining the activities that we are performing over in the Middle East but it does put on some of the needed controls that I think are necessary. It has been adequately explained here in the last several hours the great danger of having troops in the Middle East but I think that there is another good reason why we should not be involved.

I think in many ways this justifies the use of Marines any place and every place. If we can put the Marines in the Middle East today and keep them on this so-called peace mission, we justify their use any place any time.

I think also that we must consider the fact that this represents a policy of interference. Interference in a place in the world where I do not think we should be interfering. It literally restrains Israel from doing the kind of thing that they need to do to secure their own country.

So, with the policy of interference I think that we do great harm, not only to that area of the country by causing confusion and not allowing the balance of powers to develop adquately, but I literally think it harms and injures our own defense by taking resources and personnel that should be used for this purpose.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ).

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, whatever the merits of the Long-Obey amendment may be, it has at least one fatal flaw. Under the terms of their amendment it is entirely conceivable by the end of November that a situation could develop in which our forces were not engaged in hostilities, but where the cease-fire had broken down.

And under those circumstances, we would be obligated to withdraw our forces from Lebanon.

In other words, if the Syrians, the PLO, the Druze, the Shiites, if anyone in Lebanon who wants the U.S. forces to withdraw from that country, undertook to fire a few shots on October 31, our forces would have to be withdrawn. And to the extent that the withdrawal of U.S. forces would lead to the withdrawal of the other countries in the MNF, which in turn would lead to the collapse of the central government of Lebanon, it would mean that the prospects for peace in that country would go down the diplomatic drain.

This amendment is a formula for the continuation of conflict rather than for the achievement of reconciliation.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER).

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Chairman, do we really think that with the threat of troop withdrawal in November that the factions in Lebanon would be willing to carry on negotiations? This would be a disastrous change in our foreign policy.

This amendment will guarantee some things. It will guarantee violence. It will negate any opportunity for a cease-fire and destroy chances for a final agreement.

We are all aware of the political implications through this amendment forcing a final showdown between the President and the Congress on the War Powers Act in an election year. How will that demonstrate to the world that we are in unity and stand behind our commitments overseas? The Druze, the Syrians, the Soviets, will all sit back and watch us and what they do much depends on what we do. And that was demonstrated off the coast when we sent our Navy there resulting in people willingness to negotiate and with a cease-fire.

The sponsors should face up to the results of their amendment, making a mockery of our foreign policy and creating division with the President and Congress. This amendment will create the worst results with our international image.

The lack of consistency and firmness in our position will destroy credibility in forming foreign policy and our allies and the world will question if we have the ability to adhere to a policy that is trackable and longstanding. We cannot afford an amendment that will change with the drop of a report each 60 days. That is exactly what this amendment does. It changes our policy with the simple drop of report.

I urge its defeat.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR).

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBERSTAR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, this resolution presents a fundamental dilemma to each Member of the Congress. In voting for or against this resolution as it is presented, one is forced to choose between an 18-month troop commitment or withdrawal, between a limited implementation of the War Powers Act or no implementation at all, between supporting the marines now in Lebanon or undermining their position, between encouraging the effort to achieve a cease-fire and find a political solution or allowing the Syrians and the PLO the opportunity to destroy that effort.

For these reasons, this resolution is not a very satisfactory response to the dilemma facing each Member. In the end, I believe that some limitations on the President's power are better than none at all. And yet, the Long-Obey amendment provides what I believe is the most effective response to the situation facing the Congress and the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, the action taken by this body at the conclusion of today's debate will have profound implications not only for the prospect of peace in Lebanon, but for the future balance of authority between the executive and legislative branches of Government. The war in Vietnam has left an indelible mark on the American political landscape. Public assumptions about war and assumed invincibility of American might were among the casualties of the divisive conflict. Likewise, out of the anguish of that experience emerged new attitudes regarding the moral and political authority to wage war.

Reflecting this new national mood, Congress enacted the war powers resolution requiring the President to consult with and report to Congress concerning the introduction of U.S. troops abroad. The resolution represented the most fundamental effort to date by Congress to assert its authority in the formulation of U.S. foreign policy. The act was designed to provide enough flexibility for a President to respond to attacks, yet limit his ability to use troops abroad in hostilities or in potential hostilities without congressional authorization or a declaration of war.

In the context of today's debate, there are two central considerations that I believe ought to be kept in mind. The first involves the authority, under existing law, of the President and the Congress to decide the scope of any commitment of U.S. troops abroad. The second issue we must address is the wisdom of continuing the deployment of U.S. Marines in Lebanon. Before proceeding in this matter, however, we ought to take a moment to examine the terms of existing law with regard to American troop deployments abroad.

Briefly, the War Powers Act declares that "the President in every possible instance shall consult with Congress before introducing the United States armed forces" into hostile situations (section 3).

Section 4(a) of the War Powers Act declares that the President must inform the Congress when American Armed Forces are sent abroad in the following three situations:

First, "into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances";

Second, into another country "while equipped for combat, except for training purposes"; or

Third, in numbers that "substantially enlarge" the number of American combat forces already in a country.

Once the President informs the Congress that troops have been introduced into a situation covered by section 4(a)(1), the troops must be withdrawn within 60 days unless Congress: First, declares war; second, authorizes deployment beyond the 60-day period; or third, is unable to meet as a result of an armed attack against the United States.

The President may have 30 additional days to withdraw the troops, section 5(b), if he submits a report to Congress to the effect that "unavoidable military necessity respecting the safety of U.S. Armed Forces" requires additional time, but not more than 30 days, to remove the troops.

Mr. Chairman, our marines were sent to Lebanon last September to participate in a multinational peacekeeping effort. This objective appears to have been substantially expanded in the wake of recent fighting. On August 29 and again on September 6 the American forces came under heavy attack and suffered combat fatalities—a total of 4 marines were killed, 25 wounded. One week later, on September 13, the President enlarged the scope of U.S. involvement by authorizing airstrikes against positions of forces hostile to the Lebanese Government.

As my colleagues are aware, the President and his advisers have persisted in denying that our present involvement falls under the terms of the War Powers Act—stopping just short of challenging the law's constitutionality altogether. In fact, reports from the White House concerning the status of U.S. Forces in Lebanon have contended that while the information was being provided "consistent" with the provisions of the War Powers Act, the administration was not bound by the terms of the law.

Frankly, I find such brazen disregard of existing law truly shocking. It is difficult to believe that the administration can argue, in light of recent bloodshed, that U.S. marines are not now engaged in hostilities or at the very least face the prospect of imminent hostilities, and therefore meet the conditions for invoking the War Powers Act.

As my colleagues are well aware, the War Powers Act is the law of the land. It is incumbent upon this body to protect the integrity of our legislative process by asserting its legal and constitutional role in deciding the extent of our commitment in Lebanon. Failure to do so could have profound implications on the balance of power between the branches of government.

Finally, I believe we must take a hard look at the realities of Lebanon. While the current cease-fire is an extremely gratifying development, we must not ignore the circumstances which have engulfed Lebanon in civil strife for nearly a decade. Long before the present American involvement, Lebanon had dissolved into dozens of armed camps divided along religious and ethnic lines. It is not unreasonable to assume that the United States can impose unity on such a profoundly fragmented country with a limited number of troops.

Mr. Chairman, Congress must not abdicate its authority to participate in foreign policy decisions. The approval of unconditional deployment of marines for extended periods is neither consistent with existing law nor in keeping with the tradition of this body.

Had Congress or the American people truly understood the implications of the 1964 Gulf of Tonkin resolution legitimizing U.S. involvement in Southeast Asia perhaps we would not be assembled here today, deeply divided over the presence of U.S. Marines in Lebanon. Clearly, we must act now to insure compliance with existing laws. And in so doing, we must move with caution to avoid repeating the mistakes of the past.

I, therefore, strongly urge my colleagues to support the Long-Obey amendment requiring the President to invoke the War Powers Act within 90 days or certify to Congress that a cease-fire was in effect and that significant progress is being made in negotiations toward a political settlement.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, Congress passed the War Powers Act over a Presidential veto in 1973, not because it wanted to make every Member of the House and every Senator a Secretary of State, but rather, because the history of the Vietnam war had shown that one Secretary of State after another and one President after another had been willing to and had worked to bypass the unique constitutional role of Congress to declare war.
